

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. FROM THE

BRIGHT LEGACY

One half the income from this Legacy, which was received in 1880 under the will of

JONATHAN BROWN BRIGHT of Waltham, Massachusetts, is to be expended for books for the College Library. The other half of the income is devoted to scholarships in Harvard University for the benefit of descendants of HENRY BRIGHT, JR., who died at Watertown, Massachusetts, in 1686. In the absence of such descendants, other persons are eligible to the scholarships. The will requires that this announcement shall be made in every book added to the Library under its provisions.

REMARKS:

On the 11th of the month of May, 1900, the following persons were present at the meeting of the Board of Trustees of the University of the State of New York, held at the City Hall, New York City, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon: The President, the Vice-President, the Secretary, the Treasurer, the members of the Board of Trustees, and the members of the Board of Regents. The meeting was called to order by the President, who read the minutes of the last meeting, which were approved. The President then reported on the work of the Board during the past year, and the Board of Trustees then adopted a resolution of appreciation for the services of the President and the members of the Board of Regents. The meeting then adjourned.

1. The first group of variables is the set of variables that are used to describe the characteristics of the firm. These variables are: size, age, industry, and location. Size is measured by the number of employees, age by the number of years since the firm was founded, industry by the two-digit SIC code, and location by the state and county of the firm's headquarters.

Thomas Jefferson

Age about 58 years

From a portrait painted by Gilbert Stuart at Philadelphia, in May, 1800, now in the possession of Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me.

Stuart painted Jefferson's portrait from life three times. This superb picture was the first of the three paintings, and was the one preferred by the illustrious statesman, who paid Stuart $100 for it. Stuart, however, as was his practise, sold the picture twice and turned it over to Governor James Bowdoin, who bequeathed it to the College named after him.

PREFACE

THE JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA is designed to be a complete classified arrangement of the Writings of Thomas Jefferson on Government, Politics, Law, Education, Commerce, Agriculture, Manufactures, Navigation, Finance, Morals, Religious Freedom, and many other topics of permanent human interest. It contains everything of importance that Jefferson wrote on these subjects.

Why and wherefore the publication of this volume now? The answer is this: More than three-quarters of a century ago, one of the earlier biographers of Jefferson wrote: "It would be a happy circumstance for America and for the mass of mankind if the works of Jefferson could obtain a circulation which would place them in the hands of every individual. Unfortunately, the form in which they have appeared is not the most advantageous to the accomplishment of this desirable purpose. The publication is too voluminous, and consequently too expensive, to admit of a general introduction among all classes, nor is the mode of arrangement the best adapted to its reception into ordinary use as a work of reference."

From that distant day to the present time, no attempt has been made to arrange and classify the theories and principles of Jefferson, so as to make them available in ready reference form.

THE JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA aims to do this—to be a Manual of Jeffersonian Doctrine, accurate, complete, impartial, giving Jefferson's views, theories, and ideas in his own words. No edition of Jefferson's Writings, printed at either public or private expense, contains so comprehensive a collection of Jefferson's opinions as this volume. This fact will be clearly seen by all who consult it.

Not alone to the American people, but to all peoples, are Jefferson's opinions on Government of deep and abiding interest. Among the Statesmen of all time, he is the foremost Expounder of the Rights of Man, of the unalienable right of every human being to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That is the object of all just Government, to preserve which Jeffersonian principles must be sacredly cherished.

THE JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA

THE

JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA

1. ABILITIES, Appreciate.—I cannot help hoping that every friend of genius, when the other qualities of the competitor are equal, will give a preference to superior abilities.—To WILLIAM PRESTON. FORD ED., i, 368. (1768.)

2. ABILITIES, Attract.—Render the [State] executive a more desirable post to men of abilities by making it more independent of the legislature.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 315. FORD ED., v, 410. (Pa., 1791.)

3. ABILITIES, Education and.—It is often said there have been shining examples of men of great abilities, in all businesses of life, without any other science than what they had gathered from conversation and intercourse with the world. But, who can say what these men would not have been, had they started in the science on the shoulders of a Demosthenes or Cicero, of a Locke, or Bacon, or a Newton?—To JOHN BRAZIER. vii, 133. (1819.)

4. ABILITIES, Few Men of.—Men of high learning and abilities are few in every country: and by taking in [the judiciary] those who are not so, the able part of the body have their hands tied by the unable.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 315. FORD ED., v, 410. (Pa., 1791.) See ARISTOCRACY, TALENTS.

— ABLATIVE CASE IN GREEK.—See LANGUAGES.

— ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.—See SLAVERY.

5. ABORIGINES OF AMERICA, Derivation.—Whence came those aboriginals of America? Discoveries, long ago made, were sufficient to show that the passage from Europe to America was always practicable, even to the imperfect navigation of ancient times. In going from Norway to Iceland, from Iceland to Greenland, from Greenland to Labrador, the first tract is the widest; and this having been practised from the earliest times of which we have any account of that part of the earth, it is no difficult to suppose that the subsequent trajects may have been sometimes passed. Again, the late discoveries of Captain Cook, coasting from Kamchatka to California, have proved that if the two continents of Asia and America be separated at all, it is only by a narrow strait. So that from this side also, inhabitants may have passed into America; and the resemblance between the Indians of America and the eastern inhabitants of Asia, would induce us to conjecture, that the former are the descendants of the latter, or the latter of the former; excepting indeed the Esquimaux, who, from the same circumstance of resemblance, and from identity of language, must be derived from the Greenlanders, and these probably from some of the northern parts of the old continent.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 344. FORD ED., iii, 205. (1782.)

6. ABORIGINES OF AMERICA, Languages.—A knowledge of their several languages would be the most certain evidence of their derivation which could be produced. In fact, it is the best proof of the affinity of nations which ever can be referred to. How many ages have elapsed since the English, the Dutch, the Germans, the Swiss, the Norwegians, Danes and Swedes have separated from their common stock? Yet how many more must elapse before the proofs of their common origin, which exist in their several languages will disappear? It is to be lamented, then, very much to be lamented, that we have suffered so many of the Indian tribes already to extinguish without our having previously collected and deposited in the records of literature, the general rudiments at most of the languages they spoke. Were vocabularies formed of all the languages spoken in North and South America, preserving their appellations of the most common objects in nature, of those which must be present to every nation barbarous or civilized, with the inflections of their nouns and verbs, their principles of regimen and concord, and these deposited in all the public libraries, it would furnish opportunities to those skilled in the languages of the old world to compare them with those, now, or at any future time, and hence to construct the best evidence of the derivation of their part of the human race.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA, viii, 344. FORD ED., iii, 206. (1782.)

7. — — — The question whether the Indians of America have emigrated from another continent is still undecided. Their vague and imperfect traditions can satisfy no mind on that subject. I have long considered their languages as the only remaining monument of connection with other nations, or the want of it, to which we can now have access. They will likewise show their connection with one another.

THE JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA

PLAN OF THE WORK AND EXPLANATION OF ABBREVIATIONS

Two editions of Jefferson's Writings have been utilized in the preparation of this volume. One of them is THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS JEFFERSON, edited by H. A. Washington and printed by the United States Congress in 1853-54. The other edition is THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS JEFFERSON, collected and edited by Paul Leicester Ford, and published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1892-99. The FORD EDITION contains a large number of valuable letters and papers which are not printed in the WASHINGTON EDITION, while the latter gives many letters that are not included by Mr. Ford in his volumes.

The quotations in THE JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA are credited to both works if they contain them. Quotations with a single credit are printed only in the edition indicated.

There are, in addition, some quotations from the DOMESTIC LIFE OF JEFFERSON. These are marked D. L. J.

The name of the person written to is given after the extract as, under Abuse, "To EDWARD RUTLEDGE," then the volume and edition where found are given, as "iv, 151," refers to the WASHINGTON EDITION, while "FORD ED., viii, 93," is self-explanatory; next the place and date are given, as (M., Dec. 1796) = Monticello, Dec. 1796.

The names of places from which Jefferson wrote are abbreviated as follows:

| | | | |
|----------------------------|-------|-------------------------|------|

In the quotations the mark * * * indicates an omission in the text.

Words not in the text, but supplied by the Editor are, in all cases, enclosed within brackets.

THE

JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA

1. ABILITIES, Appreciate.—I cannot help hoping that every friend of genius, when the other qualities of the competitor are equal, will give a preference to superior abilities.—To WILLIAM PRESTON. FORD ED., i, 368. (1768.)

2. ABILITIES, Attract.—Render the [State] executive a more desirable post to men of abilities by making it more independent of the legislature.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 315. FORD ED., v, 410. (Pa., 1791.)

3. ABILITIES, Education and.—It is often said there have been shining examples of men of great abilities, in all businesses of life, without any other science than what they had gathered from conversation and intercourse with the world. But, who can say what these men would not have been, had they started in the science on the shoulders of a Demosthenes or Cicero, of a Locke, or Bacon, or a Newton?—To JOHN BRAZIER. vii, 133. (1819.)

4. ABILITIES, Few Men of.—Men of high learning and abilities are few in every country: and by taking in [the judiciary] those who are not so, the able part of the body have their hands tied by the unable.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 315. FORD ED., v, 410. (Pa., 1791.) See ARISTOCRACY, TALENTS.

— ABLATIVE CASE IN GREEK.—See LANGUAGES.

— ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.—See SLAVERY.

5. ABORIGINES OF AMERICA, Derivation.—Whence came those aboriginals of America? Discoveries, long ago made, were sufficient to show that the passage from Europe to America was always practicable, even to the imperfect navigation of ancient times. In going from Norway to Iceland, from Iceland to Greenland, from Greenland to Labrador, the first tract is the widest; and this having been practised from the earliest times of which we have any account of that part of the earth, it is not difficult to suppose that the subsequent trajects may have been sometimes passed. Again, the late discoveries of Captain Cook, coasting from Kamchatka to California, have proved that if the two continents of Asia and America be separated at all, it is only by a narrow strait. So that from this side also, inhabitants may have passed into America; and the resemblance between the Indians of America and the eastern inhabitants of Asia, would induce us to conjecture, that the former are the descendants of the latter, or the latter of the former; excepting indeed the Esquimaux, who, from the same circumstance of resemblance, and from identity of language, must be derived from the Greenlanders, and these probably from some of the northern parts of the old continent.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 344. FORD ED., iii, 205. (1782.)

6. ABORIGINES OF AMERICA, Languages.—A knowledge of their several languages would be the most certain evidence of their derivation which could be produced. In fact, it is the best proof of the affinity of nations which ever can be referred to. How many ages have elapsed since the English, the Dutch, the Germans, the Swiss, the Norwegians, Danes and Swedes have separated from their common stock? Yet how many more must elapse before the proofs of their common origin, which exist in their several languages will disappear? It is to be lamented, then, very much to be lamented, that we have suffered so many of the Indian tribes already to extinguish without our having previously collected and deposited in the records of literature, the general rudiments at most of the languages they spoke. Were vocabularies formed of all the languages spoken in North and South America, preserving their appellations of the most common objects in nature, of those which must be present to every nation barbarous or civilized, with the inflections of their nouns and verbs, their principles of regimen and concord, and these deposited in all the public libraries, it would furnish opportunities to those skilled in the languages of the old world to compare them with those, now, or at any future time, and hence to construct the best evidence of the derivation of their part of the human race.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA, viii, 344. FORD ED., iii, 206. (1782.)

7. — The question whether the Indians of America have emigrated from another continent is still undecided. Their vague and imperfect traditions can satisfy no mind on that subject. I have long considered their languages as the only remaining monument of connection with other nations, or the want of it, to which we can now have access. They will likewise show their connection with one another.

Very early in life, therefore, I formed a vocabulary of such objects as, being present everywhere, would probably have a name in every language; and my course of life having given me opportunities of obtaining vocabularies of many Indian tribes, I have done so on my original plan, which, though far from being perfect, has the valuable advantage of identity, of thus bringing the languages to the same points of comparison. * * * The Indians west of the Mississippi and south of the Arkansas, present a much longer list of tribes than I had expected; and the relations in which you stand with them * * * induce me to hope you will avail us of your means of collecting their languages for this purpose.—To Dr. SIBLEY. iv, 580. (W., 1805.)

8. — I suppose the settlement of our continent is of the most remote antiquity. The similitude between its inhabitants and those of eastern parts of Asia renders it probable that ours are descended from them, or they from ours. The latter is my opinion, founded on this single fact: Among the red inhabitants of Asia, there are but a few languages radically different, but among our Indians, the number of languages is infinite, and they are so radically different as to exhibit at present no appearance of their having been derived from a common source. The time necessary for the generation of so many languages must be immense.—To EZRA STILES. FORD ED., iv, 298. (P., 1786.) See INDIANS.

— ABSENCE FROM THE CAPITAL.—See VACATION.

— ABSTINENCE.—See INTEMPERANCE.

9. ABUSE, Newspaper.—It is hardly necessary to caution you to let nothing of mine get before the public: a single sentence got hold of by the "Porcupines," * will suffice to abuse and persecute me in their papers for months.—To JOHN TAYLOR, iv, 248. FORD ED., vii, 266. (Pa., 1798.) See LIBELS, MINISTERS, NEWSPAPERS and SLANDER.

10. ABUSE, Personal.—You have seen my name lately tacked to so much of eulogy and of abuse that I dare say you hardly thought that it meant your old acquaintance of '76. In truth, I did not know myself under the pens either of my friends or foes. It is unfortunate for our peace that unmerited abuse wounds, while unmerited praise has not the power to heal. These are hard wages for the services of all the active and healthy years of one's life.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 151. FORD ED., vii, 93. (M., Dec. 1796.) See CALUMNY, LIBELS, MINISTERS, NEWSPAPERS and SLANDER.

11. — If you had lent to your country the excellent talents you possess, on you would have fallen those torrents of abuse which have lately been poured forth on me. So far I praise the wisdom which has desisted and steered clear of a waterspout ahead.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 152. FORD ED., vii, 94. (M., 1796.)

— ABUSE OF POWER.—See POWER.

— ABUSE OF THE PRESS.—See CALUMNY, LIBELS, NEWSPAPERS, and SLANDER.

* "Peter Porcupine" was the pen-name of William Cobbett.—EDITOR.

12. ABUSES, Arraignment of.—The arraignment of all abuses at the bar of public reason, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and consequently, [one] which ought to shape its administration. FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.)

13. ABUSES, Barriers against.—We are to guard against ourselves; not against ourselves as we are, but as we may be; for who can now imagine what we may become under circumstances not now imaginable?—To JEDEDIAH MORSE. vii, 236. FORD ED., x, 206. (M., 1822.)

14. ABUSES, The Constitution and.—In questions of power * * * let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 471. FORD ED., vii, 305. (1798.) See CONFIDENCE.

15. — Aware of the tendency of power to degenerate into abuse, the worthies of our own country have secured its independence by the establishment of a Constitution and form of government for our nation, calculated to prevent as well as to correct abuse.—R. TO A WASHINGTON TAMMANY SOCIETY. viii, 156. (1809.)

16. ABUSES, Correction of.—My confidence is that there will for a long time be virtue and good sense enough in our countrymen to correct abuses.—To E. RUTLEDGE. ii, 435. FORD ED., v, 42. (P., 1788.)

17. ABUSES, Economy and.—The new government has now, for some time, been under way. Abuses under the old forms have led us to lay the basis of the new in a rigorous economy of the public contributions.—To M. DE PINTO. iii, 174. (N. Y., 1790.)

18. ABUSES, Education and.—Education is the true corrective of abuses of constitutional power.—To WILLIAM C. JARVIS. vii, 179. FORD ED., x, 161. (M., 1820.)

19. ABUSES, Elections and.—A jealous care of the right of election by the people,—a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently, [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1801.)

20. ABUSES, Liability to.—What institution is insusceptible of abuse in wicked hands?—To L. H. GIRARDIN. vi, 440. FORD ED., ii, 151. (M., 1815.)

21. ABUSES, Monarchical.—Nor should we wonder at the pressure [for a fixed Constitution in France in 1788-9], when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which this people were ground to powder, when we pass in review the weight of their taxes, and inequality of their distribution: the oppressions of the tithes, of the tailles, the corvées, the gabelles, the farms and barriers: the shackles on commerce by monopolies: on industry by guilds and corporations: on the freedom of conscience, of thought, and of speech: on the press by the Censors and of person by lettres de cachet; the cruelty of the criminal code generally, the atrocities of the Rack, the venality of judges, and their partialities to the rich; the monopoly of military honors by the noblesse; the enormous expenses of the Queen, the princes and the court; the prodigalities of pensions; and the riches, luxury, indolence, and immorality of the clergy. Surely under such a mass of misrule and oppression, a people might justly press for a thorough reformation, and might even dismount their rough-shod riders, and leave them to walk on their own legs.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.)

22. ABUSES, Patrimonies in.—Happy for us that abuses have not yet become patrimonies, and that every description of interest is in favor of rational and moderate government.—TO RALPH IZARD. ii, 429. (P., 1788.)

—ABUSES OF POWER.—See POWER.

23. ABUSES, Revolution and.—When a long train of abuses and usurpations begun at a distinguished period and * pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

24. ABUSES, Temptations to.—Nor should our Assembly be deluded by the integrity of their own purposes, and conclude that these unlimited powers will never be abused, because themselves are not disposed to abuse them. They should look forward to a time, and that not a distant one, when corruption in this as in the country from which we derive our origin, will have seized the heads of government, and be spread by them through the body of the people; when they will purchase the voices of the people and make them pay the price. Human nature is the same on each side of the Atlantic, and will be alike influenced by the same causes. The time to guard against corruption and tyranny is before they shall have gotten hold of us. It is better keep the wolf out of the fold, than to trust to drawing his teeth and talons after he shall have entered.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 362. FORD ED., iii, 224. (1782.)

25. ABUSES, Tendency to.—Mankind soon learns to make interested uses of every right and power which they possess, or may assume. The public money and public liberty * * * will soon be discovered to be sources of wealth and dominion to those who hold them; distinguished, too, by this tempting circumstance, that they are the instrument, as well as the object of acquisition. With money we will get men, said Cæsar, and with men we will get money.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 362. FORD ED., iii, 224. (1782.)

26. ACADEMY (The Military), Beginning.—It was proposed [at a meeting of the cabinet] to recommend [in the President's speech to Congress] the establishment of a Military Academy. I objected that none of the specified powers given by the Constitution to Congress would authorize this. * * * The President [said], though it would be a good thing, he did not wish to bring on anything which might generate heat and ill humor. It was, therefore, referred for further consideration and inquiry. [At the next meeting] I opposed it as unauthorized by the Constitution. Hamilton and Knox approved it without discussion. Edmund Randolph was for it, saying that the words of the Constitution authorizing Congress to lay taxes &c., for the common defence, might comprehend it. The President said he would not choose to recommend anything against the Constitution; but if it was doubtful, he was so impressed with the necessity of this measure, that he would refer it to Congress, and let them decide for themselves whether the Constitution authorized it or not.—ANAS. ix, 182. FORD ED., i, 270. (Nov. 1793.)

27. ACADEMY (The Military), Enlargement.—The scale on which the Military Academy at West Point was originally established, is become too limited to furnish the number of well-instructed subjects in the different branches of artillery and engineering which the public service calls for. The want of such characters is already sensibly felt, and will be increased with the enlargement of our plans of military preparation. The chief engineer having been instructed to consider the subject, and to propose an augmentation which might render the establishment commensurate with the present circumstances of our country, has made the report I now transmit for the consideration of Congress.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 101. (March 1808.)

28. ACADEMY (The Military), Importance of.—I have ever considered that establishment as of major importance to our country, and in whatever I could do for it, I viewed myself as performing a duty only. * * * The real debt of the institution is to its able and zealous professors.—TO JARED MANSFIELD. vii, 203. (M., 1821.)

29. ACADEMY (The Military), Removal.—The idea suggested by the chief engineer of removing the institution to this place [Washington], is worthy of attention. Beside the advantage of placing it under the immediate eye of the Government, it may render its benefits common to the naval department, and will furnish opportunities of selecting on better information, the characters most qualified to fulfil the duties which the public service may call for.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 101. (March 1808.)

30. ACADEMY, A National.—I have often wished we could have a Philosophical Society, or Academy, so organized as that while the central academy should be at the seat of government, its members dispersed over the States, should constitute filiated academies in each State, publish their communications, from which the Central Academy should select unpublished what should be most choice. In this way all the members, wheresoever dispersed, might be brought into action, and an useful emulation might arise between the filiated societies. Perhaps the great societies, now existing, might incorporate themselves in this way with the National one. To JOEL BARLOW. FORD ED., viii, 424. (Feb. 1806.)

* Congress struck out the words in italica.—EDITOR.

31. ACADEMY, Need of a Naval.—I think * * * that there should be a school of instruction for our Navy as well as artillery; and I do not see why the same establishment might not suffice for both. Both require the same basis of general mathematics, adding projectiles and fortifications for the artillery exclusively, and astronomy and theory of navigation exclusively for the naval students. Berout conducted both schools in France, and has left us the best book extant for their joint and separate instruction. It ought not to require a separate professor.* —To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 218. (M., 1821.)

32. ACADEMY, Transfer of Geneva.—I * * * enclose for your perusal and consideration * * * the proposition of M. D'Ivernois, a Genevan of considerable distinction, to translate the Academy of Geneva in a body to this country. You know well that the colleges of Edinburgh and Geneva as seminaries of science, are considered as the two eyes of Europe. While Great Britain and America give the preference to the former, all other countries give it to the latter. I am fully sensible that two powerful obstacles are in the way of this proposition. First, the expense; secondly, the communication of science in foreign languages; that is to say, in French and Latin; but I have been so long absent from my own country as to be an incompetent judge either of the force of the objections, or of the disposition of those who are to decide on them. * * * What I have to request of you is, that you will * * * consider his proposition, consult on its expediency and practicability with such gentlemen of the Assembly [of Virginia], as you think best, and take such other measures as you shall think best to ascertain what would be the sense of that body, were the proposition to be hazarded to them. If yourself and friends approve of it, and there is hope that the Assembly will do so, your zeal for the good of our country in general, and the promotion of science, as an instrument towards that, will, of course, induce you and them to bring it forward in such a way as you shall judge best. If, on the contrary, you disapprove of it yourselves, or think it would be desperate with the Assembly, be so good as to return it to me with such information as I may hand forward to M. D'Ivernois, to put him out of suspense. Keep the matter by all means out of the public papers, and particularly, * * * do not couple my name with the proposition if brought forward, because it is much my wish to be in nowise implicated in public affairs.—To WILSON NICHOLAS. iv, 109. FORD ED., vi, 513. (M., Nov. 1794.)

* The Naval Academy at Annapolis was opened in 1845. The credit of its foundation is due to George Bancroft, who was then Secretary of the Navy.—EDITOR.

33. — I have returned, with infinite appetite, to the enjoyment of my farm, my family and my books, and had determined to meddle in nothing beyond their limits. Your proposition, however, for transplanting the college of Geneva to my own country, was too analogous to all my attachments to science, and freedom, the first-born daughter of science, not to excite a lively interest in my mind, and the essays which were necessary to try its practicability. This depended altogether on the opinions and dispositions of our State Legislature, which was then in session. I immediately communicated your papers to a member of the Legislature, whose abilities and zeal pointed him out as proper for it, urging him to sound as many of the leading members of the Legislature as he could, and if he found their opinions favorable, to bring forward the proposition; but if he should find it desperate, not to hazard it; because I thought it best not to commit the honor either of our State or of your college, by an useless act of eclat. * * * The members were generally well-disposed to the proposition, and some of them warmly; however, there was no difference in the conclusion, that it could not be effected. The reasons which they thought would with certainty prevail against it, were 1, that our youth, not familiarized but with their mother tongue, were not prepared to receive instructions in any other; 2, that the expense of the institution would excite uneasiness in their constituents, and endanger its permanence; and 3, that its extent was disproportioned to the narrow state of the population with us. Whatever might be urged on these several subjects, yet as the decision rests with others, there remained to us only to regret that circumstances were such, or were thought to be such, as to disappoint your and our wishes.—To M. D'IVERNOS. iv, 113. FORD ED., vii, 2. (M., Feb. 1795.)

34. ACADEMY, Wish for Geneva.—I should have seen with peculiar satisfaction the establishment of such a mass of science in my country, and should probably have been tempted to approach myself to it, by procuring a residence in its neighborhood, at those seasons of the year at least when the operations of agriculture are less active and interesting.—To M. D'IVERNOS. iv, 114. FORD ED., vii, 4. (M., Feb. 1795.)

35. ACADEMIES, Architectural Reform.—I consider the common plan followed in this country, but not in others, of making one large and expensive building, as unfortunately erroneous. It is infinitely better to erect a small and separate lodge for each separate professorship, with only a hall below for his class, and two chambers above for himself; joining these lodges by barracks for a certain portion of the students, opening into a covered way to give a dry communication between all the schools. The whole of these arranged around an open square of grass and trees, would make it, what it should be in fact, an academical village, instead of a large and common den of noise, of filth and of fetid air. It would afford that quiet retirement so friendly to study, and lessen the dangers of fire, infection and tumult. Every professor would be the police officer of the students adjacent to his own lodge, which should include those of his own class of preference, and might be at the head of their table, if, as I suppose, it can be reconciled with the necessary economy to dine them in smaller and separate parties, rather than in a large and common mess. These separate buildings, too, might be erected successively and occasionally.

as the number of professors and students should be increased, as the funds become competent.—To HUGH L. WHITE. v, 521. (M., 1810.)

— ACCENT, The Greek.—See LANGUAGES.

36. ACCOUNTS, Complicated.—Alexander Hamilton * * * in order that he might have the entire government of his [Treasury] machine, determined so to complicate it as that neither the President nor Congress should be able to understand it, or to control him. He succeeded in doing this, not only beyond their reach, but so that he at length could not unravel it himself. He gave to the debt, in the first instance, in funding it, the most artificial and mysterious form he could devise. He then moulded up his appropriations of a number of scraps and remnants, many of which were nothing at all, and applied them to different objects in reversion and remainder, until the whole system was involved in impenetrable fog; and while he was giving himself the airs of providing for the payment of the debt, he left himself free to add to it continually, as he did in fact, instead of paying it.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 428. FORD ED., viii, 140. (W., 1801.)

37. ACCOUNTS, Keeping.—All these articles are very foreign to my talents, and foreign also, as I conceive, to the nature of my duties. * * * I suppose it practicable for your board to direct the administration of your moneys here [Paris] in every circumstance.—To SAMUEL OSGOOD. i, 451. (P., 1785.)

38. ACCOUNTS, Neglected.—It is a fact, which we [Virginia] are to lament, that, in the earlier part of our struggles, we were so wholly occupied by the great object of establishing our rights, that we attended not at all to those little circumstances of taking receipts and vouchers, keeping regular accounts, and preparing subjects for future disputes with our friends. If we could have supported the whole Continent, I believe we should have done it, and never dishonored our nation by producing accounts; sincerely assured that, in no circumstances of future necessity or distress, a like free application of anything therein would have been thought hardly of, or would have rendered necessary an appeal to accounts. Hence, it has happened that, in the present case, the collection of vouchers of the arms furnished by this State has become tedious and difficult.—To THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 283. (W., 1779.)

39. ACCOUNTS, Simple.—The accounts of the United States ought to be, and may be made, as simple as those of a common farmer, and capable of being understood by common farmers.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 131. FORD ED., vii, 61. (M., 1706.)

40. — — — If * * * [there] can be added a simplification of the form of accounts in the Treasury department, and in the organization of its officers, so as to bring everything to a single centre, we might hope to see the finances of the Union as clear and intelligible as a merchant's books, so that every member of Congress, and every man of any mind in the Union, should be able to comprehend them, to investigate abuses, and consequently to control them. Our predecessors have endeavored by intricacies of system, and shuffling the investigation over from one officer to another, to cover everything from detection. I hope we shall go in the contrary direction, and that, by our honest and judicious reformatations, we may be able in the limits of our time, to bring things back to that simple and intelligible system, on which they should have been organized at first.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 429. FORD ED., viii, 141. (W., 1802.)

— ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.—See TERRITORY.

41. ACTIONS, Approved.—The very actions [on] which Mr. Pickering arraigns [me] have been such as the great majority of my fellow citizens have approved. The approbation of Mr. Pickering, and of those who thought with him [the Federalists], I had no right to expect.—To MARTIN VAN BUREN. vii, 363. FORD ED., x, 306. (M., 1824.)

42. ACTIONS, Disinterested.—I am conscious of having always intended to do what was best for my fellow citizens; and never, for a single moment, to have listened to any personal interest of my own.—To RICHARD M. JOHNSTON. v, 256. (W., 1808.)

43. — — — My public proceedings were always directed by a single view to the best interests of our country.—To DR. E. GRIFFITH. v, 450. (M., 1809.)

44. — — — In the transaction of the [public] affairs I never felt one interested motive.—To W. LAMBERT. v, 450. (M., May 1809.)

45. ACTIONS, Government and.—The legislative powers of government reach actions only and not opinions.—R. to A. DANBURY BAPTIST ADDRESS. viii, 113. (1802.)

46. ACTIONS, Honest Principles and.—Every honest man will suppose honest acts to flow from honest principles, and the rogues may rail without intermission.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 426. FORD ED., viii, 128. (W., 1801.)

47. ACTIONS, Indulgent to.—I owe infinite acknowledgments to the republican portion of my fellow citizens for the indulgence with which they have viewed my proceedings generally.—To W. LAMBERT. v, 450. (M., May 1809.) See DISINTERESTEDNESS.

48. ACTIONS, Judgment and.—Upwards of thirty years passed on the stage of public life and under the public eye, may surely enable them to judge whether my future course is likely to be marked with those departures from reason and moderation, which the passions of men have been willing to foresee.—To WILLIAM JACKSON. iv, 358. (M., 1801.)

49. ACTIONS, Lawful.—Every man should be protected in his lawful acts.—To ISAAC MCPHERSON. vi, 175. (M., 1813.)

50. ACTIONS, Present and future.—Our duty is to act upon things as they are, and to make a reasonable provision for whatever they may be.—SIXTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 69. FORD ED., viii, 405. (Dec. 1806.)

51. ACTIONS, Publicity and.—I fear no injury which any man can do me. I have never done a single act, or been concerned in any transaction, which I fear to have fully laid open, or which could do me any hurt if truly stated. I have never done a single thing with a view to my personal interest, or that of any friend, or with any other view than that of the greatest public good; therefore, no threat or fear on that head will ever be a motive of action with me.*—ANAS. ix, 209. FORD ED., i, 312. (1806.)

52. ACTIONS, Purity of.—I can conscientiously declare that as to myself, I wish that not only no act but no thought of mine should be unknown.—To JAMES MAIN. v, 373. (W., 1808.)

53. ACTIONS, Right.—The precept of Providence is, to do always what is right, and leave the issue to Him.—To MRS. COSWAY. ii, 41. FORD ED., iv, 320. (P., 1786.)

54. ACTIONS, Rule for.—Whenever you are to do a thing, though it can never be known but to yourself, ask yourself how you would act were all the world looking at you, and act accordingly.†—To PETER CARR. i, 396. (Ps., 1785.)

55. — — — When tempted to do anything in secret, ask yourself if you would do it in public; if you would not, be sure it is wrong.‡—To FRANCIS EPPES. D. L. J. 365.

56. ACTIONS, Virtuous.—If no action is to be deemed virtuous for which malice can imagine a sinister motive, then there never was a virtuous action; no, not even in the life of our Saviour Himself. But He has taught us to judge the tree by its fruit, and to leave motives to Him who can alone see into them.—To MARTIN VAN BUREN. vii, 363. FORD ED., x, 307 (M., 1824.)

Alien and Sedition laws, the vexations of the stamp act, the disgusting particularities of the direct tax, the additional army without an enemy, and recruiting officers lounging at every court house, a navy of fifty ships, five millions to be raised to build it, on the ruinous interest of eight per cent., the perseverance in war on our part, when the French government shows such an anxious desire to keep at peace with us, taxes of ten millions now paid by four millions of people, and yet a necessity, in a year or two, of raising five millions more for annual expenses. Those things will immediately be bearing on the public mind, and if it remain not still blinded by a supposed necessity, for the purpose of maintaining our independence and defending our country, they will set things to rights. I hope you will undertake this statement.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. iv, 275. FORD ED., vii, 337. (Pa., Jan. 1799.) See 1056.

58. — — — We were far from considering you as the author of all the measures we blamed. They were placed under the protection of your name, but we were satisfied they wanted much of your approbation. We ascribed them to their real authors, the Pickering, Wolcotts, the Tracys, the Sedgwicks. et id genus omne, with whom we supposed you in a state of duress. I well remember a conversation with you in the morning of the day on which you nominated to the Senate a substitute for Pickering, in which you expressed a just impatience under "the legacy of secretaries which General Washington had left you," and whom you seemed, therefore, to consider as under public protection. Many other incidents showed how differently you would have acted with less impassioned advisers; and subsequent events have proved that your minds were not together. You would do me great injustice, therefore, by taking to yourself what was intended for men who were then your secret, as they are now your open enemies.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 126. FORD ED., ix, 387. 59. ADAMS (John), Attacks on.—With respect to the calumnies and falsehoods which writers and printers at large published against Mr. Adams, I was as far from stooping to any concern or approbation of them, as Mr. Adams was respecting those of "Porcupine," Fenno, or Russell, who published volumes against me for every sentence vended by their opponents against Mr. Adams. But I never supposed Mr. Adams had any participation in the atrocities of these editors, or their writers. I knew myself incapable of that base warfare, and believed him to be so. On the contrary, whatever I may have thought of the acts of the administration of that day, I have ever borne testimony to Mr. Adams's personal worth; nor was it ever impeached in my presence, without a just vindication of it on my part. I never supposed that any person who knew either of us, could believe that either of us meddled in that dirty work.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 555. FORD ED., viii, 309. (W., July 1804.)

60. — — Mr. Adams has been alienated from me, by belief in the lying suggestions contrived for electioneering purposes, that I perhaps mixed in the activity and intrigues of the occasion. My most intimate friends can testify that I was perfectly passive. They would sometimes, indeed, tell me what was going on; but no man ever heard me take part in such conversations; and none ever misrepresented Mr. Adams in my presence, without my asserting his just character. With very confidential persons I have doubtless disapproved of the principles and practices of his administration. This was unavoidable. But never with those with whom it could do him any injury. Decency would have required this conduct from me, if disposition had not, and I am satisfied Mr. Adams's conduct was equally honorable towards me. But I think it part of his character to suspect foul play in those of whom he is jealous, and not easily to relinquish his suspicions.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. v, 563. FORD ED., ix, 299. (M., Jan. 1811.)

61. ADAMS (John), Character.—He is vain, irritable, and a bad calculator of the force and probable effect of the motives which govern men. This is all the ill which can possibly be said of him. He is as disinterested as the Being who made him. He is profound in his views, and accurate in his judgment, except where knowledge of the world is necessary to form a judgment. He is so amiable that I pronounce you will love him, if ever you become acquainted with him. He would be, as he was, a great man in Congress.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 107. (P., 1787.)

62. — — His vanity is a lineament in his character which had entirely escaped me. His want of taste I had observed. Notwithstanding all this he has a sound head on substantial points, and I think he has integrity.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 309. (B., Feb. 1783.)

63. — — The President's title, as proposed by the Senate, was the most superlatively ridiculous thing I ever heard of. It is a proof the more of the justice of the character given by Dr. Franklin of my friend. Always an honest man, often a great one, but sometimes absolutely mad.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., v, 104. (P., July 1789.)

64. ADAMS (John), Declaration of Independence and.—John Adams was the pillar of its [Declaration of Independence] support on the floor of Congress; its ablest advocate and defender against the multifarious assaults it encountered. For many excellent persons opposed it on doubts whether we were provided sufficiently with the means of supporting it, whether the minds of our constituents were yet prepared to receive it &c., who, after it was decided, united zealously in the measures it called for.—To WILLIAM P. GARDNER. FORD ED., ix, 377. (M., 1813.)

65. — — He supported the Declaration with zeal and ability, fighting fearlessly for every word of it. No man's confident and fervent addresses, more than Mr. Adams's encouraged and supported us through the difficulties surrounding us, which, like the ceaseless action of gravity, weighed on us by night and by day.*—To JAMES MADISON. vii, 305. FORD ED., x, 268. (M., 1823.)

66. — — His deep conceptions, nervous style, and undaunted firmness, made him truly our bulwark in debate.—To SAMUEL A. WELLS. i, 121. FORD ED., x, 131. (M., 1819.) See DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

67. ADAMS (John), Departure from Europe.—I learn with real pain the resolution you have taken of quitting Europe. Your presence on this side the Atlantic gave me a confidence that, if any difficulties should arise within my department, I should always have one to advise with on whose counsels I could rely. I shall now feel bewidowed. I do not wonder at your being tired out by the conduct of the court you are at.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 127. (P., 1787.)

68. ADAMS (John), Friendship of Jefferson for.—Mr. Adams's friendship and mine began at an early date. It accompanied us through long and important scenes. The different conclusions we had drawn from our political reading and reflections, were not permitted to lessen personal esteem; each party being conscious they were the result of an honest conviction in the other. Like differences of opinion existing among our fellow citizens, attached them to one or the other of us, and produced a rivalry in their minds which did not exist in ours. We never stood in one another's way; for if either had been withdrawn at any time, his favorers would not have gone over to the other, but would have sought for some one of homogeneous opinions. This consideration was sufficient to keep down all jealousy between us, and to guard our friendship from any disturbance by sentiments of rivalry.†—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 545. FORD ED., viii, 306. (W., June 1804.)

69. — — I write you this letter as due to a friendship coeval with our government, and now attempted to be poisoned, when too late in life to be replaced by new affections. I had for some time observed in the public papers, dark hints and mysterious innuendoes of a correspondence of yours with a friend, to whom you had opened your bosom without reserve, and which was to be made public by that friend or

* Daniel Webster visited Jefferson at Monticello toward the close of 1824. He quoted Jefferson as having then said in conversation: "John Adams was our Colossus on the floor. He was not graceful, nor elegant, nor remarkably fluent; but he came out, occasionally, with a power of thought and expression that moved us from our seats." Webster introduced the quotation in his speech on "Adams and Jefferson," August 2, 1826. The conversation entire is printed in the Private Correspondence of Webster (i, 364), and in the FORD ED. of Jefferson's Writings, x, 327.—EDITOR.

his representative. And now it is said to be actually published. It has not yet reached us, but extracts have been given, and such as seemed most likely to draw a curtain of separation between you and myself. Were there no other motive than that of indignation against the author of this outrage on private confidence, whose shaft seems to have been aimed at yourself more particularly, this would make it the duty of every honorable mind to disappoint that aim, by opposing to its impression a seven-fold shield of apathy and insensibility. With me, however, no such armor is needed. The circumstances of the times in which we have happened to live, and the partiality of our friends at a particular period, placed us in a state of apparent opposition, which some might suppose to be personal also; and there might not be wanting those who wished to make it so, by filling our ears with malignant falsehoods, by dressing up hideous phantoms of their own creation, presenting them to you under my name, to me under yours, and endeavoring to instil into our minds things concerning each other the most destitute of truth. And if there had been, at any time, a moment when we were off our guard, and in a temper to let the whispers of these people make us forget what we had known of each other for so many years, and years of so much trial, yet all men who have attended to the workings of the human mind, who have seen the false colors under which passion sometimes dresses the actions and motives of others, have seen also those passions subsiding with time and reflection, dissipating like mists before the rising sun, and restoring to us the sight of all things in their true shape and colors. It would be strange, indeed, if, at our years, we were to go back an age to hunt up imaginary or forgotten facts, to disturb the repose of affections so sweetening to the evening of our lives. Be assured, my dear sir, that I am incapable of receiving the slightest impression from the effort now made to plant thorns on the pillow of age, worth and wisdom, and to sow tares between friends who have been such for near half a century. Beseeching you, then, not to suffer your mind to be disquieted by this wicked attempt to poison its peace, and praying you to throw it by among the things which have never happened, I add sincere assurances of my unabated and constant attachment, friendship and respect.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 314. FORD ED., x, 273. (M., 1823.)

70. ———. Fortune had disjoined our first affections, and placed us in opposition in every point. This separated us for awhile. But on the first intimation through a friend, we re-embraced with cordiality, recalled our ancient feelings and dispositions, and everything was forgotten but our first sympathies.—I bear ill-will to no human being.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., x, 298. (M., 1824.)

71. ADAMS (John), George III. and.—The sentiments you expressed [in your address on presentation to the King] were such as were entertained in America till the commercial proclamation, and such as would again return were a rational conduct to be adopted by Great Britain. I think, therefore, you by no means compromised yourself, or our country, nor expressed more than it would be our interest to encourage, if they were disposed to meet us.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 436. (P., September 1785.)

72. ADAMS (John), Honesty.—I have the same good opinion of Mr. Adams which I ever had. I know him to be an honest man, an able one with his pen, and he was a powerful advocate on the floor of Congress.—To Dr. BENJAMIN RUSH. v, 562. FORD ED., ix, 298. (M., 1811.)

73. ADAMS (John), Integrity.—Though I saw that our ancient friendship was affected by a little leaven, produced partly by his constitution, partly by the contrivance of others, yet I never felt a diminution of confidence in his integrity, and retained a solid affection for him. His principles of government I knew to be changed, but conscientiously changed.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 161. FORD ED., vii, 108. (M., Jan. 1797.)

74. ADAMS (John), Jefferson and Election of.—The public and the papers have been much occupied lately in placing us in a point of opposition to each other. I trust with confidence that less of it has been felt by ourselves personally. In the retired canton where I am, I learn little of what is passing; pamphlets I never see; papers but a few, and the fewer the happier. Our latest intelligence from Philadelphia at present is of the 16th inst., but though at that date your election to the first magistracy seems not to have been known as a fact, yet with me it has never been doubted. I knew it impossible you should lose a vote North of the Delaware, and even if that of Pennsylvania should be against you in the mass, yet that you would get enough South of that to place your succession out of danger. I have never one single moment expected a different issue; and though I know I shall not be believed, yet it is not the less true that I have never wished it. My neighbors as my compurgators could aver that fact, because they see my occupations and my attachment to them. Indeed it is impossible that you may be cheated of your succession by a trick worthy the subtlety of your arch-friend of New York [Alexander Hamilton] who has been able to make of your real friends tools to defeat their and your just wishes. Most probably he will be disappointed as to you; and my inclinations place me out of his reach. I leave to others the sublime delights of riding in the storm, better pleased with sound sleep and a warm berth below, with the society of neighbors, friends and fellow-laborers of the earth, than of spies and sycophants. No one then will congratulate you with purer disinterestedness than myself. The share, indeed, which I may have had in the late vote, I shall value highly as an evidence of the share I have in the esteem of my fellow citizens. But while in this point of view, a few votes less would be little sensible, the difference in the effect of a few more would be very sensible and oppressive to me. I have no ambition to govern men. It is a painful and thankless office. Since the day, too, on which you signed the treaty of Paris our horizon was never so overcast. I devoutly wish you may be able to shun for us this war by which our agriculture, commerce and credit will be destroyed. If you are, the glory will be all your own; and that your administration may be filled with glory, and happiness to yourself and advantage to us is the sincere wish of one who, though in the course of our own voyage through life various little incidents have happened or been contrived to separate us, retains still for you the solid esteem of the moments when we were working for our independence, and sentiments of respect and affectionate attachment.*—To JOHN ADAMS. iv, 153. FORD ED., vii, 95. (Dec. 28, 1796.)

75. ——. Mr. Adams and myself were cordial friends from the beginning of the Revolution. Since our return from Europe, some little incidents have happened, which were capable of affecting a jealous mind like his. His deviation from that line of politics on which we had been united, has not made me less sensible of the rectitude of his heart; and I wished him to know this, and also another truth, that I am sincerely pleased at having escaped the late draft for the helm, and have not a wish which he stands in the way of. That he should be convinced of these truths, is important to our mutual satisfaction, and perhaps to the harmony and good of the public service. But there was a difficulty in conveying them to him, and a possibility that the attempt might do mischief there or somewhere else; and I would not have hazarded the attempt, if you had not been in place to decide upon its expediency.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 166. FORD ED., vii, 115. (M., Jan. 1797.)

76. ——. You express apprehensions that stratagems will be used to produce a misunderstanding between the President and myself. Though not a word having this tendency has ever been hazarded to me by anyone, yet I consider as a certainty that nothing will be left untried to alienate him from me. These machinations will proceed from the Hamiltonians by whom he is surrounded, and who are only a little less hostile to him than to me. It cannot but damp the pleasure of cordiality when we suspect that it is suspected. I cannot help thinking that it is impossible for Mr. Adams to believe that the state of my mind is what it really is; that he may think I view him as an obstacle in my way. I have no supernatural power to impress truth on the mind of another, nor he any to discover that the estimate he may form, on a just view of the human mind as generally constituted, may not be just in its application to a special constitution. This may be a source of private uneasiness to us; I honestly confess that it is so to me at this time. But neither of us is capable of letting it have effect on our public duties. Those who may endeavor to separate us, are probably excited by the fear that I might have influence on the Executive councils; but when they shall know that I consider my office as constitutionally confined to legislative functions, and that I could not take any part whatever in executive consultations, even were it proposed, their fears may perhaps subside, and their object be found not worth a machination.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 171. FORD ED., vii, 120. (May 1797.)

77. ADAMS (John), Jefferson's Election and.—The nation passed condemnation on the political principles of the federalists, by refusing to continue Mr. Adams in the Presidency. On the day on which we learned in Philadelphia the vote of the city of New York, which it was well known would decide the vote of the State, and that, again, the vote of the Union, I called on Mr. Adams on some official business. He was very seriously affected, and accosted me with these words: "Well, I understand that you are to beat me in this contest, and I will only say that I will be as faithful a subject as any you will have." "Mr. Adams," said I, "this is no personal contest between you and me. Two systems of principles on the subject of government divide our citizens into two parties. With one of these you concur, and I with the other. As we have been longer on the public stage than most of those now living, our names happen to be more generally known. One of these parties, therefore, has put your name at its head, the other mine. Were we both to die to-day, to-morrow two other names would be in the place of ours, without any change in the motion of the machinery. Its motion is from its principle, and not from you or myself." "I believe you are right," said he, "that we are but passive instruments, and should not suffer this matter to affect our personal dispositions." But he did long retain this just view of the subject. I have always believed that the thousand calumnies which the federalists, in bitterness of heart, and mortification at their ejection, daily invented against me, were carried to him by their busy intriguers, and made some impression.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. v, 560. FORD ED., ix, 296. (M., Jan. 1811.)

78. ——. When the election between Burr and myself was kept in suspense by the federalists, and they were meditating to place the President of the Senate at the head of the government, I called on Mr. Adams with a view to have this desperate measure prevented by his negative. He grew warm in an instant, and said with a vehemence he had not used towards me before: "Sir, the event of the election is within your own power. You have only to say you will do justice to the public creditors, maintain the navy, and not disturb those holding offices, and the government will instantly be put into your hands. We know it is the wish of the people it should be so." "Mr. Adams," said I, "I know not what part of my conduct, in either public or private life, can have authorized a doubt of my fidelity to the public engagements. I say, however, I will not come into the government by capitulation. I will not enter on it, but in perfect freedom to follow the dictates of my own judgment." I had before given the same answer to the same intimation from Gouverneur Morris. "Then," said he, "things must take their course." I turned the conversation to something else, and soon took my leave. It was the first time in our lives we had ever parted with anything like dissatisfaction.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. v, 561. FORD ED., ix, 297. (M., Jan. 1811.)

* Jefferson sent this letter to Madison who decided that it would be inexpedient to forward it to Adams. "I am very thankful," Jefferson wrote to Madison in January, 1797 (iv, 166, FORD ED., vii, 115), "for the discretion you have exercised over the letter. That has happened to be the case, which I knew to be possible, that the honest expression of my feelings towards Mr. Adams might be rendered malapropos from circumstances existing, and known at the seat of government, but not known by me in my retired situation."—EDITOR.

79. ADAMS (John), Jefferson, Paine and.—I am afraid the indiscretion of a printer has committed me with my friend Mr. Adams, for whom, as one of the most honest and disinterested men alive. I have a cordial esteem, increased by long habits of concurrence in opinion in the days of his republicanism: and even since his apostasy to hereditary monarchy and nobility, though we differ, we differ as friends should do. Beckley had the only copy of Paine's pamphlet [Rights of Man], and lent it to me, desiring when I should read it, that I would send it to a Mr. J. B. Smith, who had asked it for his brother to reprint it. Being an utter stranger to J. B. Smith, both by sight and character, I wrote a note to explain to him why I (a stranger to him) sent him a pamphlet, to wit, that Mr. Beckley had desired it; and to take off a little of the dryness of the note, I added that I was glad to find it was to be reprinted, that something would, at length, be publicly said against the political heresies which had lately sprung up among us, and that I did not doubt our citizens would rally again round the standard of "Common Sense." That I had in my view the "Discourses on Davila," which have filled Fenno's papers for a twelvemonth, without contradiction, is certain, but nothing was ever further from my thoughts than to become myself the contradictor before the public. To my great astonishment, however, when the pamphlet came out, the printer had prefixed my note to it, without having given me the most distant hint of it. Mr. Adams will unquestionably take to himself the charge of political heresy, as conscious of his own views of drawing the present government to the form of the English constitution, and, I fear, will consider me as meaning to injure him in the public eye. I learn that some Anglo-men have censured it in another point of view, as a sanction of Paine's principles tends to give offence to the British government. Their real fear, however, is that this popular and republican pamphlet, taking wonderfully, is likely at a single stroke, to wipe out all the unconstitutional doctrines which their bell-weather, "Davila," has been preaching for a twelvemonth. I certainly never made a secret of my being anti-monarchical, and anti-aristocratical; but I am sincerely mortified to be thus brought forward on the public stage, where to remain, to advance or to retire, will be equally against my love of silence and quiet, and my abhorrence of dispute.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 257. FORD ED., v, 329. (Pa., 1791.)

he desired me, as soon as I should have done so, to send it to Mr. Jonathan B. Smith, whose brother meant to reprint it. I finished reading it, and, as I had no acquaintance with Mr. Jonathan B. Smith, propriety required that I should explain to him why I, a stranger to him, sent him the pamphlet. I accordingly wrote a note of compliment, informing him that I did it at the desire of Mr. Beckley, and, to take off a little of the dryness of the note, I added that I was glad it was to be reprinted here, and that something was to be publicly said against the political heresies which had sprung up among us, &c. I thought so little of this note, that I did not even keep a copy of it; nor ever heard a tittle more of it, till, the week following, I was thunderstruck with seeing it come out at the head of the pamphlet.* I hoped, however, it would not attract notice. But I found, on my return from a journey of a month, that a writer came forward, under the signature of "Publicola," attacking not only the author and principles of the pamphlet, but myself as its sponsor, by name. Soon after came hosts of other writers, defending the pamphlet, and attacking you, by name, as the writer of "Publicola." Thus were our names thrown on the public stage as public antagonists. That you and I differ in our ideas of the best forms of government, is well known to us both; but we have differed as friends should do, respecting the purity of each other's motives, and confining our difference of opinion to private conversation. And I can declare with truth, in the presence of the Almighty, that nothing was further from my intention or expectation than to have either my own or your name brought before the public on this occasion. The friendship and confidence which have so long existed between us, required this explanation from me, and I know you too well to fear any misconstruction of the motives of it. Some people here who would wish me to be, or to be thought, guilty of improprieties, have suggested that I was "Agricola," that I was "Brutus," &c., &c. I never did in my life, either by myself or by any other, have a sentence of mine inserted in a newspaper without putting my name to it; and I believe I never shall.—To JOHN ADAMS. iii, 270. FORD ED., v, 353. (Pa., 1791.)

81. — — — I was happy to find that you saw in its true point of view the way in which I had been drawn into the scene, which must have been so disagreeable to you. The importance which you still seem to allow to my note, and the effect you suppose it to have had, though unintentional in me, induce me to show you that it really had no effect. Paine's pamphlet, with my note, was published here about the second week in May. Not a word ever appeared in the public papers here [Philadelphia] on the subject for more than a month: and I am certain not a word on the subject would ever have been said, had not a writer, under the name "Publicola" [John Quincy Adams] at length undertaken to attack Mr. Paine's principles, which were the principles of the citizens of the United States. Instantly a host of writers attacked "Publicola" in support of those principles. He had thought proper to misconstrue a figurative expression in my note; and these writers so far noticed me as to place the expression in its true light. But this was only an incidental skirmish preliminary to the general engagement, and they would not have thought me worth naming, had he not thought proper to have brought me on the scene. His antagonists, very criminally, in my opinion, presumed you to be "Publicola," and on that presumption hazarded a personal attack on you. No person saw with more uneasiness than I did, this unjustifiable assault; and the more so, when I saw it continued after the printer had declared you were not the author. But you will perceive from all this, my dear sir, that my note contributed nothing to the production of these disagreeable pieces. As long as Paine's pamphlet stood on its own feet and on my note, it was unnoticed. As soon as "Publicola" attacked Paine, swarms appeared in his defence. To "Publicola," then, and not in the least degree to my note, this whole contest is to be ascribed and all its consequences. You speak of the execrable paragraph in the Connecticut papers. This, it is true, appeared before "Publicola"; but it has no more relation to Paine's pamphlet and my note than to the Alcoran. I am satisfied the writer of it had never seen either; for when I passed through Connecticut about the middle of June, not a copy had ever been seen by anybody, either in Hartford or New Haven, nor probably in that whole State; and that paragraph was so notoriously the reverse of the disinterestedness of character which you are known to possess by everybody who knows your name, that I never heard a person speak of the paragraph, but with an indignation in your behalf, which did you entire justice. This paragraph, then, certainly did not flow from my note, any more than the publications which "Publicola" produced. Indeed it was impossible that my note should occasion your name to be brought into question; for so far from meaning you, I had not even in view any writing which I might suppose to be yours, and the opinions I alluded to were principally those I had heard in common conversation from a sect aiming at the subversion of the present government to bring in their favorite form of a king, lords and commons. Thus I hope, my dear sir, that you will see me to have been as innocent in effect as I was in intention. I was brought before the public without my own consent, and from the first moment of seeing the effort of the real aggressors, in this business to keep me before the public. I determined that nothing should induce me to put pen to paper in the controversy. The business is now over, and I hope its effects are over, and that our friendship will never be suffered to be committed, whatever use others may think proper to make of our names.—To JOHN ADAMS. iii, 291. FORD ED., v, 380. (Pa., Aug. 1791.)

* The note was as follows: "After some prefatory remarks, the Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson, in a note to a Printer in Philadelphia, accompanying a copy of this Pamphlet for republication observes: 'I am extremely pleased to find it will be reprinted here, and that something is at length to be publicly said against the political heresies which have sprung up among us. I have no doubt our citizens will rally a second time round the standard of Common Sense.'"—EDITOR.

82. ADAMS (John), Midnight Appointments of.—One act of Mr. Adams's life, and one only, ever gave me a moment's personal displeasure. I did consider his last appointments to office as personally unkind. They were from among my most ardent political enemies, from whom no faithful cooperation could ever be expected; and laid me under the embarrassment of acting through men whose views were to defeat mine, or to encounter the odium of putting others in their places. It seemed but common justice to leave a successor free to act by instruments of his own choice. If my respect for him did not permit me to ascribe the whole blame to the influence of others, it left something for friendship to forgive, and after brooding over it for some little time, and not always resisting the expression of it, I forgave it cordially, and returned to the same state of esteem and respect for him which had so long existed. * * * I maintain for him, and shall carry into private life, an uniform and high measure of respect and good will, and for yourself a sincere attachment.—To MRS. — ADAMS (John), Political Addresses of.—See 103, 105.

85. ADAMS (John), Political Principles of.—Mr. Adams had originally been a republican. The glare of royalty and nobility, during his mission to England, had made him believe their fascination a necessary ingredient in government; and Shays's rebellion, not sufficiently understood where he then was, seemed to prove that the absence of want and oppression, was not a sufficient guarantee of order. His book on the "American Constitutions" having made known his political bias, he was taken up by monarchical Federalists, in his absence, and on his return to the United States, he was by them made to believe that the general disposition of our citizens was favorable to monarchy. He then wrote his "Davila," as a supplement to the former work, and his election to the Presidency confirmed him in his errors. Innumerable addresses, too, artfully and industriously poured in upon him, deceived him into a confidence that he was on the pinnacle of popularity, when a gulf was yawning at his feet, which was to swallow up him and his deceivers. For, when General Washington was withdrawn, these energumens of royalism, kept in check hitherto by the dread of his honesty, his firmness, his patriotism, and the authority of his name, now mounted on the car of state and free from control, like Phæton on that of the sun, drove headlong and wild, looking neither to right nor left, nor regarding anything but the objects they were driving at; until, displaying these fully, the eyes of the nation were opened, and a general disbandment of them from the public councils took place. Mr. Adams, I am sure, has been long since convinced of the treacheries with which he was surrounded during his administration. He has since thoroughly seen that his constituents were devoted to republican government, and whether his judgment is resettled on its ancient basis, or not, he is conformed as a good citizen to the will of the majority, and would now, I am persuaded, maintain its republican structure with the zeal and fidelity belonging to his character. For even an enemy has said, "he is always an honest man, and often a great one." But in the fervor of the fever and follies of those who made him their stalking horse, no man who did not witness it, can form an idea of their unbridled madness, and the terrorism with which they surrounded themselves.—THE ANAS. ix, 97. 88. ADAMS (John), Proposed office for.—A little time and reflection effaced in my mind this temporary dissatisfaction [because of the midnight appointments, &c.] with Mr. Adams, and restored me to that just estimate of his virtues and passions, which a long acquaintance had enabled me to fix. And my first wish became that of making his retirement easy by any means in my power; for it was understood he was not rich. I suggested to some republican members of the delegation from his State, the giving him, either directly or indirectly, an office, the most lucrative in that State, and then offered to be resigned, if they thought he would not deem it affrontive. They were of opinion he would take great offence at the offer; and moreover, that the body of republicans would consider such a step in the outset as arguing very ill of the course I meant to pursue. I dropped the idea, therefore, but did not cease to wish for some opportunity of renewing our friendly understanding.—TO DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. v., 562. FORD ED., ix, 298. (M., Jan. 1811.)

89. ADAMS (John), Views on English Constitution.—While Mr. Adams was Vice-President, and I Secretary of State, I received a letter from President Washington, then at Mount Vernon, desiring me to call together the Heads of Departments, and to invite Mr. Adams to join us (which, by-the-by, was the only instance of that being done) in order to determine on some measure which required despatch; and he desired me to act on it, as decided, without again recurring to him. I invited them to dine with me, and after dinner, sitting at our wine, having settled our question, other conversation came on, in which a collision of opinion arose between Mr. Adams and Colonel Hamilton, on the merits of the British Constitution, Mr. Adams giving it as his opinion, that, if some of its defects and abuses were corrected, it would be the most perfect constitution of government ever devised by man. Hamilton, on the contrary, asserted, that with its existing vices, it was the most perfect model of government that could be formed; and that the correction of its vices would render it an impracticable government. And this you may be assured was the real line of difference between the political principles of these two gentlemen. Another incident took place on the same occasion, which will further delineate Mr. Hamilton's political principles. The room being hung around with a collection of the portraits of remarkable men, among them were those of Bacon, Newton and Locke. Hamilton asked me who they were. I told him they were my trinity of the three greatest men the world had ever produced, naming them. He paused for some time: "The greatest man," said he, "that ever lived, was Julius Cæsar." Mr. Adams was honest as a politician as well as a man; Hamilton honest as a man, but, as a politician, believing in the necessity of either force or corruption to govern men. TO DR. 99. ADAMS (Samuel), Patriarch of Liberty.—I addressed a letter to you, my very dear and ancient friend, on the 4th of March: not indeed to you by name, but through the medium of some of my fellow citizens, whom occasion called on me to address. In meditating the matter of that address, I often asked myself, is this exactly in the spirit of the patriarch of liberty, Samuel Adams? Is it as he would express it? Will he approve of it? I have felt a great deal for our country in the times we have seen. But, individually, for no one so much as yourself. When I have been told that you were avoided, insulted, frowned on, I could not but ejaculate, "Father, forgive them, for they know what they do." I confess I felt an indignation for you, which for myself I have been able, under every trial, to keep entirely passive. * * * How much I lament that time has deprived me of your aid. FORD ED., viii, 129. (1802.)

107. ADJOURNMENT, Congress and.—A bill having passed both houses of Congress, and being now before the President, declaring that the seat of the Federal Government shall be transferred to the Potomac in the year 1790, that the sessions of Congress next ensuing the present shall be held in Philadelphia, to which place the offices shall be transferred before the 1st of December next, a writer in a public paper of July 13, has urged on the consideration of the President, that the Constitution has given to the two houses of Congress the exclusive right to adjourn themselves; that the will of the President mixed with theirs in a decision of this kind, would be an inoperative ingredient, repugnant to the Constitution, and that he ought not to permit them to part, in a single instance, with their constitutional rights; consequently, that he ought to negative the bill. That is now to be considered.

Every man, and every body of men on earth, possesses the right of self-government. They receive it with their being from the hand of nature. Individuals exercise it by their single will; collections of men by that of their majority; for the law of the majority is the natural law of every society of men. When a certain description of men are to transact together a particular business, the times and places of their meeting and separating, depend on their own will; they make a part of the natural right of self-government. This, like all other natural rights, may be abridged or modified in its exercise by their own consent, or by the law of those who depute them, if they meet in the right of others; but as far as it is not abridged or modified, they retain it as a natural right, and may exercise it in what form they please, either exclusively by themselves, or in association with others, or by others altogether, as they shall agree.

Each house of Congress possesses this natural right of governing itself, and, consequently, of fixing its own times and places of meeting, so far as it has not been abridged by the law of those who employ them, that is to say, by the Constitution. This act manifestly considers them as possessing this right of course, and, therefore, has nowhere given it to them. In the several different passages where it touches this right, it treats it as an existing thing, not as one called into existence by them. To evince this, every passage of the Constitution shall be quoted, where the right of adjournment is touched; and it will be seen that no one of them pretends to give that right; that, on the contrary, every one is evidently introduced either to enlarge the right where it would be too narrow, to restrain it where, in its natural and full exercise, it might be too large, and lead to inconvenience, to defend it from the latitude of its own phrases, where these were not meant to comprehend it, or to provide for its exercise by others, when they cannot exercise it themselves.

"A majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members." Art. I. Sec. 5. A majority of every collection of men being naturally necessary to constitute its will, and it being frequently to happen that a majority is not assembled, it was necessary to enlarge the natural right by giving to "a smaller number than a majority" a right to compel the attendance of the absent members, and, in the meantime, to adjourn from day to day. This clause, then, does not pretend to give to a majority a right which it knew that majority would have of themselves, but to a number less than a majority, a right to which it knew that lesser number could not have of themselves.

"Neither house, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting." Ibid. Each house exercising separately its natural right to meet when and where it should think best, it might happen that the two houses would separate either in time or place, which would be inconvenient. It was necessary, therefore, to keep them together by restraining their natural right of deciding on separate times and places, and by requiring a concurrence of will.

But, as it might happen that obstinacy, or a difference of object, might prevent this concurrence, it goes on to take from them, in that instance, the right of adjournment altogether, and to transfer it to another, by declaring, Art. 2. Sec. 3, that "in case of disagreement between the two houses, with respect to the time of adjournment, the President may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper."

These clauses, then, do not import a gift, to the two houses, of a general right of adjournment, which it was known they would have without that gift, but to restrain or abrogate the right it was known they would have, in an instance where, exercised in its full extent, it might lead to inconvenience, and to give that right to another, who would not naturally have had it. It also gives to the President a right, which he otherwise would not have had, "to convene both houses,

* Jefferson added a P. S. suggesting that Adams may have been looking to the sedition bill that had been spoken of.—EDITOR or either of them, on extraordinary occasions." Thus substituting the will of another, where they are not in a situation to exercise their own.

"Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment), shall be presented to the President for his approbation, &c., Art. I. Sec. 7. The latitude of the general words here used would have subjected the natural right of adjournment of the two houses to the will of the President, which was not intended. They, therefore, expressly "except questions of adjournment" out of their operation. They do not here give a right of adjournment, which it was known would exist without their gift, but they defend the existing right against the latitude of their own phrases, in a case where there was no good reason to abridge it. The exception admits they will have the right of adjournment, without pointing out the source from which they will derive it.

These are all the passages of the Constitution (one only excepted, which shall be presently cited,) where the right of adjournment is touched; and it is evident that none of these are introduced to give that right; but every one supposes it to be existing, and provides some specific modification for cases where either defeat in the natural right, or a too full use of it, would occasion inconvenience.

The right of adjournment, then, is not given by the Constitution, and consequently it may be modified by law without interfering with that instrument. It is a natural right, and, like all other natural rights, may be abridged or regulated in its exercise by law and the concurrence of the third branch in any law regulating its exercise is so efficient an ingredient in that law, that the right cannot be otherwise exercised but after a repeal by a new law. The express terms of the Constitution itself show that this right may be modified by law, when, in Art. I. Sec. 4. (the only remaining passage on the subject not yet quoted) it says, "The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be the first Monday in December, unless they shall, by law, appoint a different day." Then another day may be appointed by law; and the President's assent is an efficient ingredient in that law. Nay, further, they cannot adjourn over the first Monday of December but by a law. This is another constitutional abridgment of their natural right of adjournment; and completing our review of all the clauses in the Constitution which touch that right, authorizes us to say no part of that instrument gives it; and that the houses hold it, not from the Constitution, but from nature.

A consequence of this is, that the houses may, by a joint resolution, remove themselves from place to place, because it is a part of their right of self-government; but that as the right of self-government does not comprehend the government of others, the two houses cannot, by a joint resolution of their majorities only, remove the Executive and Judiciary from place to place. These branches possessing, also, the rights of self-government from nature, cannot be controlled in the exercise of them but by a law, passed in the forms of the Constitution. The clause of the bill in question, therefore, was necessary to be put into the form of a law, and to be submitted to the President, so far as it proposes to effect the removal of the Executive and Judiciary to Philadelphia. So far as respects the removal of the present houses of legislation thither, it was not necessary to be submitted to the President; but such a submission is not repugnant to the Constitution. On the contrary, if he concurs, it will so far fix the next session of Congress at Philadelphia that it cannot be changed but by a regular law.

The sense of Congress itself is always respectable authority. It has been given very remarkably on the present subject. The address to the President in the paper of the 13th, is a complete digest of all the arguments urged on the floor of the Representatives against the constitutionality of the bill now before the President; and they were overruled by a majority of that house, comprehending the delegation of all the States south of the Hudson, except South Carolina. At the last session of Congress, when the bill for remaining a certain term at New York, and then removing to Susquehanna, or Germantown, was objected to on the same ground, the objection was overruled by a majority comprehending the delegations of the northern half of the Union with that of South Carolina. So that the sense of every State in the Union has been expressed, by its delegation, against this objection, South Carolina excepted, and excepting also Rhode Island, which has never yet had a delegation in place to vote on the question. In both these instances, the Senate concurred with the majority of the Representatives. The sense of the two houses is stronger authority in this case, as it is given against their own supposed privilege.

It would be as tedious, as it is unnecessary, to take up and discuss one by one, the objects proposed in the paper of July 13. Every one of them is founded on the supposition that the two houses hold their right of adjournment from the Constitution. This error being corrected, the objections founded on it fall of themselves.

It would also be work of mere supererogation to show that, granting what this writer takes for granted, (that the President's assent would be an inoperative ingredient, because excluded by the Constitution, as he says,) yet the particular views of the writer would be frustrated, for on every hypothesis of what the President may do, Congress must go to Philadelphia. 1. If he assents to the bill, that assent makes good law of the part relative to the Potomac; and the part for holding the next session at Philadelphia is good, either as an ordinance, or a vote of the two houses, containing a complete declaration of their will in a case where it is competent to the object; so that they must go to Philadelphia in that case. 2. If he dissents from the bill, it annuls the part relative to the Potomac; but as to the clause for adjourning to Philadelphia, his dissent being as inefficient as his assent, it remains a good ordinance, or vote, of the two houses for going thither, and consequently they must go in this case also. 3. If the President withholds his will out of the bill altogether, by a ten day's silence, then the part relative to the Potomac becomes a good law without his will, and that relative to Philadelphia is good also, either as a law, or an ordinance, or a vote of the two houses; and consequently in this case also they go to Philadelphia.—OPINION ON RESIDENCE BILL. vii, 495. FORD ED., v, 205. (July 1790.)

116. ADMINISTRATION, Difficult.—Our situation is difficult; and whatever we do is liable to the criticism of those who wish to represent it awry. If we recommend measures in a public message, it may be said that members are not sent here to obey the mandates of the President, or to register the edicts of a sovereign. If we express opinions in conversation, we have then our Charles Jenkinsons, and back-door counsellors. If we say nothing, "we have no opinions, no plans, no cabinet." law.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 162. FORD ED., ix, 96. (M., 1807.) See ERROR.

121. ADMINISTRATION, Foreign Policy.—In the transaction of your foreign affairs, we have endeavored to cultivate the friendship of all nations, and especially of those with which we have the most important relations. We have done them justice on all occasions, favored where favor was lawful, and cherished mutual interests and intercourse on fair and equal terms. We are firmly convinced, and we act on that conviction, that with nations, as with individuals, our interests soundly calculated, will ever be found inseparable from our moral duties; and history bears witness to the fact, that a just nation is taken on its word, when recourse is had to armaments and wars to bridle others.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 40. FORD ED., viii, 343. (1805.)

122. ADMINISTRATION, Formalities and.—The necessity of these abridgments of formalities in our present distant situations requires that I should particularly suggest to you the expediency of desiring General Knox to communicate to the foreign ministers himself directly any matters relative to the interpositions of his department through the governors. For him to send these to me from Boston to this place [Monticello] merely that I may send them back to the ministers at Philadelphia or New York, might be an injurious delay of business.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 435. (M., Oct. 1793.) See FORMALITIES.

123. ADMINISTRATION, Fundamental Principles.—To cultivate peace and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises; to foster our fisheries and nurseries of navigation and for the nurture of man, and protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances; to preserve the faith of the nation by an exact discharge of its debts and contracts, expending the public money with the same care and economy we would practice with our own, and impose on our citizens no unnecessary burden; to keep in all things within the pale of our constitutional powers, and cherish the Federal Union as the only rock of our safety—these are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings. By continuing to make these our rule of action, we shall endeavor to our countrymen the true principles of their Constitution, and promote a union of sentiment and of action equally auspicious to their happiness and safety.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 21. FORD ED., viii, 186. (1802.) See INAUGURAL ADDRESSES, APPENDIX.

124. — — —. Our wish is * * * that the public efforts may be directed honestly to the public good, that peace be cultivated, civil and religious liberty unassailed, law and order preserved, equality of rights maintained, and that state of property, equal or unequal, which results to every man from his own industry or that of his fathers.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 44. FORD ED., viii, 347. (1805.)

125. — — —. That all should be satisfied with any one order of things is not to be expected, but I indulge the pleasing persuasion that the great body of our citizens will concur in honest and disinterested efforts, which have for their object to preserve the General and State governments in their constitutional form and equilibrium; to maintain peace abroad and order and obedience to the laws at home; to establish principles and practices of administration favorable to the security of liberty and prosperity, and to reduce expenses to what is necessary for the useful purposes of government.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 15. FORD ED., viii, 125. (Dec. 1801.)

126. — — —. Believing that (excepting the ardent monarchists) all our citizens agreed in ancient whig principles, I thought it advisable to define and declare them, and let them see the ground on which we could rally. And the fact proving to be so, that they agree in these principles, I shall pursue them with more encouragement.—To GENERAL HENRY KNOX. iv, 386. FORD ED., viii, 36. (W., March 1801.)

127. ADMINISTRATION, Good Republican.—A good administration in a republican government, securing to us our dearest rights, and the practical enjoyment of all our liberties, can never fail to give consolation to the friends of free government, and mortification to its enemies.—R. to A. RHODE ISLAND REPUBLICANS. viii, 162. (1809.)

128. ADMINISTRATION, Harmonious.—That there is only one minister who is not opposed to me, is totally unfounded. There never was a more harmonious, a more cordial administration, nor ever a moment when it has been otherwise. And while differences of opinion have been always rare among us, I can affirm, that as to present matters, there was not a single paragraph in my message to Congress, or those supplementary to it, in which there was not a unanimity of concurrence in the members of the administration.—To WILLIAM DUANE. iv, 591. FORD ED., viii, 432. (W., March 1806.)

129. ADMINISTRATION, Hesitancy and.—On every question the lawyers are about equally divided, and were we to act but in cases where no contrary opinion of a lawyer can be had, we should never act.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 369. (M., 1808.)

130. ADMINISTRATION, Honest.—The measures of my administration * * * have been pursued with honest intentions, unbiassed by any personal or interested views.—R. to A. WILMINGTON CITIZENS. viii, 149. (1809.)

131. ADMINISTRATION, Indebted.—I do not mean, fellow citizens, to arrogate to myself the merit of the measures [of the administration]; that is due, in the first place, to the reflecting character of our citizens at large, who, by the weight of public opinion, influence and strengthen the public measures; it is due to the sound discretion with which they select from among themselves those to whom they confide the legislative duties; it is due to the zeal and wisdom of the characters selected, who lay the foundations of public happiness in wholesome laws, the execution of which alone remains for others; and it is due to the able and faithful auxiliaries, whose patriotism has associated with me in the executive functions.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 43. FORD ED., viii, 345. (1805.)

132. ADMINISTRATION, Indulgence to.—There are no mysteries in the public administration. Difficulties indeed sometimes arise; but common sense and honest intentions will generally steer through them, and, where they cannot be surmounted, I have ever seen the well-intentioned part of our fellow citizens sufficiently disposed not to look for impossibilities.—To DR. J. B. STUART. vii, 64. (M., 1817.)

133. ———. A consciousness that I feel no desire but to do what is best, without passion or predilection, encourages me to hope for an indulgent construction of what I do.—To JOHN PAGE. iv, 377. (W., 1801.)

— ADMINISTRATION, Madison's.—See MADISON.

134. ADMINISTRATION, Meritorious.—I wish support from no quarter longer than my object, candidly scanned shall merit it; and especially, not longer than I shall vigorously adhere to the Constitution.—To BENJAMIN STODDERT. iv, 360. FORD ED., vii, 499. (W., Feb. 1801.)

135. ADMINISTRATION, Moderate.—I am very much in hopes we shall be able to restore union to our country. Not, indeed, that the federal leaders can be brought over. They are invincibles; but I really hope their followers may. The bulk of these last were real republicans, carried over from us by French excesses. This induced me to offer a political creed [in the inauguration address], and to invite to conciliation first; and I am pleased to hear, that these principles are recognized by them, and considered as no bar of separation. A moderate conduct throughout which may not revolt our new friends, and which may give them tenets with us, must be observed.—To JOHN PAGE. iv, 378. (W., March 1801.)

136. ADMINISTRATION, Public Opinion and.—It will always be interesting to me to know the impression made by any particular thing on the public mind. My idea is that where two measures are equally right, it is a duty to the people to adopt that one which is most agreeable to them; and where a measure not agreeable to them has been adopted, it is desirable to know it, because it is an admonition to a review of that measure to see if it has been really right, and to correct it if mistaken.—To WILLIAM FINDLEY. FORD ED., viii, 27. (W., March 1801.)

137. ADMINISTRATION, Reasonable.—Unequivocal in principle, reasonable in manner, we shall be able, I hope, to do a great deal of good to the cause of freedom and harmony.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 392. FORD ED., viii, 43. (W., March 1801.)

138. ADMINISTRATION, Responsibility and.—We can only be answerable for the orders we give and not for the execution. If they are disobeyed from obstinacy of spirit, or want of coercion in the laws, it is not our fault.—To GENERAL STEUBEN. FORD ED., ii, 492. (R., 1781.)

139. ADMINISTRATION, Routine.—The ordinary affairs of a nation offer little difficulty to a person of any experience.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. v, 252. (W., 1808.)

140. ADMINISTRATION, Salutary.—I am sure the measures I mean to pursue are such as would in their nature be approved by every American who can emerge from preconceived prejudices; as for those who cannot, we must take care of them as of the sick in our hospitals. The medicine of time and fact may cure some of them.—To THEODORE FOSTER. FORD ED., viii, 50. (W., May 1801.)

141. ADMINISTRATION, Secrecy in.—The same secrecy and mystery are affected to be observed by the present, which marked the former administration.—To AARON BURR. iv, 185. FORD ED., vii, 147. (Pa., June 1797.)

142. ADMINISTRATION, Slipshod.—The administration [of Mr. Adams] had no rule for anything.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iv, 413. FORD ED., viii, 96. (W., 1801.)

143. ADMINISTRATION, Successors in.—I have thought it right to take no part myself in proposing measures, the execution of which will devolve on my successor.—To DR. LOGAN. v, 404. (W., Dec. 1808.)

144. ———. I should not feel justified in directing measures which those who are to execute them would disapprove.—To LEVI LINCOLN. v, 387. FORD ED., ix, 227. (W., Nov. 1808.)

145. ———. I am now so near the moment of retiring, that I take no part in affairs beyond the expression of an opinion. I think it fair that my successor should now originate those measures of which he will be charged with the execution and responsibility, and that it is my duty to clothe them with the forms of authority.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 420. FORD ED., ix, 243. (W., Jan. 1809.)

146. ———. I hope that my successor will enter on a calmer sea than I did. He will at least find the vessel of State in the hands of his friends, and not of his foes.—To RICHARD M. JOHNSON. v, 257. (W., 1808.)

147. ADMINISTRATION, Summary of Jefferson's first.—To do without a land tax, excise, stamp tax and the other internal taxes, to supply their place by economies, so as still to support the government properly, and to apply $7,300,000 a year steadily to the payment of the public debt; to discontinue a great portion of the expenses on armies and navies, yet protect our country and its commerce with what remains; to purchase a country as large and more fertile than the one we possessed before, yet ask neither a new tax, nor another soldier to be added, but to provide that that country shall by its own income, pay for itself before the purchase money is due; to preserve peace with all nations, and particularly an equal friendship to the two great rival powers, France and England, and to maintain the credit and character of the nation in as high a degree as it has ever enjoyed, are measures which I think must reconcile the great body of those who thought themselves our enemies; but were in truth only the enemies of certain Jacobinical, atheistical, anarchical, imaginary caricatures, which existed only in the land of the raw head and bloody bones, beings created to frighten the credulous. By this time they see enough of us to judge our characters by what we do, and not by what we never did, nor thought of doing, but in the lying chronicles of the newspapers.—To TIMOTHY BLOODWORTH. iv, 523. (W., Jan. 1804.)

148. ADMINISTRATION, Temporizing.—Mild laws, a people not used to prompt obedience, a want of provisions of war, and means of procuring them render our orders often ineffectual, oblige us to temporize, and when we cannot accomplish an object in one way to attempt it in another. Your knowledge of these circumstances, with a temper to accommodate them, ensure me your co-operation in the best way we can, when we shall not be able to pursue the way we would wish.—To MAJOR GENERAL DE LAFAYETTE. FORD ED., ii, 493. (R., March 1781.)

149. ADMINISTRATION, Tranquil.—The path we have to pursue is so quiet that we have nothing scarcely to propose to our Legislature. A noiseless course, not meddling with the affairs of others, unattractive of notice, is a mark that society is going on in happiness.—To THOMAS COOPER. iv, 453. FORD ED., viii, 178. (W., Nov. 1802.)

150. ADMINISTRATION, Unmeddling.—The quiet track into which we are endeavoring to get, neither meddling with the affairs of other nations, nor with those of our fellow citizens, but letting them go on in their own way, will show itself in the statement of our affairs to Congress.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. FORD ED., viii, 180. (W., Dec. 1802.)

151. ADMINISTRATION, Unsuccessful.—Two measures have not been adopted, which I pressed on Congress repeatedly at their meetings. The one, to settle the whole ungranted territory of Orleans, by donations of land to able-bodied young men, to be engaged and carried there at the public expense, who would constitute a force always ready on the spot to defend New Orleans. The other was to class the militia according to the years of their birth, and make all those from twenty to twenty-five liable to be trained and called into service at a moment's warning. This would have given us a force of three hundred thousand young men, prepared by proper training, for service in any part of the United States; while those who had passed through that period would remain at home, liable to be used in their own or adjacent States. Those two measures would have completed what I deemed necessary for the entire security of our country. They would have given me, on my retirement from the government of the nation, the consolatory reflection, that having found, when I was called to it, not a single seaport town in a condition to repel a levy of contribution by a single privateer or pirate, I had left every harbor so prepared by works and gunboats, as to be in a reasonable state of security against any probable attack; the territory of Orleans acquired, and planted with an internal force sufficient for its protection; and the whole territory of the United States organized by such a classification of its male force, as would give it the benefit of all its young population for active service, and that of a middle and advanced age for stationary defence. But these measures will, I hope, be completed by my successor.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. v, 507. (M., Feb. 1810.)

— ADMINISTRATION, Washington's.
—See WASHINGTON.

152. ADMINISTRATION, British.—In general the [British] administrations are so changeable, and they are obliged to descend to such tricks to keep themselves in place, that nothing like honor or morality can ever be counted on in transactions with them.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 465. (M., Aug. 1809.)

153. ADMINISTRATIONS, Ill-tempered.—We have received a report that the French Directory has proposed a declaration of war against the United States to the Council of Ancients, who have rejected it. Thus we see two nations, who love one another affectionately, brought by the ill temper of their executive administrations, to the very brink of necessity to imbrue their hands in the blood of each other.—To AARON BURR. iv, 187. FORD ED., vii, 148. (Pa., June 1797.)

154. ADMIRALTY COURTS, Decisions of British.—I thank you for the case of Demsey vs. the Insurers, which I have read with great pleasure, and entire conviction. Indeed it is high time to withdraw all respect from courts acting under the arbitrary orders of governments who avow a total disregard of those moral rules which have hitherto been acknowledged by nations, and have served to regulate and govern their intercourse. I should respect just as much the rules of conduct which governed Cartouche or Blackbeard, as those now acted on by France or England. If your argument is defective in anything, it is in having paid to the antecedent decisions of the British Courts of Admiralty the respect of examining them on grounds of reason; and not having rested the decision at once on the profligacy of those tribunals, and openly declared against permitting their sentences to be ever more quoted or listened to until those nations return to the practice of justice, to an acknowledgment that there is a moral law which ought to govern mankind, and by sufficient evidences of contrition for their present flagitiousness, make it safe to receive them, again into the society of civilized nations. I hope this will be done on a proper occasion. Yet knowing that religion does not furnish grosser bigots than law, I expect little from old judges. Those now at the bar may be bold enough to follow reason rather than precedent, and may bring that principle on the bench when promoted to it; but I fear this effort is not for my day. It has been said that when Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood, there was not a physician of Europe of forty years of age, who assented to it. I fear you will experience Harvey's fate; but it will become law when the present judges are dead.—To THOMAS COOPER. v, 531. (M., 1810.)

155. ADMIRALTY COURTS, Jurisdiction.—They [Parliament] have extended the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty beyond their ancient limits.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 468. (July 1775.)

— ADMISSION OF NEW STATES.—See STATES.

156. ADVERTISEMENTS, Appreciated.—I read but one newspaper and that * * * more for its advertisements than its news.—To CHARLES PINCKNEY. vii, 180. FORD ED., x, 162. (M., 1820.)

157. ADVERTISEMENTS, Principle and.—I think it might be well to advertise my lands at Elkhill for sale, and therefore enclose you the form of an advertisement, in which, you will observe, I have omitted the name of the proprietor, which, as long as I am in public, I would wish to keep out of view in everything of a private nature.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. FORD ED., v, 281. (Pa., 1791.)

158. ADVERTISEMENTS, Truth and.—Advertisements contain the only truths to be relied on in a newspaper.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 111. FORD ED., x, 120. (M., 1819.)

159. ADVICE, A Duty.—Duty tells me that the public interest is so deeply concerned in your perfect knowledge of the characters employed in its high stations, that nothing should be withheld which can give you useful information.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 101. (M., 1813.)

160. ADVICE, Friendship in.—No apologies for writing or speaking to me freely are necessary. On the contrary, nothing my friends can do is so dear to me, and proves to me their friendship so clearly, as the information they give me of their sentiments and those of others on interesting points where I am to act, and where information and warning are so essential to excite in me that due reflection which ought to precede action.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 507. FORD ED., viii, 248. (M., 1803.)

161. — — — I always consider it as the most friendly service which can be rendered me, to be informed of anything which is going amiss, and which I can remedy.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. v, 400. (W., 1808.)

162. ADVICE, A Legacy of.—Your affectionate mother requests that I would address to you, as a namesake, something which might have a favorable influence on the course of life you have to run. Few words are necessary, with good dispositions on your part. Adore God; reverence and cherish your parents; love your neighbor as yourself, and your country more than life. Be just; be true; murmur not at the ways of Providence—and the life into which you may have entered will be one of eternal and ineffable bliss. And if to the dead it is permitted to care for the things of this world, every action of your life will be under my regard. Farewell.—To THOMAS JEFFERSON GROTJAN. FORD ED., x, 287. (M., 1824.)

163. ADVICE, Proffering.—How easily we prescribe for others a cure for their difficulties, while we cannot cure our own.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 201. FORD ED., x, 187. (M., 1821.)

164. ADVICE, Ten Precepts of.—A Decalogue of Canons for Observation in Practical Life:—

1. Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day.
2. Never trouble another for what you can do yourself.
3. Never spend your money before you have it.
4. Never buy what you do not want, because it is cheap; it will be dear to you.
5. Pride costs us more than hunger, thirst and cold.
6. We never repent of having eaten too little.
7. Nothing is troublesome that we do willingly.
8. How much pain have cost us the evils which have never happened.
9. Take things always by their smooth handle.
10. When angry, count ten, before you speak: if very angry, an hundred.—To THOMAS JEFFERSON SMITH. vii, 401. FORD ED., x, 341. (M., 1825.)

165. ADVICE, Thankful for.—I am ever thankful for communications which may guide me in the duties which I wish to perform as well as I am able.—To JOHN DICKINSON. v, 29. FORD ED., ix, 8. (W., 1807.)

166. — — — I have always received with thankfulness the ideas of judicious persons on subjects interesting to the public.—To BENJAMIN STODDERT. v, 426. FORD ED., ix, 246. (W., 1809.)

167. — — — In all cases I invite and shall receive with great thankfulness your opinion and that of others on the course of things, and particularly in the suggestion of characters who may worthily be appointed.—To PIERREPONT EDWARDS. FORD ED., viii, 45. (W., March 1801.)

168. ——. Far from arrogating the office of advice, no one will more passively acquiesce in it than myself.—To JOHN H. PLEASANTS. vii, 346. FORD ED., x, 304. (M., 1824.)

169. ADVICE, Valued.—I value no act of friendship so highly as the communicating facts to me, which I am not in the way of knowing otherwise, and could not therefore otherwise guard against.—To W. C. NICHOLAS. v, 260. (W., 1808.)

170. ——. It is impossible for my friends ever to render me so acceptable a favor, as by communicating to me, without reserve, facts and opinions. I have none of that sort of self-love which winces at it; indeed, both self-love and the desire to do what is best strongly invite unreserved communication.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. v, 48. FORD ED., ix, 32. (W., 1807.)

171. ADVICE, Unbiased.—The greatest favor which can be done me is the communication of the opinions of judicious men, of men who do not suffer their judgments to be biased by either interests or passions.—To CHANDLER PRICE. v, 46. (W., 1807.)

— AERONAUTICS.—See BALLOONS.

172. AFFECTION, Early.—I find as I grow older, that I love those most whom I loved first.—To MRS. JOHN BOLLING. FORD ED., iv, 412. (P., 1787.)

173. AFFECTION, Of friendship.—The happiest moments my heart knows are those in which it is pouring forth its affections to a few esteemed characters.—To MRS. TRIST. FORD ED., iv, 331. (P., 1786.) See FRIENDSHIP.

174. AFFECTION, Parental.—Is not parental love the strongest affection known? Is it not greater than that of self-preservation?—NOTE i, 149. FORD ED., ii, 206. (1778.)

175. ——. Although parental be yet stronger than filial affection. * * * NOTE i, 150. FORD ED., ii, 207. (1778.)

176. AFFECTION, Patriotic.—My affections are first for my own country, and then, generally, for all mankind.—To THOMAS LAW. v, 556. FORD ED., ix, 293. (M., 1811.)

177. AFFECTION, Rewarded by.—The affection of my countrymen * * * was the only reward I ever asked or could have felt.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 318. FORD ED., iii, 57. (M., 1782.) See FAMILY, HOME.

178. AFFLICTION, Consolation in.—Tried myself in the school of affliction, by the loss of every form of connection which can rive the human heart, I know well, and feel what you have lost, what you have suffered, are suffering, and have yet to endure. The same trials have taught me that for ills so immeasurable, time and silence are the only medicine. I will not, therefore, by useless condolences, open afresh the sluices of your grief, nor, although mingling sincerely my tears with yours, will I say a word more where words are vain.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 107. FORD ED., x, 114. (M., 1818.)

179. AFFLICTION, Schooled in.—There is no degree of affliction, produced by the loss of those dear to us, which experience has not taught me to estimate. I have ever found time and silence the only medicine, and these but assuage, they never can suppress, the deep drawn sigh which recollection forever brings up, until recollection and life are extinguished together.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 221. (M., 1813.)

180. AFFLICTION, Sympathy in.—Long tried in the same school of affliction, no loss which can rend the human heart is unknown to mine; and a like one particularly, at about the same period in life, had taught me to feel the sympathies of yours. The same experience has proved that time, silence and occupation are its only medicines.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 520. (M., 1810.)

— AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.—See SLAVERY.

181. AGE, Advancing.—Being very sensible of bodily decays from advancing years, I ought not to doubt their effect on the mental faculties. To do so would evince either great self-love or little observation of what passes under our eyes; and I shall be fortunate if I am the first to perceive and to obey this admonition of nature.—To MR. WEAVER. v, 88. (W., June 1807.)

182. AGE, Change and.—I am now of an age which does not easily accommodate itself to new manners and new modes of living.—To BARON GEISMER. i, 427. (P., 1785.)

183. AGE, Deformity in.—Man, like the fruit he eats, has his period of ripeness. Like that, too, if he continues longer hanging to the stem, it is but an useless and unsightly appendage.—To HENRY DEARBORN. vii, 214. FORD ED., x, 191. (M., 1821.)

184. AGE, Desire in.—Tranquillity is the summum bonum of old age.—To MARK L. HILL. vii, 154. (M., 1820.)

185. AGE, Dread of old.—I have ever dreaded a doting old age; and my health has been generally so good, and is now so good, that I dread it still. The rapid decline of my strength during the last winter has made me hope sometimes that I see land. During the summer I enjoy its temperature, but I shudder at the approach of winter, and wish I could sleep through it with the dormouse, and only wake with him in the spring, if ever.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 244. FORD ED., x, 216. (M., 1822.)

186. AGE, Duty in old.—Nothing is more incumbent on the old, than to know when they should get out of the way, and relinquish to younger successors the honors they can no longer earn, and the duties they can no longer perform.—To JOHN VAUGHAN. vi, 417. (M., 1815.)

187. ——. I resign myself cheerfully to the managers of the ship, and the more contentedly, as I am near the end of my voyage.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 342. FORD ED., x, 300. (M., 1824.)

188. AGE, Evils of protracted.—The solitude in which we are left by the death of our friends is one of the great evils of protracted life. When I look back to the days of my youth, it is like looking over a field of battle. All, all dead! and ourselves left alone midst a new generation whom we know not, and who know not us.—To FRANCIS A. VAN DER KEMP. FORD ED., x, 337. (M., 1825.)

189. AGE, Fear of old.—My only fear is that I may live too long. This would be a subject of dread to me.—To PHILIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., viii, 15. (M., March 1801.)

190. AGE, Insensible to.—It is wonderful to me that old men should not be sensible that their minds keep pace with their bodies in the progress of decay. Our old revolutionary friend Clinton, for example, who was a hero, but never a man of mind, is wonderfully jealous on this head. He tells eternally the stories of his younger days to prove his memory, as if memory and reason were the same faculty. Nothing betrays imbecility so much as the being insensible of it. Had not a conviction of the danger to which an unlimited occupation, of the Executive chair would expose the republican constitution of our government, made it conscientiously a duty to refuse when I did, the fear of becoming a dotard, and of being insensible of it, would of itself have resisted all solicitations to remain.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. vi, 3. FORD ED., ix, 328. (P.F., 1816.)

191. AGE, Offerings of.—Good wishes are all an old man has to offer to his country or friends.—To THOMAS LAW. v, 557. FORD ED., ix, 293. (M., 1811.)

192. AGE, Oppressed by.—The hand of age is upon me. All my old friends are nearly gone. Of those in my neighborhood, Mr. Divers and Mr. Lindsay alone remain. If you could make it a partie quarrelée, it would be a comfort indeed. We would beguile our lingering hours with talking over our youthful exploits, our hunts on Peter's mountain, with a long train of et cetera, in addition, and feel, by recollection at least, a momentary flash of youth. Reviewing the course of a long and sufficiently successful life, I find in no portion of it happier moments than those were.—To JAMES MAURY. vi, 54. FORD ED., ix, 351. (M., 1812.)

193. — — — The hand of age is upon me. The decay of bodily faculties apprizes me that those of the mind cannot be unimpaired, had I not still better proofs. Every year counts my increased debility, and departing faculties keep the score. The last year it was the sight, this it is the hearing, the next something else will be going, until all is gone. Of all this I was sensible before I left Washington, and probably my fellow laborers saw it before I did. The decay of memory was obvious; it is now become distressing. But the mind, too, is weakened. When I was young, mathematics was the passion of my life. The same passion has returned upon me, but with unequal powers. Processes which I then read off with the facility of common discourse, now cost me labor, and time, and slow investigation. When I offered this, therefore, as one of the reasons deciding my retirement from office, it was offered in sincerity and a consciousness of truth. And I think it a great blessing that I retain understanding enough to be sensible how much of it I have lost, and to avoid exposing myself as a spectacle for the pity of my friends; that I have surmounted the difficult point of knowing when to retire. As a compensation for faculties departed, nature gives me good health, and a perfect resignation to the laws of decay which she has prescribed to all the forms and combinations of matter.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 80. FORD ED., ix, 367. (M., Oct. 1812.)

194. — — — The epistolary industry * * * is gone from me. The aversion has been growing on me for a considerable time, and now, near the close of seventy-five, is become almost insuperable. I am much debilitated in body, and my memory sensibly on the wane. Still, however, I enjoy good health and spirits, and am as industrious a reader as when a student at college. Not of newspapers. These I have discarded. I relinquish, as I ought to do, all intermeddling with public affairs, committing myself cheerfully to the watch and care of those for whom, in my turn, I have watched and cared.—To BENJAMIN WATERHOUSE. vii, 100. FORD ED., x, 103. (M., 1818.)

195. AGE, Vigor in.—It is objected * * * that Mr. Goodrich is seventy-seven years of age; but at a much more advanced age, our Franklin was the ornament of human nature.—To THE NEW HAVEN COMMITTEE. iv, 403. FORD ED., viii, 68. (W., 1801.)

196. AGE, Warned by.—Time, which wears all things, does not spare the energies of body and mind of a presque octogenaire. While I could, I did what I could, and now acquiesce cheerfully in the law of nature which, by unfitting us for action, warns us to retire and leave to the generation of the day the direction of its own affairs. The prayers of an old man are the only contributions left in his power. To MRS. K. D. MORGAN. FORD ED., viii, 473. (M., 1822.)

197. — — — A decline of health at the age of 76, was naturally to be expected, and is a warning of an event which cannot be distant, and whose approach I contemplate with little concern; for indeed, in no circumstance has nature been kinder to us, than in the soft gradations by which she prepares us to part willingly with what we are not destined always to retain. First one faculty is withdrawn and then another, sight, hearing, memory, affection and friends, filched one by one, till we are left among strangers, the mere monuments of times, facts, and specimens of antiquity for the observation of the curious.—To MR. SPAFFORD. vii, 118. (M., 1819.)

198. AGE, Yielding to.—I am not the champion called for by our present dangers. "Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis, tempus eget." A waning body, a waning mind, and waning memory, with habitual ill health warn me to withdraw and relinquish the arena to younger and abler athletes. I am sensible myself, if others are not, that this is my duty. If my distant friends know it not, those around me can inform them that they should not, in friendship, wish to call me into conflicts, exposing only the decays which nature has inscribed among her unalterable laws, and injuring the common cause by a senile and puny defence.—To C. W. GLOUCH. vii, 430. (M., 1826.) See LIFE.

199. AGGRESSION, Condemned.—We did not invade their [the British peoples'] island, carrying death or slavery to its inhabitants.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 475. (July 1775.)

200. AGGRESSION, Encouraging.—It is to be lamented that any of our citizens, not thinking with the mass of the nation as to the principles of our government, or of its administration, and seeing all its proceedings with a prejudiced eye, should so misconceive and misrepresent our situation as to encourage aggressions from foreign nations. Our expectation is, that their distempered views will be understood by others as they are by ourselves; but should wars be the consequence of these delusions, and the errors of our dissatisfied citizens find atonement only in the blood of their sounder brethren, we must meet it as an evil necessarily flowing from that liberty of speaking and writing which guards our other liberties.—R. TO PHILADELPHIA DEMOCRATIC REPUBLICANS. viii, 128. (May 1808.)

— AGGRESSION, Equal Rights and.—See RIGHTS.

201. AGGRESSION, Maritime.—The ocean, which, like the air, is the common birthright of mankind, is arbitrarily wrested from us, and maxims, consecrated by time, by usage, and by an universal sense of right, are trampled on by superior force.—R. TO A. N. Y. TAMMANY SOCIETY. viii, 127. (1808.) See OCEAN.

202. AGGRESSION, Military.—We did not embody a soldiery to commit aggression on them [the British people].—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 475. (July 1775.)

203. AGGRESSION, Prohibited.—We will not permit aggressions to be committed on our part, against which we remonstrated to Spain on her part.—To ROBERT SMITH. v, 368. (M., Sep. 1808.)

204. AGGRESSION, Punishment for.—

The interests of a nation, when well understood, will be found to coincide with their moral duties. Among these it is an important one to cultivate habits of peace and friendship with our neighbors. To do this we should make provisions for rendering the justice we must sometimes require from them. I recommend, therefore, to your consideration whether the laws of the Union should not be extended to restrain our citizens from committing acts of violence within the territories of other nations, which would be punished were they committed within our own.*—PARAGRAPHS FOR PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE. FORD ED., vi, 119. (1792.) See FILIBUSTERS.

205. AGITATION, Necessity for.—In peace as well as in war, the mind must be kept in motion.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 325. FORD ED., x, 280. (M., 1823.)

206. AGITATION, Submission.—The force of public opinion cannot be resisted, when permitted freely to be expressed. The agitation it produces must be submitted to. It is necessary to keep the waters pure.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE vii, 325. FORD ED., x, 280. (M., 1823.)

207. AGRARIANISM, Laws of.—The tax on importations * * * falls exclusively on the rich, and with the equal partition of intestates' estates constitutes the best agrarian law.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 584. FORD ED., ix, 321. (M., 1811.) See ENTAILS, PRIMOGENITURE, MONOPOLY.

208. AGRICULTURE, Art of.—The first and most precious of all the arts.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. FORD ED., vii, 445. (Pa., 1800.)

209. AGRICULTURE, Atmosphere and.—The atmosphere is certainly the great workshop of nature for elaborating the fertilizing principles and insinuating them into the soil. It has been relied on as the sole means of regenerating our soil by most of the land-holders in the canton I inhabit, and where rest has been resorted to before a total exhaustion, the soil has never failed to recover. If, indeed, it be so run down as to be incapable of throwing weeds or herbage of any kind, to shade the soil from the sun, it either goes off in gullies, and is entirely lost, or remains exhausted till a growth springs up of such trees as will rise in the poorest soils. Under the shade of these and the cover soon formed of their deciduous leaves, and a commencing herbage, such fields sometimes recover in a long course of years; but this is too long to be taken into a course of hus-

* Jefferson subsequently recast these paragraphs as follows: "All observations are unnecessary on the value of peace with other nations. It would be wise however, by timely provisions, to guard against those acts of our own citizens, which might tend to disturb it, and to put ourselves in a condition to give satisfaction to foreign nations, which we may sometimes have occasion to require from them. I particularly recommend to your consideration the means of preventing those aggressions by our citizens on the territory of other nations, and other infractions of the law of nations, which, furnishing just subject of complaint, might endanger our peace with them."

bandry. Not so, however, is the term within which the atmosphere alone will reintegrate a soil rested in due season. A year of wheat will be balanced by one, two, or three years of rest and atmospheric influence, according to the quality of the soil.—To ——— iv, 224. (Pa., 1798.)

210. AGRICULTURE, Commerce and.—With honesty and self-government for her portion, agriculture may abandon contentedly to others the fruits of commerce and corruption.—To HENRY MIDDLETON. vi, 91. (M., Jan. 1813.)

211. AGRICULTURE, Corn vs. pasturage.—In every country as fully peopled as France, it would seem good policy to encourage the employment of its lands in the cultivation of corn rather than in pasturage, and consequently to encourage the use of all kinds of salted provisions, because they can be imported from other countries.—To M. NECKAR. iii, 120. (P., 1789.)

212. AGRICULTURE, Devastated.—A very considerable portion of this country [France] has been desolated by a hail [storm] * * * Great contributions, public and private, are making for the sufferers. But they will be like the drop of water from the finger of Lazarus. There is no remedy for the present evil, but to bring the people to such a state of ease, as not to be ruined by the loss of a single crop. This hail may be considered as the coup de grace to an expiring victim.—To M. DE CREVECOEUR. ii, 458. (P., Aug. 1788.)

213. AGRICULTURE, Discrimination against.—Shall we permit the greatest part of the produce of our fields to rot on our hands, or lose half its value by subjecting it to high insurance, [in the event of war,] merely that our shipbuilders may have brisker employ? Shall the whole mass of our farmers be sacrificed to the class of shipwrights?—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 625. (1793.)

214. AGRICULTURE, Encouragement of.—[The] encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1821.)

215. AGRICULTURE, Equilibrium of.—An equilibrium of agriculture, manufactures and commerce is certainly become essential to our independence.—To JAMES JAY. v, 440. (M., 1809.)

216. AGRICULTURE, Freedom of.—Agriculture, manufactures, commerce and navigation, the four pillars of our prosperity, are the most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise. Protection from casual embarrassments, however, may sometimes be seasonably interposed.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 13. FORD ED., viii, 123. (Dec. 1801.)

217. AGRICULTURE, French and English.—I traversed England much, and own both town and country fell short of my expectations. Comparing it with France, I found a much greater proportion of barrens, a soil, in other parts, not naturally so good as this, not better cultivated, but better manured, and therefore more productive. This proceeds from the practice of long leases there, and short ones here.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 549. FORD ED., iv, 213. (P., 1786.)

218. AGRICULTURE, Grasses.—I send some seeds of a grass, found very useful in the southern part of Europe, and particularly, and almost solely cultivated in Malta. It is called by the names of Sulla, and Spanish St. Foin, and is the Hedysarum coronarium of Linnæus. It is usually sown early in autumn.—To WILLIAM DRAYTON. i, 554. (P., 1786.)

219. ———. I send a little Spanish San Foin, represented to me as a very precious grass in a hot country. I would have it sowed in one of the vacant lots of my grass ground.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. FORD ED., iv, 344. (P., 1786.)

220. ———. I am much obliged to you for your attention to my trees and grass. The latter is one of the principal pillars on which I shall rely for subsistence when I shall be at liberty to try projects without injury to anybody.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. FORD ED., iv, 343. (P., 1786.)

221. AGRICULTURE, Happiness and.—The United States * * * will be more virtuous, more free and more happy, employed in agriculture, than as carriers or manufacturers. It is a truth, and a precious one for them, if they could be persuaded of it.—To M. DE WARVILLE. ii, 11. FORD ED., iv, 281. (P., 1786.)

222. ———. How far it may lessen our happiness to be rendered merely agricultural; how far that state is more friendly to principles of virtue and liberty, are questions yet to be solved.—To HORATIO GATES. iv, 213. FORD ED., vii, 205. (Pa., 1798.)

223. ———. In general, it is a truth that if every nation will employ itself in what it is fittest to produce, a greater quantity will be raised of the things contributing to human happiness, than if every nation attempts to raise everything it wants within itself.—To MR. LASTEYRIE. v, 315. (W., 1808.)

224. AGRICULTURE, Hunting and.—A little labor in the earth will produce more food than the best hunts you can now make, and the women will spin and weave more clothing than the men can procure by hunting. We shall very willingly assist you in this course by furnishing you with the necessary tools and implements, and with persons to instruct you in the use of them.—ADDRESS TO CHICKSAWS. viii, 199. (1805.)

225. AGRICULTURE, Income from.—The moderate and sure income of husbandry begets permanent improvement, quiet life, and orderly conduct, both public and private.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 252. (P., 1787.)

226. AGRICULTURE, Land, labor and.—The indifferent state of agriculture among us does not proceed from a want of knowledge merely; it is from our having such quantities of land to waste as we please. In Europe the object is to make the most of their land, labor being abundant; here it is to make the most of our labor, land being abundant.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 332. FORD ED., iii, 190. (1782.)

227. AGRICULTURE, Manufactures, commerce and.—I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends on a due balance between agriculture, manufactures and commerce.—To THOMAS LEIPER. v, 417. FORD ED., ix, 239. (W., 1809.)

228. AGRICULTURE, Model plow.—I shall with great pleasure attend to the construction and transmission to the Society [Agricultural Society of Paris] of a plow with my mould board. This is the only part of that useful instrument to which I have paid any particular attention. But knowing how much the perfection of the plough must depend, 1st, on the line of traction; 2nd, on the direction of the share; 3rd, on the angle of the wing; 4th, on the form of the mould board; and persuaded that I shall find the three first advantages, eminently exemplified in that which the Society sends me, I am anxious to see combined with these a mould-board of my form, in the hope it will still advance the perfection of that machine.—To M. SYLVESTER. v, 313. (W., 1808.)

229. — — — I have received the medal of gold by which the Society of Agriculture at Paris have been pleased to mark their approbation of a form of the mould-board which I had proposed; also * * * the information that they had honored me with the title of foreign associate to their society. I receive with great thankfulness these testimonies of their favor, and should be happy to merit them by greater services.—To M. SYLVESTER. v, 83. (W., 1807.)

230. AGRICULTURE, Morals and.—The pursuits of agriculture * * * are the best preservative of morals.—To J. BLAIR. ii, 248. (Pa., 1787.)

231. AGRICULTURE, New cultures.—The greatest service which can be rendered any country is to add a useful plant to its culture; especially a bread grain; next in value to bread is oil.—SERVICES OF JEFFERSON. i, 176. FORD ED., vii, 477. (1800?)

232. — — — Perhaps I may render some service by forwarding to the [Agricultural] Society* [of South Carolina] such new objects of culture, as may be likely to succeed in the soil and climate of South Carolina. In an infant country, as ours is, these experiments are important. We are probably far from possessing, as yet, all the articles of culture for which nature has fitted our country. To find out these, will require abundance of unsuccessful experiments. But if, in a multitude of these, we make one useful acquisition, it repays our trouble. Perhaps it is the peculiar duty of associated bodies to undertake these experiments. Under this sense of the views of the society, * * * I shall be attentive to procure for them the seeds of such plants as they will be so good as to point out to me, or as shall occur to myself as worthy their notice.—To WILLIAM DRAYTON. i, 554. (P., 1786.)

233. — — — I received the seeds of the bread-tree. * * * One service of this kind rendered to a nation, is worth more to them than all the victories of the most splendid pages of their history, and becomes a source of exalted pleasure to those who have been instrumental in it.—To M. GIRAUD. iv, 175. (1797.)

234. — — — The introduction of new cultures, and especially of objects of leading importance to our comfort, is certainly worthy the attention of every government, and nothing short of the actual experiment should discourage an essay of which any hope can be entertained.—To M. LASTEYRIE. v, 315. (W., 1808.)

235. AGRICULTURE, Prosperity and.—A prosperity built on the basis of agriculture is that which is most desirable to us, because to the efforts of labor it adds the efforts of a greater proportion of soil.—CIRCULAR TO CONSULS. iii, 431. (Pa., 1792.) See 216.

236. AGRICULTURE, Prostration of.—The long succession of years of stunted crops, of reduced prices, the general prostration of the farming business, under levies for the support of manufacturers, &c., with the calamitous fluctuations of value in our paper medium, have kept agriculture in a state of abject depression, which has peopled the western States by silently breaking up those on the Atlantic, and glutted the land market, while it drew off its bidders. In such a state of things, property has lost its character of being a resource for debts. Highland in Bedford, which, in the days of our plethora, sold readily for from fifty to one hundred dollars the acre, (and such sales were many then,) would not now sell for more than from ten to twenty dollars, or one-quarter or one-fifth of its former price.—To JAMES MADISON. vii, 434. FORD ED., x, 377. (M., February 1826.)

— AGRICULTURE, Rice.—See RICE.

237. AGRICULTURE, Riches and.—The pursuits of agriculture are the surest road to affluence.—To J. BLAIR. ii, 248. (P., 1787.)

238. AGRICULTURE, Rotation of crops.—By varying the articles of culture, we multiply the chances for making something and disarm the seasons in a proportionable degree, of their calamitous effect.—To WILLIAM DRAYTON. ii, 199. (P., 1787.)

239. ——. I find * * * that a ten years abandonment of my lands to the ravages of overseers, has brought on them a degree of degradation far beyond what I had expected. As this obliges me to adopt a milder course of cropping, * * * I have determined on a division of my farm into six fields, to be put under this rotation: first year, wheat; second, corn, potatoes, peas; third, rye or wheat, according to circumstances; fourth and fifth, clover where the fields will bring it, and buckwheat dressings where they will not; sixth, folding, and buckwheat dressings. But it will take me from three to six years to get this plan under way.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iv, 106. FORD ED., vi, 509. (M., May 1794.)

240. ——. I find the degradation of my lands by ill usage much beyond what I had expected, and at the same time much more open land than I had calculated on. One of these circumstances forces a milder course of cropping on me, and the other enables me to adopt it. I drop, therefore, two crops in my rotation, and instead of five crops in eight years, take three in six years, in the following order. 1. Wheat. 2. Corn and potatoes in the strongest moiety, potatoes alone or pease alone in the other moiety, according to its strength. 3. Wheat or rye. 4. Clover. 6. Folding and buckwheat dressing. In such of my fields as are too much worn for clover, I propose to try St. Foin, which I know will grow in the poorest land, bring plentiful crops, and is a great ameliorator.—To JOHN TAYLOR. FORD ED., vi, 506. (M., 1794.)

241. ——. It has been said that no rotation of crops will keep the earth in the same degree of fertility without the aid of manure. But it is well known here that a space of rest greater or less in spontaneous herbage, will restore the exhaustion of a single crop. This then is a rotation; and as it is not to be believed that spontaneous herbage is the only or best covering during rest, so may we expect that a substitute for it may be found which will yield profitable crops. Such perhaps are clover, peas, vetches, &c. A rotation then may be found, which by giving time for the slow influence of the atmosphere, will keep the soil in a constant and equal state of fertility. But the advantage of manuring is that it will do more in one than the atmosphere would require several years to do, and consequently enables you so much the oftener to take exhausting crops from the soil, a circumstance of importance where there is much more labor than land.—To ——. iv, 225. (Pa., 1798.)

242. ——. I have lately received the proceedings of the Agricultural Society of Paris. * * * I have been surprised to find that the rotation of crops and substitution of some profitable growth preparatory for grain, instead of the useless and expensive fallow, is yet only dawning among them.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. v, 224. (W., 1808.)

243. AGRICULTURE, Societies.—I have on several occasions been led to think on some means of uniting the State agricultural societies into a central society; and lately it has been pressed from England with a view to a cooperation with their Board of Agriculture. You know some have proposed to Congress to incorporate such a society. I am against that, because I think Congress cannot find in all the enumerated powers any one which authorizes the act, much less the giving the public money to that use. I believe, too, if they had the power, it would soon be used for no other purpose than to buy with sinecures useful partisans. I believe it will thrive best if left to itself, as the Philosophical Societies are. There is certainly a much greater abundance of material for Agricultural Societies than Philosophical. But what should be the plan of union? Would it do for the State societies to agree to meet in a central society by a deputation of members? If this should present difficulties, might they not be lessened by their adopting into their society some one or more of their delegates in Congress, or of the members of the Executive residing here, who assembling necessarily for other purposes, could occasionally meet on the business of their societies? Your [New York] Agricultural Society, standing undoubtedly on the highest ground, might set the thing agoing by writing to such State societies as already exist, and these once meeting centrally might induce the other States to establish societies, and thus complete the institution. This is a mere idea of mine, not sufficiently considered or digested, and hazarded merely to set you to thinking on the subject, and propose something better or to improve this. Will you be so good as to consider it at your leisure, and give me your thoughts on the subject?—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. FORD ED., vii, 492. (W., Feb. 1801.)

244. ——. Our Agricultural Society has at length formed itself. Like our American Philosophical Society, it is voluntary, and unconnected with the public, and is precisely an execution of the plan I formerly sketched to you. Some State societies have been formed heretofore; the other States will do the same. Each State society names two of its members of Congress to be their members in the Central Society, which is of course together during the sessions of Congress. They are to select matter from the proceedings of the State societies, and to publish it. * * * Mr. Madison, the Secretary of State, is their President.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. iv, 491. (W., 1803.)

245. ——. Were practical and observing husbandmen in each county to form themselves into a society, commit to writing themselves, or state in conversations at their meetings to be written down by others, their practices, and observations, their experiences and ideas, selections from these might be made from time to time by every one for his own use, or by the society or a committee of it, for more general purposes. By an interchange of these selections among the societies of the different counties, each might thus become possessed of the useful ideas and processes of the whole; and every one adopt such of them as he should deem suitable to his own situation. Or to abridge the labor of such multiplied correspondences, a central society might be agreed on to which, as a common deposit, all the others should send their communications. The society thus honored by the general confidence would doubtless feel and fulfil the duty of selecting such papers as should be worthy of entire communication, of extracting and digesting from others whatever might be useful, and of condensing their matter within such compass as might reconcile it to the reading, as well as to the purchase of the great mass of practical men. Many circumstances would recommend, for the central society, that which should be established in the county of the seat of government.—PLAN FOR AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES. ix, 480. (1811.)

246. AGRICULTURE, Strawberry.—There are two or three objects which you should endeavor to enrich our country with. One is the Alpine strawberry.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 21. (M., 1795.)

247. AGRICULTURE, Support from.—Agriculture is the basis of the subsistence, the comforts and the happiness of man.—To BARON DE MOLL. vi, 363. (M., 1814.)

248. AGRICULTURE, Threshing machine.—I shall thank you most sincerely for the model of the threshing machine, besides replacing the expense of it. The threshing out our wheat immediately after harvest being the only preservative against the weevil in Virginia, the service you will thereby render that State will make you to them a second Triptolemus.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. FORD ED., vi, 214. (Pa., 1793.)

249. AGRICULTURE, Tobacco.—Tobacco is a culture productive of infinite wretchedness. Those employed in it are in a continual state of exertion beyond the power of nature to support. Little food of any kind is raised by them; so that the men and animals on these farms are badly fed, and the earth is rapidly impoverished. The cultivation of wheat is the reverse in every circumstance. Besides clothing the earth with herbage, and preserving its fertility, it feeds the laborers plentifully, requires from them only a moderate toil, except in the season of harvest, raises great numbers of animals for food and service, and diffuses plenty and happiness among the whole. We find it easier to make an hundred bushels of wheat than a thousand weight of tobacco, and they are worth more when made.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 407. FORD ED., iii, 271. (1782.)

250. AGRICULTURE, Utility.—Agriculture is the most useful of the occupations of man.—To M. SILVESTRE. v, 83. (W., 1807.)

251. AGRICULTURE, Virginia.—Good husbandry with us consists in abandoning Indian corn and tobacco; tending small grain, some red clover, fallowing, and endeavoring to have, while the lands are at rest, a spontaneous cover of white clover. I do not present this as a culture judicious in itself, but as good, in comparison with what most people there pursue. Mr. [Arthur] Young has never had an opportunity of seeing how slowly the fertility of the soil is exhausted, with moderate management of it. I can affirm that the James River low-grounds, with the cultivation of small grain, will never be exhausted; because we know, that, under that condition, we must now and then take them down with Indian corn, or they become, as they were originally, too rich to bring wheat. The highlands where I live, have been cultivated about sixty years. The culture was tobacco and Indian corn, as long as they would bring enough to pay the labor; then they were turned out. After four or five years rest, they would bring good corn again, and in double that time, perhaps, good tobacco. Then they would be exhausted by a second series of tobacco and corn.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iv, 4. FORD ED., vi, 83. (1793.)

253. — — — Agriculture is our wisest pursuit, because it will in the end contribute most to real wealth, good morals and happiness.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 252. (P., 1787.)

254. AGRICULTURE, Writings on.—Writings on agriculture are peculiarly pleasing to me, for, as they tell us, we are sprung from the earth, so to that we naturally return.*—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. v., 224. (W., 1808.) See FARMERS and FARMING.

255. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, Character of.—A more virtuous man, I believe, does not exist, nor one who is more enthusiastically devoted to better the condition of mankind. He will probably, one day, fall a victim to it, as a monarch of that principle does not suit a Russian noblesse. He is not of the very first order of understanding, but he is of a high one. He has taken a peculiar affection to this country and its government, of which he has given me public as well as personal proofs. Our nation being, like his, habitually neutral, our interests as to neutral rights, and our sentiments agree. And whenever conferences for peace shall take place, we are assured of a friend in him. In fact, although in questions of restitution he will be with England, in those of neutral rights he will be with Bonaparte, and with every other power in the world except England; and I do presume that England will never have peace until she subscribes to a just code of marine law. I am confident that Russia (while her present monarch lives) is the most cordially friendly to us of any power on earth, will go furthest to serve us, and is most worthy of conciliation.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 140. FORD ED., ix, 120. (W., June 1807.)

256. ——. I owe an acknowledgment to your Imperial Majesty for the great satisfaction I have received from your letter of Aug. 20th, 1895, and embrace the opportunity it affords of giving expression to the sincere respect and veneration I entertain for your character. It will be among the latest and most soothing comforts of my life, to have seen advanced to the government of so extensive a portion of the earth, and at so early a period of his life, a sovereign whose ruling passion is the advancement of the happiness and prosperity of his people; and not of his own people only, but who can extend his eye and his good will to a distant and infant nation, unoffending in its course, unambitious in its views.—To THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA. v, 7. FORD ED., viii, 430. (W., April 1806.)

257. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, France and.—I have no doubt that the firmness of Alexander in favor of France, after the disposition of Bonaparte, has saved that country from evils still more severe than she is suffering, and perhaps even from partition.—To GEORGE LOGAN. vii, 20. (M., 1816.)

258. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, Friendliness to U. S.—Of Alexander's sense of the merits of our form of government, of its wholesome operation on the condition of the people, and of the interest he takes in the success of our experiment, we possess the most unquestionable proofs; and to him we shall be indebted if the rights of neutrals, to be settled whenever peace is made, shall be extended beyond the present belligerents; that is to say, European neutrals, as George and Napoleon, of mutual consent and common hatred against us, would concur in excluding us. I thought it a salutary measure to engage the powerful patronage of Alexander at conferences for peace, at a time when Bonaparte was courting him; and although circumstances have lessened its weight, yet it is prudent for us to cherish his good dispositions, as those alone which will be exerted in our favor when that occasion shall occur. He, like ourselves, sees and feels the atrociousness of both the belligerents.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 553. FORD ED., ix, 287. (M., Nov. 1810.)

259. ——. He is the only sovereign who cordially loves us.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 553. FORD ED., ix, 287. (M., 1810.)

death, he informed me that he had received intimations, through a channel he confided in, that the Emperor entertained a wish to know something of our Constitution. I have, therefore, selected the two best works we have on that subject, for which I pray you to ask a place in his library.—To MR. HARRIS. v, 6. (W., 1806.)

261. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, Mission to.—Desirous of promoting useful intercourse and good understanding between your Majesty's subjects and the citizens of the United States and especially to cultivate the friendship of your Majesty, I have appointed William Short,* one of our distinguished citizens, to be in quality of Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, the bearer to you of assurances of their sincere friendship, and of their desire to maintain with your Majesty and your subjects the strictest relations of amity and commerce; he will explain to your Majesty the peculiar position of these States, separated by a wide ocean from the powers of Europe, with interests and pursuits distinct from theirs, and consequently without the motives or the appetites for taking part in the associations or oppositions which a different system of interests produces among them: he is charged to assure your Majesty more particularly of our purpose to observe a faithful neutrality towards the contending powers, in the war to which your Majesty is a party, rendering to all the services and courtesies of friendship, and praying for the reestablishment of peace and right among them; and we entertain an entire confidence that this just and faithful conduct on the part of the United States will strengthen the friendly dispositions you have manifested towards them, and be a fresh motive with so just and magnanimous a sovereign to enforce, by the high influence of your example, the respect due to the character and the rights of a peaceable nation.—To THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA. v, 358. FORD ED., ix, 206. (W., Aug. 1808.)

262. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, Neutral Rights and.—The northern nations of Europe, at the head of which your Majesty is distinguished, are habitually peaceable. The United States of America, like them, are attached to peace. We have then with them a common interest in the neutral rights. Every nation indeed, on the continent of Europe, belligerent as well as neutral, is interested in maintaining these rights, liberalizing them progressively with the progress of science and refinement of morality, and in relieving them from restrictions which the extension of the arts has long since rendered unreasonable and vexatious.—To THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA. v, 8. FORD ED., viii, 440. (W., April 1806.)

263. ——. The events of Europe come to us so late, and so suspiciously, that observations on them would certainly be stale, and possibly wide of their actual state. From their general aspect, however, I collect that your Majesty's interposition in them has been disinterested and generous, and having in view only the general good of the great European family. When you shall proceed to the pacification which is to reestablish peace and commerce, the same dispositions of mind will lead you to think of the general intercourse of nations, and to make that provision for its future maintenance which, in times past, it has so much needed.—To THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA. v, 8. FORD ED., viii, 439. (W., April 1806.)

264. ——. Having taken no part in the past or existing troubles of Europe, we have no part to act in its pacification. But as principles may then be settled in which we have a deep interest, it is a great happiness for us that we are placed under the protection of an umpire, who, looking beyond the narrow bounds of an individual nation, will take under the cover of his equity the rights of the absent and unrepresented. It is only by a happy concurrence of good characters and good occasions, that a step can now and then be taken to advance the well-being of nations. If the present occasion be good, I am sure your Majesty's character will not be wanting to avail the world of it. By monuments of such good offices, may your life become an epoch in the history of the condition of man; and may He who called it into being, for the good of the human family, give it length of days and success, and have it always in His holy keeping.—To THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA. v, 8. FORD ED., viii, 440. (W., April 1806.)

265. ——. Two personages in Europe, of which your Majesty is one, have it in their power, at the approaching pacification, to render eminent service to nations in general, by incorporating into the act of pacification a correct definition of the rights of neutrals on the high seas. Such a definition declared by all the powers lately or still belligerent, would give to those rights a precision and notoriety, and cover them with an authority, which would protect them in an important degree against future violation; and should any further sanction be necessary, that of an exclusion of the violating nation from commercial intercourse with all the others, would be preferred to war, as more analogous to the offence, more easily and likely to be executed with good faith. The essential articles of these rights, too, are so few and simple as to be easily defined.—To THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA. v, 8. FORD ED., viii, 440. (W., April 1806.)

266. ——. That the Emperor may be able, whenever a pacification takes place, to show himself the father and friend of the human race, to restore to nations the moral laws which have governed their intercourse, and to prevent, forever, a repetition of those ravages by sea and land, which will distinguish the present as an age of Vandalism, I sincerely pray.—To COUNT PAHLEN. v, 527. (M., 1810.)

267. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, Reform and.—The apparition of such a man [as Alexander] on a throne is one of the phenomena which will distinguish the present epoch so remarkable in the history of man. But he must have an herculean task to devise and establish the means of securing freedom and happiness to those who are not capable of taking care of themselves. Some preparation seems necessary to qualify the body of a nation for self-government. Who could have thought the French nation incapable of it? Alexander will doubtless begin at the right end, by taking means for diffusing instruction and a sense of their natural rights through the mass of his people, and for relieving them in the meantime from actual oppression.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. FORD ED., viii, 179. (W., Nov. 1802.)

268. ——. The information * * * as to Alexander kindles a great deal of interest in his existence, and strong spasms of the heart in his favor. Though his means of doing good are great, yet the materials on which he is to work are retractory. Whether he engages in private correspondences abroad, as the King of Prussia did much, his grandfather sometimes, I know not; but certainly such a correspondence would be very interesting to those who are sincerely anxious to see mankind raised from their present abject condition.—To THOMAS COOPER. iv, 452. FORD ED., viii, 177. (W., Nov. 1802.)

269. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, Tribute to.—I am much flattered by the kind notice of the Emperor, which you have been so obliging as to communicate to me. The approbation of the good is always consoling; but that of a sovereign whose station and endowments are so pre-eminent, is received with a sensibility which the veneration for his character inspires. Among other motives of commiseration, which the calamities of Europe cannot fail to excite in every virtuous mind, the interruption which these have given to the benevolent views of the Emperor, is prominent. The accession of a sovereign, with the dispositions and qualifications to improve the condition of a great nation, and to place its happiness on a permanent basis, is a phenomenon so rare in the annals of mankind that when the blessing occurs, it is lamentable that any portion of it should be usurped by occurrences of the character we have seen. If separated from these scenes by an ocean of a thousand leagues breadth, they have required all our cares to keep aloof from their desolating effects, I can readily conceive how much more they must occupy those to whose territories they are contiguous.—To COUNT PAHLEN. v, 526. (M., 1810.)

270. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, Triumphs of.—To the wonders of Bonaparte's rise and fall, we may add that of a Czar of Muscovy, dictating, in Paris, laws and limits to all the successors of the Cæsars, and holding even the balance in which the fortunes of this new world are suspended.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 353. FORD ED., ix, 461. (M., 1814.)

271. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, Vienna Congress and.—The magnanimity of Alexander's conduct on the first capture of Paris still magnified everything we had believed of him; but how he will come out of his present trial remains to be seen. That the sufferings which France had inflicted on other countries justified severe reprisals, cannot be questioned; but I have not yet learned what crimes of Poland, Saxony, Belgium, Venice, Lombardy and Genoa, had merited for them, not merely a temporary punishment, but that of permanent subjugation and a destitution of independence and self-government. The fable of Æsop of the lion dividing the spoils, is, I fear, becoming true history, and the moral code of Napoleon and the English government a substitute for that of Grotius, of Puffendorf, and even of the pure doctrine of the great author of our holy religion.—To DR. GEORGE LOGAN. vi, 497. (M., Oct. 1815.)

272. ——. His character is undoubtedly good, and the world, I think, may expect good effects from it. * * * I sincerely wish that the history of the secret proceedings at Vienna may become known, and may reconcile to our good opinion of him his participation in the demolition of ancient and independent States, transferring them and their inhabitants as farms and stocks of cattle at a market to other owners, and even taking a part of the spoil himself. It is possible to suppose a case excusing this, and my partiality for his character encourages me to expect it, and to impute to others, known to have no moral scruples, the crimes, of that conclave, who under pretence of punishing the atrocities of Bonaparte, reached them themselves, and proved that with equal power they were equally flagitious.—To Dr. LOGAN. vii, 20. (M., 1816.)

273. ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, Virtues of.—I had * * * formed the most favorable opinion of the virtues of Alexander, and considered his partiality to this country as a prominent proof of them.—To Dr. GEORGE LOGAN. vi, 497. (M., 1815.)

274. ALEXANDRIA, Baltimore and.—It is not amiss to encourage Alexandria, because it is a rival in the very bosom of Baltimore.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 19. (P., 1784.)

275. ALEXANDRIA, Future of.—Alexandria on the Potomac will undoubtedly become a very great place, but Norfolk would be best for cotton manufactures.—To M. DE LA VALEE. i, 430. (P., 1785.)

— ALGIERS.—See BARBARY POWERS and 1137.

276. ALIENAGE, Law of Violated.—The bill for establishing a National Bank undertakes * * * to form the subscribers into a corporation, [and] to enable them, in their corporate capacities, to make alien subscribers capable of holding lands; and so far is against the laws of Alienage.—OPINION ON THE BANK BILL. vii, 555. FORD ED., v, 284. (February 1791.)

— ALIENATION OF TERRITORY.
—See TERRITORY.

277. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Hatching.—One of the war party, in a fit of ungoverned passion, declared some time ago they would pass a citizen bill, an alien bill, and a sedition bill; accordingly, some days ago, Coit laid a motion on the table of the House of Representatives for modifying the citizen law. Their threats point at Gallatin, and it is believed they will endeavor to reach him by this bill. Yesterday Mr. Hillhouse laid on the table of the Senate a motion for giving power to send away suspected aliens. This understood to be meant for Volney and Collet. But it will not stop there when it gets into a course of execution. There is now only wanting, to accomplish the whole declaration before mentioned, a sedition bill, which we shall certainly soon see proposed.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 237. FORD ED., vii, 244. (Pa., April 26 1798.)

278. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Introduction of.—They have brought into the lower House a sedition bill, which, among other enormities, undertakes to make printing certain matters criminal, though one of the amendments to the Constitution has so expressly taken religion, printing presses, &c. out of their coercion. Indeed this bill, and the alien bill are both so palpably in the teeth of the Constitution as to show they mean to pay no respect to it.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 266. (Pa., June 1798.)

279. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Petitions against.—Petitions and remonstrances against the Alien and Sedition laws are coming from various parts of New York, Jersey and Pennsylvania. * * * I am in hopes Virginia will stand so countenanced by those States as to repress the wishes of the Government to coerce her, which they might venture on if they supposed she would be left alone. Firmness on our part, but a passive firmness, is the true course. Anything rash or threatening might check the favorable dispositions of these middle States, and rally them again around the measures which are ruining us.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 279. FORD ED., vii, 341. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

280. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Planning Insurrection against.—In Pennsylvania, we fear that the ill-designing may produce insurrection [against the Alien and Sedition laws]. Nothing could be so fatal. Anything like force would check the progress of the public opinion, and rally them around the government. This is not the kind of opposition the American people will permit. But keep away all show of force, and they will bear down the evil propensities of the government, by the constitutional means of election and petition.—To EDWARD PENDLETON. iv, 287. FORD ED., vii, 356. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

281. — — — Several parts of this State [Pennsylvania] are so violent that we fear an insurrection. This will be brought about by some if they can. It is the only thing we have to fear. The appearance of an attack of force against the government would check the present current of the middle States, and rally them around the government; whereas if suffered to go on, it will pass on to a reformation of abuses.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iv, 286. FORD ED., vii, 354. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

282. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Report on.—Yesterday witnessed a scandalous scene in the House of Representatives. It was the day for taking up the report of their committee against the Alien and Sedition laws, &c. They [the Federalists] held a caucus and determined that not a word should be spoken on their side, in answer to anything which should be said on the other. Gallatin took up the Alien, and Nicholas the Sedition law; but after a little while of common silence, they began to enter into loud conversations, laugh, cough, &c., so that for the last hour of these gentlemen's speaking, they must have had the lungs of a vendue master to have been heard. Livingston, however, attempted to speak. But after a few sentences, the Speaker called him to order, and told him what he was saying was not to the question. It was impossible to proceed. The question was carried in favor of the report, 52 to 48:

the real strength of the two parties is 56 to 50.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 298. FORD ED., vii, 371. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

283. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Scheme of.—I consider these laws as merely an experiment on the American mind, to see how far it will bear an avowed violation of the Constitution. If this goes down, we shall immediately see attempted another act of Congress, declaring that the President shall continue in office during life, reserving to another occasion the transfer of the succession to the heirs, and the establishment of the Senate for life. At least, this may be the aim of the Oliverians, while Monk and the Cavaliers, (who are perhaps the strongest,) may be playing their game for the restoration of his most gracious Majesty, George III. That these things are in contemplation, I have no doubt; nor can I be confident of their failure, after the dupery of which our countrymen have shown themselves susceptible.—To S. T. MASON. iv, 258. FORD ED., vii, 283. (M., 1798.)

284. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Suits under.—I discharged every person under punishment or prosecution under the Sedition law, because I considered, and now consider, that law to be a nullity, as absolute and as palpable as if Congress had ordered us to fall down and worship a golden image; and that it was as much my duty to arrest its execution in every stage, as it would have been to have rescued from the fiery furnace those who should have been cast into it for refusing to worship the image. It was accordingly done in every instance, without asking what the offenders had done, or against whom they had offended, but whether the pains they were suffering were inflicted under the pretended Sedition law.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 536. FORD ED., viii, 309. (W., July 1804.)

285. — — — With respect to the dismissal of the prosecutions for sedition in Connecticut, it is well known to have been a tenet of the republican portion of our fellow citizens, that the Sedition law was contrary to the Constitution and, therefore, void. On this ground I considered it as a nullity whenever I met it in the course of my duties; and on this ground I directed nolle prosequis in all the prosecutions which had been instituted under it; and, as far as the public sentiment can be inferred from the occurrences of the day, we must say that this opinion had the sanction of the nation. The prosecutions, therefore, which were afterwards instituted in Connecticut, of which two were against printers, two against preachers, and one against a judge, were too inconsistent with this principle to be permitted to go on. We were bound to administer to others the same measure of law, not which they had meted to us, but we to ourselves, and to extend to all equally the protection of the same constitutional principles. These prosecutions, too, were chiefly for charges against myself, and I had from the beginning laid it down as a rule to notice nothing of the kind. I believed that the long course of services in which I had acted on the public stage, and under the eye of my fellow citizens, furnished better evidence to them of my character and principles, than the angry invectives of adverse partisans in whose eyes the very acts most approved by the majority were subjects of the greatest demerit and censure. These prosecutions against them, therefore, were to be dismissed as a matter of duty.—To GIDEON GRANGER. vi, 332. FORD ED., ix, 456. (M., 1814.)

286. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Tyrannical.—If the Alien and Sedition Acts should stand, these conclusions would flow from them: that the General Government may place any act they think proper on the list of crimes, and punish it themselves whether enumerated or not enumerated by the Constitution as cognizable by them: that they may transfer its cognizance to the President, or any other person, who may himself be the accuser, counsel, judge and jury, whose suspicion may be the evidence, his order the sentence, his officer the executioner, and his breast the sole record of the transaction: that a very numerous and valuable description of the inhabitants of these states being, by this precedent, reduced, as outlaws, to the absolute dominion of one man, and the barrier of the Constitution thus swept away from us all, no rampart now remains against the passions and the powers of a majority in Congress to protect from a like exportation, or other more grievous punishment, the minority of the same body, the legislatures, judges, governors, and counselors of the States, nor their other peaceable inhabitants, who may venture to reclaim the constitutional rights and liberties of the States and people, or who for other causes, good or bad, may be obnoxious to the views, or marked by the suspicions of the President, or be thought dangerous to his or their election, or other interests, public or personal: that the friendless alien has indeed been selected as the safest subject of a first experiment; but the citizen will soon follow, or rather, has already followed, for already has a Sedition Act marked him as its prey: that these and successive acts of the same character, unless arrested at the threshold, necessarily drive these States into revolution and blood, and will furnish new calumnies against republican government, and new pretexts for those who wish it to be believed that man cannot be governed but by a rod of iron.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 469. FORD ED., vii, 302. (1798.)

287. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Unconstitutional.—For the present, I should be for resolving the Alien and Sedition laws to be against the Constitution and merely void, and for addressing the other States to obtain similar declarations; and I would not do anything at this moment which should commit us further, but reserve ourselves to shape our future measures, or no measures, by the events which may happen.—To JOHN TAYLOR. iv, 260. FORD ED., vii, 311. (M., Nov. 1798.)

288. ——. Alien friends are under the jurisdiction and protection of the laws of the State wherein they are: no power over them has been delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the individual States, distinct from their power over citizens. And it being true as a general principle, and one of the amendments to the Constitution having also declared that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," the act of the Congress of the United States, passed on the — day of July, 1798, intitled "An Act concerning Aliens," which assumes powers over alien friends, not delegated by the Constitution, is not law, but is altogether void, and of no force.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 466. FORD ED., vii, 296. (1798.)

289. ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, Viciousness of.—The Alien bill * * * is a most detestable thing.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 244. FORD ED., vii, 260. (Pa., May 1798.)

290. ——. That libel on legislation.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 374. FORD ED., viii, 22. (W., March 1801.) See SEDITION LAW.

291. ALIENS, forcible Removal of.—In addition to the general principle, as well as the express declaration, that powers not delegated are reserved, another and more special provision, inserted in the Constitution from abundant caution, has declared that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808." * * * This Commonwealth [Kentucky] does admit the migration of alien friends, described as the subject of the said act concerning aliens.

* * * A provision against prohibiting their migration is a provision against all acts equivalent thereto, or it would be nugatory. * * * To remove them when migrated, is equivalent to a prohibition of their migration, and is, therefore, contrary to the said provision of the Constitution, and void.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 466. FORD ED., vii, 296. (1798.)

292. ALIENS, The Revolution and.—I do not know that there has been any American determination on the question whether American citizens and British subjects, born before the Revolution, can be aliens to one another? I know there is an opinion of Lord Coke's, in Colvin's case, that if England and Scotland should, in the course of descent, pass to separate kings, those born under the same sovereign during the union, would remain natural subjects and not aliens. Common sense urges some considerations against this. Natural subjects owe allegiance; but we owe none. Aliens are the subjects of a foreign power; we are not subjects of a foreign power. The King, by the treaty, acknowledges our independence; how, then, can we remain natural subjects? The King's power is, by the Constitution, competent to the making peace, war and treaties. He had, therefore, authority to relinquish our allegiance by treaty. But if an act of parliament had been necessary, the parliament passed an act to confirm the treaty. So that it appears to me that, in this question, fictions of law alone are opposed to sound sense.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 530. (P., 1786.)

293. ALLEGIANCE, Renounced.—We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America in General Congress assembled, do in the name and by the authority of the good people of these States reject and renounce all allegiance and subjection to the kings of Great Britain and all others who may hereafter claim by, through, or under them; we utterly dissolve all political connection which may heretofore have subsisted between us and the people or parliament of Great Britain.* — DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

294. ALLEGIANCE, Repudiated.—He has abdicated government here, withdrawing his governors, and declaring us out of his allegiance and protection.†—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

295. ALLEN, Protection of Ethan.—It is with pain we fear that Mr. [Ethan] Allen and others, taken with him while fighting bravely in their country's cause, are sent to Britain in irons, to be punished for pretended treason; treasons, too, created by one of those very laws whose obligation we deny, and mean to contest by the sword. This question will not be decided by seeking vengeance on a few helpless captives but by achieving success in the fields of war, and gathering there those laurels which grow for the warrior brave. * * * We have ordered Brigadier General Prescott to be bound in irons, and to be confined in close jail, there to experience corresponding miseries to those which shall be inflicted on Mr. Allen. His life shall answer for that of Mr. Allen.‡—CONGRESS RESOLUTION. FORD ED., i, 494 (Dec. 1775.)

296. ALLIANCE, Abjure.—I sincerely join you in abjuring all political connection with every foreign power; and though I cordially wish well to the progress of liberty in all nations, and would forever give it the weight of our countenance, yet they are not to be touched without contamination from their other bad principles.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 301. FORD ED., vii, 374. (M., March 1799.)

* Congress struck out the italicized words and inserted: "Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, Free and Independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is, and ought to be, totally dissolved." Congress also inserted after the word "assembled," the words, "appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our intentions."—EDITOR.

297. ALLIANCE, Coercion and.—The British ministers equivocate on every proposal of a treaty of commerce * * * unless, indeed, we would agree to make it a treaty of alliance as well as commerce, so as to undermine our obligations with France. This method of stripping that rival nation of its alliances, they tried successfully with Holland, endeavored at it with Spain, and have plainly and repeatedly suggested to us. For this they would probably relax some of the rigors they exercise against our commerce.—OFFICIAL REPORT. vii, 518. (December 1790.)

298. ALLIANCE, Dangerous.—An alliance [with Great Britain] with a view to partition of the Floridas and Louisiana, is not what we would wish, because it may eventually lead us into embarrassing situations with our best friend, and put the power of two neighbors into the hands of one. Lord Lansdowne has declared he gave the Floridas to Spain rather than the United States as a bone of discord with the House of Bourbon, and of reunion with Great Britain.—INSTRUCTIONS TO WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ix, 413. FORD ED., v, 227. (1790.)

299. ALLIANCE, Deprecated.—I sincerely deplore the situation of our affairs with France. War with them, and consequent alliance with Great Britain, will completely compass the object of the Executive council, from the commencement of the war between France and England; taken up by some of them from that moment, by others, more latterly. I still, however, hope it will be avoided.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 162. FORD ED., vii, 108. (M., Jan. 1797.)

300. ALLIANCE, Destructive.—To take part in European conflicts would be to divert our energies from creation to destruction.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., viii, 23. (W., March 1801.)

301. ALLIANCE, Divorce from all.—As to everything except commerce, we ought to divorce ourselves from them all. But this system would require time, temper, wisdom, and occasional sacrifice of interest; and how far all of these will be ours, our children may see, but we shall not. The passions are too high at present, to be cooled in our day.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 191. FORD ED., vii, 154. (Pa., 1797.)

302. — — — Better keep together as we are. haul off from Europe as soon as we can and from all attachments to any portions of it.—To JOHN TAYLOR. iv, 247. FORD ED., vii, 265. (Pa., 1798.)

303. — — — Commerce with all nations, alliance with none, should be our motto.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 301. FORD ED., vii, 374. (M., March 1799.)

304. — — — It ought to be the very first object of our pursuits to have nothing to do with the European interests and politics. Let them be free or slaves, at will, navigators or agriculturists, swallowed into one government or divided into a thousand, we have nothing to fear from them in any form.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., viii, 23. (W., March 1801.)

305. ALLIANCES, Entangling.—I know that it is a maxim with us, and I think it a wise one, not to entangle ourselves with the affairs of Europe.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 334. FORD ED., iv, 483. (P., 1787.)

306. — — — I am for free commerce with all nations; political connection with none; and little or no diplomatic establishment. And I am not for linking ourselves by new treaties with the quarrels of Europe; entering that field of slaughter to preserve their balance, or joining in the confederacy of Kings to war against the principles of liberty.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

307. — — — Let our affairs be disentangled from those of all other nations, except as to commerce.—To GIDEON GRANGER. iv, 331. FORD ED., vii, 452. (M., 1800.)

308. — — — The Constitution thought it wise to restrain the Executive and Senate from entangling and embroiling our affairs with those of Europe.—PARLIAMENTARY MANUAL. ix, 81. (1800.)

309. — — — Honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently, [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1801.)

310. — — — Determined as we are to avoid, if possible, wasting the energies of our people in war and destruction, we shall avoid implicating ourselves with the powers of Europe, even in support of principles which we mean to pursue. They have so many other interests different from ours, that we must avoid being entangled in them. We believe we can enforce these principles, as to ourselves, by peaceable means, now that we are likely to have our public councils detached from foreign views.—To THOMAS PAINE. iv, 370. FORD ED., viii, 18. (W., March 1801.)

311. — — — Peace, and abstinence from European interferences, are our objects.—To M. DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 436. (W., April 1802.)

312. — — — It is against our system * * * to entangle ourselves at all with the affairs of Europe.—To PHILIP MAZZEI. iv, 553. (W., July 1864.)

313. — — — Our nation has wisely avoided entangling itself in the system of European interests, has taken no side between its rival powers, attached itself to none of its ever-changing confederacies.—R. to A. OF BALTIMORE BAPTISTS. viii, 137. (1808.)

314. ——. The less we have to do with the amities or enmities of Europe the better.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 465. FORD ED., ix, 520. (M., 1815.)

315. ——. All entanglements with that quarter of the globe [Europe] should be avoided if we mean that peace and justice shall be the polar stars of the American Societies.—To J. CORREA. vii, 184. FORD ED., x, 164. (M., 1820.)

316. ——. The fundamental principle of our government,—never to entangle us with the broils of Europe.—To M. CORAY. vii, 318. (M., 1823.)

317. ——. I have ever deemed it fundamental for the United States never to take active part in the quarrels of Europe. Their political interests are entirely distinct from ours. Their mutual jealousies, their balance of power, their complicated alliances, their forms and principles of government, are all foreign to us. They are nations of eternal war.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 288. FORD ED., x, 257. (M., 1823.)

318. ALLIANCE, A Generous.—If there could have been a doubt before as to the event of the war, it is now totally removed by the interposition of France, and the generous alliance she has entered into with us.—To ——. i, 208. FORD ED., ii, 157. (W., 1778.)

— ALLIANCE. The Holy.—See HOLY ALLIANCE.

319. ALLIANCE, Horror of.—We have a perfect horror at everything like connecting ourselves with the politics of Europe.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iv, 414. FORD ED., viii, 98. (W., 1801.)

320. ALLIANCE, Inadmissible.—The British talk of * * * a treaty of commerce and alliance. If the object of the latter be honorable, it is useless; if dishonorable, inadmissible.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 182. FORD ED., v, 224. (N. Y., 1790.)

321. ALLIANCE, Inevitable.—The day that France takes possession of New Orleans * * * seals the union of two nations, who, in conjunction, can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment, we must marry ourselves to the British fleet and nation. We must turn all our attention to a maritime force * * *.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 432. FORD ED., viii, 145. (W., April 1802.)

322. ALLIANCE, A lost.—Were the British court to return to their senses in time to seize the little advantage which still remains within their reach, from this quarter, I judge, that, on acknowledging our absolute independence and sovereignty, a commercial treaty beneficial to them, and perhaps even a league of mutual offence and defence might, not seeing the expense or consequences of such a measure, be approved by our people, if nothing, in the meantime, done on your part should prevent it. But they will continue to grasp at their desperate sovereignty, till every benefit short of that is forever out of their reach.—To BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. i, 205. FORD ED., ii, 132. (August 1777.)

323. ALLIANCE, Suggested French.—If we can obtain from Great Britain reasonable conditions of commerce, (which, in my idea, must forever include an admission into her [West India] islands,) the first ground between these two nations would seem to be the best. But if we can obtain no equal terms from her, perhaps Congress might think it prudent, as Holland has done, to connect us unequivocally with France. Holland has purchased the protection of France. The price she pays is aid in time of war. It is interesting for us to purchase a free commerce with the French islands. But whether it is best to pay for it, by aids in war, or by privileges in commerce, or not to purchase it at all, is the question.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. ix, 244. FORD ED., iv, 130. (P., 1785.)

324. ALLIANCE, Unwise.—I join you * * * in a sense of the necessity of restoring freedom to the ocean. But I doubt, with you, whether the United States ought to join in an armed confederacy for that purpose; or rather I am satisfied they ought not.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., viii, 23. (W., March 1801.)

325. ALLIANCES, Insufficiency of.—Treaties of alliance are generally insufficient to enforce compliance with their mutual stipulations.—THE ANAS. ix, 88. FORD ED., i, 157. (1818.)

326. ALLIANCES, International Marriage.—What a crowd of lessons do the present miseries of Holland teach us! * * * Never to let a citizen ally himself with Kings * * *.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 283. FORD ED., iv, 455. (P., 1787.)

327. ALLSTON, Burr and Washington.—I send you Allston's letter for perusal. He thinks to get over this matter by putting a bold face on it. I have the names of three persons whose evidence, taken together, can fix on him the actual endeavor to engage men in Burr's enterprise.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., ix, 13. (W., 1807.)

328. ——. The enclosed copy of an affidavit from General Wilkinson authenticates the copy of a letter from Colonel Burr to the General, affirming that Mr. Allston his son-in-law, is engaged in the unlawful enterprises he is carrying on, and is to be an actor in them. * * * It is further well known in Washington that Mr. Allston is an endorser to a considerable amount, of the bills which have enabled Colonel Burr to prepare his treasons. Nobody is a better judge than yourself whether any and what measures can be taken on this information.—To CHARLES PINCKNEY. v, 34. FORD ED., ix, 13. (W., Jan. 1807.)

329. ALMANACS, Improvements in.—I received your letter on the publication of an Ephemeris. I have long thought it desirable that something of that kind should be published in the United States, holding a middle station between the nautical and the common popular almanacs. * * * What you propose to insert is very well so far; but I think you might give it more of the character desired by the addition of some other articles which would not enlarge it more than a leaf or two. For instance, the equation of time is essential to the regulation of our clocks and watches, and would only add a narrow column to your second page. The sun's declination is often desirable and would only add another narrow column. This last would be the more useful as an element for obtaining the rising and setting of the sun in every part of the United States * * * if you would add a formula for that calculation.—To MELATIAH NASH. vi, 29. (M., 1811.)

330. ALMANACS, Value of Old.—But why, you will ask, do I send you old almanacs, which are proverbially useless? Because, in these publications have appeared from time to time, some of the most precious things in astronomy. I have searched out those particular volumes which might be valuable to you on this account. That of 1781, contains De la Caille's catalogue of fixed stars reduced to the commencement of that year, and a table of the aberrations and mutations of the principal stars. 1784 contains the same catalogue with the nebulæ of Messier. 1785 contains the famous catalogue of Hamstead, with the positions of the stars reduced to the beginning of the year 1784, and which supersedes the use of that immense book. 1786 gives von Euler's lunar tables corrected; and 1787 the tables for the planet Herschel. The two last needed not an apology, as not being within the description of old almanacs. * * * The volume of 1787 gives you Mayer's catalogue of the zodiacal stars. To Dr. STILES. i, 363. (P., 1785.)

331. ALTERCATIONS, Injurious.—An instance of acquiescence on our part under a wrong, rather than disturb our friendship by altercations, may have its value in some future case.—To JOHN JAY. i, 603. (P., 1786.)

332. ALTERCATIONS, Nursing.—If the British troops should pass [through our territory] without having asked leave, I should be for expressing our dissatisfaction to the British Court, and keeping alive an altercation on the subject, till events should decide whether it is most expedient to accept their apologies, or profit of the aggression as a cause of war.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. vii, 510. FORD ED., v, 239. (1790.)

333. AMBITION, Defeating.—The minds of the people at large should be illuminated, as far as practicable, * * * that they may be enabled to know ambition under all its shapes, and prompt to exert their natural powers to defeat its purposes.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. (1779.)

334. AMBITION, Eradicated.—Before I ventured to declare to my countrymen my determination to retire from public employment, I examined well my heart to know whether it were thoroughly cured of every principle of political ambition, whether no lurking particle remained which might leave me uneasy, when reduced within the limits of mere private life. I became satisfied that every fibre of that passion was thoroughly eradicated.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 317. FORD ED., iii, 56. (M., 1782.)

335. AMBITION, Family.—I feel no impulse from personal ambition to the office now proposed to me, but on account of yourself and your sister and those dear to you.—To MARY JEFFERSON EPPES. D. L. J. 274. (W., Feb. 1801.)

336. AMBITION, Government and.—I have no ambition to govern men; no passion which would lead me to delight to ride in a storm.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 152. FORD ED., vii, 94. (M., 1796.)

337. — I have no ambition to govern men. It is a painful and thankless office.—To JOHN ADAMS. iv, 154. FORD ED., vii, 98. (M., 1796.)

338. — I have no inclination to govern men. I should have no views of my own in doing it; and as to those of the governed, I had rather that their disappointment (which must always happen) should be pointed to any other cause, real or supposed, than to myself.—To MR. VOLNEY. iv, 158. (M., 1797.)

339. AMBITION, Lost.—The little spice of ambition which I had in my younger days has long since evaporated, and I set still less store by a posthumous than present name.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 117. FORD ED., vii, 10. (M., April 1795.)

340. AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION, First.—Congress were to proceed about the 1st of June to propose amendments to the new Constitution. The principal would be, the annexing a declaration of rights to satisfy the mind of all on the subject of their liberties.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. iii, 89. (P., Aug. 1789.) See CONSTITUTION (FEDERAL.)

341. AMERICA, Europe and.—The European nations constitute a separate division of the globe; their treaties make them part of a distinct system; they have a set of interests of their own in which it is our business never to engage ourselves. America has a hemisphere to itself. It must have its separate system of interests, which must not be subordinated to those of Europe. The insulated state in which nature has placed the American continent, should so far avail it that no spark of war kindled in the other quarters of the globe should be wafted across the wide oceans which separate us from them. And it will be so.—To BARON VON HUMBOLDT. vi, 268. FORD ED., ix, 431. (Dec. 1813.) See CANADA, COLONIES, SOUTH AMERICA, UNITED STATES

342. — — — Nothing is so important as that America shall separate herself from the systems of Europe, and establish one of her own. Our circumstances, our pursuits, our interests, are distinct; the principles of our policy should be so also. All entanglements with that quarter of the globe should be avoided if we mean that peace and justice shall be the polar stars of the American societies. * * * It would be a leading principle with me had I longer to live.—To J. CORREA DE SERRA. vii, 184. FORD ED., x, 164. (M., Oct. 1820.) See POLICY.

343. AMERICA, No Kings nor Emperors for.—I rejoice to learn that Iturbide is a mere usurper, and slenderly supported. Although we have no right to intermeddle with the form of government of other nations, yet it is lawful to wish to see no emperors nor kings in our hemisphere, and that Brazil as well as Mexico will homologize with us.—To JAMES MONROE. 345. ANARCHY, Averted.—Much has been gained by the new [Federal] Constitution, for the former was terminating in anarchy, as necessarily consequent to inefficiency.—To GEORGE MASON. iii, 148. FORD ED., v, 183. (N. Y., 1790.)

346. ANARCHY, Fatal.—Our falling into anarchy would decide forever the destinies of mankind, and seal the political heresy that man is incapable of self-government.—To JOHN HOLLINS. v, 597. (M., 1811.)

347. ANARCHY, Imputed.—From the London gazettes and the papers copying them, you are led to suppose that all in America is anarchy, discontent and civil war. Nothing, however, is less true. There are not on the face of the earth more tranquil governments than ours, nor a happier and more contented people.—To BARON GEISMER. i, 427. (P., 1785.)

348. — — — Wonderful is the effect of impudent and persevering lying. The British ministry have so long hired their gazetteers to repeat, and model into every form, lies about our being in anarchy, that the world has at length believed them, * * * and what is more wonderful, we have believed them ourselves. Yet where does this anarchy exist? Where did it ever exist, except in the single instance of Massachusetts? And can history produce one instance of rebellion so honorably conducted?—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 318. FORD ED., iv, 466. (P., 1787.)

349. ANARCHY, Suppress.—Let this be the distinctive mark of an American that, in cases of commotion, he enlists himself under no man's banner, inquires for no man's name, but repairs to the standard of the laws. Do this and you need never fear anarchy or tyranny. Your government will be perpetual.—FROM JEFFERSON'S MSS. FORD ED., viii, 1. (1801?)

350. ANATOMY, Knowledge of.—No knowledge can be more satisfactory to a man than that of his own frame, its parts, their functions and actions.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 390. (M., 1814.)

351. — — — I have just received * * * two volumes of Comparative Anatomy by Cuvier, probably the greatest work in that line that has ever appeared. His comparisons embrace every organ of the animal carcass; and from man to the rotifer.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 385. FORD ED., viii, 33. (W., 1801.)

352. ANCESTORS, Practices of.—I am not bigotted to the practices of our forefathers. It is that bigotry which keeps the Indians in a state of barbarism in the midst of the arts, would have kept us in the same state even now, and still keeps Connecticut where their ancestors were when they landed on these shores.—To ROBERT FULTON. v, 516. (M., 1810.)

353. ANCESTORS, Regimen of.—We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him when a boy, as civilized society to remain ever under the regimen of their barbarous ancestors.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 15. FORD ED., x, 43. (M., 1816.)

354. ANCESTRY, Equality vs.—The foundation on which all [our constitutions] are built, is the natural equality of man, the denial of every pre-eminence but that annexed to legal office and, particularly, the denial of a pre-eminence by birth.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 334. FORD ED., iii, 466. (A., 1784.)

355. ANCESTRY, Thomas Jefferson's.—The tradition in my father's family was that their ancestor came to this country from Wales, and from near the mountain of Snowdon, the highest in Great Britain. I noted once a case from Wales, in the law reports, where a person of our name was either plaintiff or defendant; and one of the same name was secretary to the Virginia Company.* These are the only instances in which I have met with the name in that country. I have found it in our early records; but the first particular information I have of any ancestor was of my grandfather, who lived at the place in Chesterfield called Osborne's, and owned the lands afterwards the glebe of the parish. He had three sons: Thomas who died young, Field who settled on the waters of Roanoke and left numerous descendants, and Peter, my father, who settled on the lands I still own, called Shadwell, adjoining my present residence. He was born February

* No Jefferson was ever Secretary of the Virginia Company, but John Jefferson was a member of the Company. He came to Virginia in the Bona Nova, in 1610.—NOTE IN FORD'S EDITION OF JEFFERSON'S WRITINGS.

29, 1707-8, and intermarried 1739, with Jane Randolph, of the age of 19, daughter of Isham Randolph, one of the seven sons of that name and family, settled at Dungeones in Goochland. They trace their pedigree far back in England and Scotland, to which let every one ascribe the faith and merit he chooses.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY, i, 1. FORD ED., i, 1. (1831.)

357. ANGER, Control over.—When angry, count ten before you speak; if very angry, an hundred.—TO THOMAS JEFFERSON SMITH. vii, 402. FORD ED., x, 341. (M., 1825.)

358. ANGLOMANIA, Danger in.—I fear nothing for our liberty from the assaults of force; but I have seen and felt much, and fear more from English books, English prejudices, English manners, and the apes, the dupes, and designs among our professional crafts. When I look around me for security against these seductions, I find it in the wide spread of our agricultural citizens, in their unsophisticated minds, their independence and their power, if called on, to crush the Humists [Tories] of our cities, and to maintain the principles which severed us from England.—TO HORATIO G. SPAFFORD. vi, 335. (M., 1814.)

359. ANGLOMANIA, Eradicate.—The eradication of English partialities is one of the most consoling expectations from the war.—TO WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 76. FORD ED., ix, 366. (M., Aug. 1812.)

360. ANGLOMANIA, Politics and.—The Anglicism of 1808, against which we are now struggling, is but the same thing [as the Toryism of 1777 and the Federalism of 1799] in still another form. It is a longing for a king, and an English King rather than any other.—TO JOHN LANGDON. v, 512. (M., 1810.)

361. — — — Anglomania, monarchy, and separation are the principles of the Essex federalists. Anglomania and monarchy, those of the Hamiltonians, and Anglomania alone, that of the portion of the people who call themselves federalists.—TO JOHN MELISH. vi, 96. FORD ED., ix, 375. (M., 1813.)

362. ANGLOMANIA, Servile.—I wish any events could induce us to cease to copy such a model, [the British government,] and to assume the dignity of being original. They had their paper system, stockjobbing, speculations, public debt, moneyed interest, &c., and all this was contrived for us. They raised their cry against jacobinism and revolutionists, we against democratic societies and anti-federalists; their alarmists sounded insurrection, ours marched an army to look for one, but they could not find it. I wish the parallel may stop here, and that we may avoid, instead of imitating, a general bankruptcy and disastrous war.—TO HORATIO GATES. iv, 178. FORD ED., vii, 130. (Pa., 1797.)

363. ANGLOPHOBIA, Washington's Cabinet and.—The Anglophobia has seized violently on three members of our council. This sets almost every day on questions of neutrality. * * * Everything hangs upon the opinion of a single person [Edmund Randolph], and that the most indecisive one I ever had to do business with. He always contrives to agree in principle with one but in conclusion with the other. Anglophobia, secret Anti-Gallomany, a federalisme outrée and a present ease in his circumstances not usual, have decided the complexion of our dispositions, and our proceedings towards the conspirators against human liberty, and the asserters of it, which is unjustifiable in principle, in interest, and in respect to the wishes of our constituents.—TO JAMES MADISON. iii, 556. FORD ED., vi, 250. (May 1793.)

— ANIMALS, Do they Degenerate in America ?—See BUFFON.

364. ANIMOSITIES, Individual.—The great cause which divides our countries is not to be decided by individual animosities. The harmony of private societies cannot weaken national efforts. To contribute by neighborly intercourse and attention to make others happy, is the shortest and surest way of being happy ourselves. As these sentiments seem to have directed your conduct, we should be as unwise as illiberal, were we not to preserve the same temper of mind.—TO GEN. WILLIAM PHILLIPS. D. L. J., 53. (1779.)

365. ANIMOSITIES, National.—The animosities of sovereigns are temporary, and may be allayed; but those which seize the whole body of a people, and of a people, too, who dictate their own measures, produce calamities of long duration.*—TO C. W. F. DUMAS. i, 553. (P., 1786.)

366. ANIMOSITIES, Political.—Party animosities here have raised a wall of separation between those who differ in political sentiments. They must love misery indeed who would rather, at the sight of an honest man, feel the torment of hatred and aversion than the benign spasms of benevolence and esteem.—TO MRS. CHURCH. FORD ED., vi, 116. (Pa., Oct. 1792.)

367. — — — While I cherish with feeling the recollections of my friends, I banish from my mind all political animosities which might disturb its tranquillity, or the happiness I derive from my present pursuits.—TO WILLIAM DUANE. v, 532. (M., 1810.)

368. ANIMOSITIES, Rekindling.—Peace with all the world, and a quiet descent through the remainder of my time, are now so necessary to my happiness that I am unwilling, by the expression of any opinion before the public, to rekindle ancient animosi-

369. ANNUITIES, Government Loans and.—Annuities for single lives are also beyond our powers, because the single life may pass the term of a generation. This last practice is objectionable too, as encouraging celibacy, and the disinherison of heirs.—To J. W. EPPEs. vi, 198. FORD ED., ix, 397. (P. F., 1813.) See GENERATIONS.

370. ANONYMOUS WRITING, Newspaper.—I never did in my life, either by myself or by any other, have a sentence of mine inserted in a newspaper without putting my name to it; and I believe I never shall.—To JOHN ADAMS. iii, 272. FORD ED., v, 355. (Pa., 1791.)

371. ANTI-FEDERALISTS, Jefferson and.—You say that I have been dished up to you as an anti-federalist, and ask me if it be just. My opinion was never worthy enough of notice to merit citing; but since you ask it, I will tell it to you. I am not a federalist, because I never submitted the whole system of my opinions to the creed of any party of men whatever, in religion, in philosophy, in politics, or in anything else, where I was capable of thinking for myself. Such an addiction is the last degradation of a free and moral agent. If I could not go to heaven but with a party, I would not go there at all. Therefore, I am not of the party of federalists. But I am much farther from that of the anti-federalists. I approved from the first moment of the great mass of what is in the new Constitution; the consolidation of the government; the organization into executive, legislative and judiciary; the subdivision of the legislative; the happy compromise of interests between the great and little States, by the different manner of voting in the different Houses; the voting by persons instead of States; the qualified negative on laws given to the Executive, which, however, I should have liked better if associated with the judiciary also, as in New York; and the power of taxation. I thought at first that the latter might have been limited. A little reflection soon convinced me it ought not to be. What I disapproved from the first moment also, was the want of a bill of rights, to guard liberty against the legislative as well as the executive branches of the government; that is to say, to secure freedom in religion, freedom of the press, freedom from monopolies, freedom from unlawful imprisonment, freedom from a permanent military, and a trial by jury in all cases determinable by the laws of the land. I disapproved also the perpetual re-eligibility of the President. To these points of disapprobation I adhere. My first wish was that the nine first conventions might accept the Constitution, as the means of securing to us the great mass of good it contained, and that the four last might reject it, as the means of obtaining amendments. But I was corrected in this wish the moment I saw the much better plan of Massachusetts, and which had never occurred to me. With respect to the declaration of rights, I suppose the majority of the United States are of my opinion; for I apprehend all the anti-federalists and a very respectable proportion of the federalists think that such a declaration should now be annexed. The enlightened part of Europe have given us the greatest credit for inventing this instrument of security for the rights of the people, and have been not a little surprised to see us so soon give it up. With respect to the re-eligibility of the President, I find myself differing from the majority of my countrymen: for I think there are but three States out of the eleven which have desired an alteration of this. And, indeed, since the thing is established, I would wish it not to be altered during the life of our great leader, whose executive talents are superior to those, I believe, of any man in the world, and who, alone, by the authority of his name and the confidence reposed in his perfect integrity, is fully qualified to put the new government so under way, as to secure it against the efforts of opposition. But, having derived from our error all the good there was in it, I hope we shall correct it, the moment we can no longer have the same name at the helm. These are my sentiments, by which you will see I was right in saying I am neither federalist nor anti-federalist; that I am of neither party, nor yet a trimmer between parties. These, my opinions, I wrote within a few hours after I had read the Constitution, to one or two friends in America. I had not then read one single word printed on the subject. I never had an opinion in politics or religion which I was afraid to own. A costive reserve on these subjects might have procured me more esteem from some people, but less from myself. My great wish is to go on in a strict but silent performance of my duty; to avoid attracting notice, and to keep my name out of newspapers, because I find the pain of a little censure, even when it is unfounded, is more acute than the pleasure of much praise. The attaching circumstance of my present office [Minister] is that I can do its duties unseen by those for whom they are done.—To F. HOPKINSON. ii, 585. FORD ED., v, 75. (P. March 13, 1789.)

372. ANTI-FEDERALISTS, Malevolence of.—Anti-federalism is not yet dead in this country. The gentlemen who opposed the new Constitution retain a good deal of malevolence towards the new government. Henry is its avowed foe.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 136. (Ep., Dec. 1789.)

373. ANTI-FEDERALISTS, Overthrown.—The opposition to our new Constitution has almost totally disappeared. Some few indeed had gone such lengths in their declarations of hostility that they feel it awkward perhaps to come over; but the amendments proposed by Congress have brought over almost all their followers. * * * The little vautrien, Rhode Island, will come over with a little more time.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE iii, 132. FORD ED., v, 152. (N. Y., April 1790.)

374. ANTIQUITIES, American.—I thank you for the extract of the letter * * * on the antiquities found in the western country. I wish that the persons who go thither would make very exact descriptions of what they see of that kind, without forming any theories. The moment a person forms a theory, his imagination sees, in every object, only the traits which favor that theory. But it is too early to form theories on those antiquities. We must wait with patience till more facts are collected. I wish your Philosophical Society would collect exact descriptions of the several monuments as yet known, and insert them naked in their Transactions. Patience and observation may enable us in time, to solve the problem, whether those who formed the scattering monuments in our western country, were colonies sent off from Mexico, or the founders of Mexico itself? Whether both were the descendants or the progenitors of the Asiatic red men.—To CHARLES THOMSON. ii, 276. (Pa., 1787.)

375. ANTIQUITIES, Roman.—From Lyons to Nismes I have been nourished with the remains of Roman grandeur. * * * At Vienne, the Prætorian Palace, as it is called, comparable, for its fine proportions, to the Maison quarrée, defaced by the barbarians who have converted it to its present purpose, its beautiful fluted Corinthian columns cut out, in part, to make space for Gothic windows, and hewed down, in the residue, to the plane of the building, was enough * * * to disturb my composure. At Orange, I thought of you. I was sure you had seen with pleasure the sublime triumphal arch of Marius at the entrance of the city. I went then to the Arenæ. Would you believe that in this eighteenth century, in France, under the reign of Louis XVI., they are at this moment pulling down the circular wall of this superb remain, to pave a road? And that, too, from a hill which is itself an entire mass of stone, just as fit, and more accessible. * * * I thought of you again * * * at the Pont du Gard, a sublime antiquity, and well-preserved; but most of all here [Nismes], whose Roman taste, genius and magnificence excite ideas analogous to yours at every step. * * * You will not expect news. Were I to attempt to give it, I should tell you stories one thousand years old. I should detail to you the intrigues of the courts of the Cæsars, how they affect us here, the oppressions of their prætors, prefects, &c. I am immersed in antiquities from morning to night. For me, the city of Rome is actually existing in all the splendor of its empire. I am filled with alarms for the event of the irruptions daily making on us, by the Goths, the Visigoths, Ostrogoths, and Vandals, lest they should reconquer us to our original barbarism.—To LA COMTESSE DE TESSE. ii, 132. (N., 1787.)

376. APOSTASY, Defined.—It is to be considered as apostasy only when they [schismatizing republicans] purchase the votes of federalists with a participation in honor and power.—To THOMAS COOPER. v, 121. FORD ED., ix, 102. (W., 1807.)

377. APOSTASY, Punished.—As to the effect of Mr. [Patrick] Henry's name among the people, I have found it crumble like a dried leaf, the moment they became satisfied of his apostasy.—To TENCH COXE. FORD ED., vii, 381. (M., 1799.)

378. APPLAUSE, Courting.—I am not reconciled to the idea of a Chief Magistrate parading himself through the several States, as an object of public gaze, and in quest of applause which, to be valuable, should be purely voluntary. I had rather acquire silent good will by a faithful discharge of my duties, than owe expressions of it to my putting myself in the way of receiving them.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. v, 102. FORD ED., ix, 77. (W., 1807.)

379. APPLAUSE, Deserve.—Go on deserving applause, and you will be sure to meet with it; and the way to deserve it is to be good, and to be industrious.—To J. W. EPPES. ii, 192. (P., 1787.)

380. APPOINTMENT, The Power of.—The Constitution, having declared that the President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls * * * has taken care to circumscribe this [power] within very strict limits: for it gives the nomination of the foreign agents to the President, the appointments to him and the Senate jointly, and the commissioning to the President. This analysis calls our attention to the strict import of each term. To nominate must be to propose. Appointment seems that act of the will which constitutes or makes the agent, and the commission is the public evidence of it.—OPINION ON POWERS OF SENATE. vii, 465. FORD ED., v, 161. (1790.)

— APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.—See OFFICE.

381. APPORTIONMENT, Basis of.—The number of Representatives for each county, or borough, shall be so proportioned to the number of its qualified electors, that the whole number of representatives shall not exceed 300, nor be less than 125. For the present there shall be one representative for every-qualified electors in each county or borough; but whenever this, or any future proportion, shall be likely to exceed or fall short of the limits before mentioned, it shall be again adjusted by the House of Representatives.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 15. (June 1776.)

382. APPORTIONMENT RATIO, Arbitrary.—If the [ratio of] representation [is] obtained by any process not prescribed in the Constitution, it becomes arbitrary and inadmissible.—OPINION ON APPORTIONMENT BILL. vii, 595. FORD ED., v, 494. (1792.)

383. APPORTIONMENT RATIO, Common.—The Constitution has declared that representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers. * * * That is to say. they shall be apportioned by some common ratio—for proportion and ratio are equivalent words; and in the definition of proportion among numbers, that they have a ratio common to all, or in other words, a common divisor.—OPINION ON APPORTIONMENT BILL. vii, 594. FORD ED., v, 493. (April 1792.)

384. APPORTIONMENT RATIO, Fractions and.—It will be said that, though, for taxes there may always be found a divisor which will apportion them among the States according to numbers exactly, without leaving any remainder, yet, for representatives, there can be no such common ratio, or divisor, which, applied to the several numbers, will divide them exactly, without a remainder or fraction. I answer, then, that taxes must be divided exactly, and representatives as nearly as the nearest ratio will admit; and the fractions must be neglected, because the Constitution calls absolutely that there be an apportionment or common ratio, and if any fractions result from the operation, it has left them unprovided for. In fact it could not but foresee that such fractions would result, and it meant to submit to them. It knew they would be in favor of one part of the Union at one time, and of another at another, so as, in the end, to balance occasional irregularities.—OPINION ON APPORTIONMENT BILL. vii, 596. FORD ED., v, 495. (1792.)

385. APPORTIONMENT RATIO, Nearest Common.—The phrase [of the Constitution] that “the number of representatives shall not exceed one for every 30,000,” is violated by this bill which has given to eight States a number exceeding one for every 30,000, to wit, one for every 27,770. In answer to this, it is said that this phrase may mean either the 30,000 in each State, or the 30,000 in the whole Union, and that in the latter case it serves only to find the amount of the whole representation; which, in the present state of population, is 120 members. Suppose the phrase might bear both meanings, which will common sense apply to it? Which did the universal understanding of our country apply to it? Which did the Senate and Representatives apply to it during the pendency of the first bill, and even till an advanced stage of this second bill, when an ingenious gentleman found out the doctrine of fractions, a doctrine so difficult and inobvious, as to be rejected at first sight by the very persons who afterwards became its most zealous advocates? The phrase stands in the midst of a number of others, every one of which relates to States in their separate capacity. Will not plain common sense, then, understand it, like the rest of its context, to relate to States in their separate capacities? But if the phrase of one for 30,000 is only meant to give the aggregate of representatives, and not at all to influence their apportionment among the States, then the 120 being once found, in order to apportion them, we must recur to the former rule which does it according to the numbers of the respective States; and we must take the nearest common divisor, as the ratio of distribution, that is to say, that divisor which, applied to every State, gives to them such numbers as, added together, come nearest to 120. This nearest common ratio will be found to be 28,058, and will distribute 119 of the 120 members leaving only a single residuary one. It will be found, too, to place 96,648 fractional numbers in the eight northernmost States, and 105,582 in the seven southernmost. * * * Whatever may have been the intention, the effect of neglecting the nearest divisor (which leaves but one residuary member), and adopting a distant one (which leaves eight), is merely to take a member from New York and Pennsylvania, each, and give them to Vermont and New Hampshire. But, it will be said, this is giving more than one for 30,000. True, but has it not been just said that the one for 30,000 is prescribed only to fix the aggregate number, and that we are not to mind it when we come to apportion them among the States? That for this we must recur to the former rule which distributes them according to the numbers in each State? Besides does not the bill itself apportion among seven of the States by the ratio of 27,770? which is much more than one for 30,000.—OPINION ON APPORTIONMENT BILL. vii, 597. FORD ED., v, 496. (1792.)

386. APPORTIONMENT RATIO, Two Divisors.—Instead of such a single common ratio, or uniform divisor, as prescribed by the Constitution, the bill has applied two ratios, at least, to the different States, to wit, that of 30,026 to the seven following: Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and Georgia; and that of 27,770 to the eight others, namely: Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, North Carolina, and South Carolina. * * * And if two ratios be applied, then fifteen may, and the distribution become arbitrary, instead of being apportioned to numbers. Another member of the clause of the Constitution * * * says “The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every 30,000, but each State shall have at least one representative.” This last phrase proves that it had no contemplation that all fractions, or numbers below the common ratio were to be unrepresented; and it provides especially that in the case of a State whose whole number shall be below the common ratio, one representative shall be given to it. This is the single instance where it allows representation to any smaller number than the common ratio, and by providing especially for it in this, shows it was understood that, without special provision, the smaller number would in this case, be involved in the general principle.—OPINION ON APPORTIONMENT BILL. vii, 596. FORD ED., v, 495. (1792.)

387. APPORTIONMENT RATIO, Surplus Members.—Where a phrase is susceptible of two meanings, we ought certainly to adopt that which will bring upon us the fewest inconveniences. Let us weigh those resulting from both constructions. From that giving to each State a member for every 30,000 in that State results the single inconvenience that there may be large portions unrepresented, but it being a mere hazard on which State this will fall, hazard will equalize it in the long run. From the others result exactly the same inconvenience. A thousand cases may be imagined to prove it. Take one. Suppose eight of the States had 45,000 inhabitants each, and the other seven 44,999 each, that is to say, each one less than each of the others. The aggregate would be 674,993, and the number of representatives at one for 30,000 of the aggregate, would be 22. Then, after giving one member to each State, distribute the seven residuary members among the seven highest fractions, and though the difference of population be only an unit, the representation would be double. * * *

Here a single inhabitant the more would count as 30,000. Nor is this case imaginable only, it will resemble the real one whenever the fractions happen to be pretty equal through the whole States. The numbers of our census happen by accident to give the fractions all very small, or very great, so as to produce the strongest case of inequality that could possibly have occurred, and which may never occur again. The probability is that the fractions will descend gradually from 29,999 to 1. The inconvenience, then, of large unrepresented fractions attends both constructions; and while the most obvious construction is liable to no other, that of the bill incurs many and grievous ones. 1. If you permit the large fraction in one State to choose a representative for one of the small fractions in another State, you take from the latter its election, which constitutes real representation, and substitute a virtual representation of the disfranchised fractions. * * *

2. The bill does not say that it has given the residuary representatives to the greatest fraction: though in fact it has done so. It seems to have avoided establishing that into a rule, lest it might not suit on another occasion. Perhaps it may be found the next time more convenient to distribute them among the smaller States; at another time among the larger States; at other times according to any other crotchet which ingenuity may invent, and the combinations of the day give strength to carry; or they may do it arbitrarily by open bargains and cabal. In short, this construction introduces into Congress a scramble, or a vendue for the surplus members. It generates waste of time, hot blood, and may at some time, when the passions are high, extend a disagreement between the two Houses, to the perpetual loss of the thing, as happens now in the Pennsylvania Assembly; whereas the other construction reduces the apportionment always to an arithmetical operation, about which no two men can ever possibly differ. 3. It leaves in full force the violation of the precept which declares that representatives shall be apportioned among the States according to their numbers i. e., by some common ratio.—OPINION ON APPORTIONMENT BILL. vii, 599. FORD ED., v, 498. (1792.)

388. APPORTIONMENT RATIO, Tricks in.—No invasions of the Constitution are fundamentally so dangerous as the tricks played on their own numbers, apportionment, and other circumstances respecting themselves, and affecting their legal qualifications to legislate for the Union.—OPINION ON APPORTIONMENT BILL. vii, 601. FORD ED., v, 500. (1792.)

389. APPORTIONMENT BILL, Opposition to.—The ground of the opposition to the apportionment bill has been founded on the discovery that the ratio of 30,000 gave smaller fractions to the southern than to the eastern States, and to prevent this a variety of propositions have been made, among which is the following: To apply the ratio of 30,000 to the aggregate population of the Union (not that of the individual States) which will give 120 members, and then apportion those members among the several States by as many different ratios as there are States; or to the population of each State, giving them one for every 30,000 as far as it will go, making 112, and then distribute the remaining eight members among those States having the highest fractions of which 5 will be given to the States east of this [Pennsylvania]. * * *

The effect of this principle must be deemed a very pernicious one, and in my opinion [is a] subversion of that contained in the Constitution, which in the 3d paragraph of the 2d Section, first Article, founds the representation on the population of each State, in terms as explicit as it could well have been done. Besides it takes the fractions of some States to supply the deficiency of others, and thus makes the people of Georgia the instrument of giving a member to New Hampshire. * * *

On our part, the principle will never be yielded, for when such obvious encroachments are made on the plain meaning of the Constitution, the bond of Union ceases to be the equal measure of justice to all its parts. On theirs, a very persevering firmness is likewise observed. They appear to me to play a hazardous game. The government secures them many important blessings, all those which it gives to us and many more, and yet with these they seem not to be satisfied.—TO ARCHIBALD STUART. FORD ED., v, 453. (Pa., March 1792.)

390. APPORTIONMENT BILL, Veto of Advised.—Viewing this bill either as a violation of the Constitution, or as giving an inconvenient exposition of its words, is it a case wherein the President ought to interpose his negative? I think it is. * * *

The majorities by which this bill has been carried (to wit: of one in the Senate and two in the Representatives) show how divided the opinions were there. The whole of both Houses admit the Constitution will bear the other exposition, whereas the minorities in both deny it will bear that of the bill. The application of any one ratio is intelligible to the people and will, therefore, be approved, whereas the complex operations of this bill will never be comprehended by them, and though they may acquiesce, they cannot approve what they do not understand.—OPINION ON APPORTIONMENT BILL. vii, 601. FORD ED., v, 500. (1792.)

391. APPORTIONMENT BILL, Veto Message.—The Constitution has prescribed that representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers; and there is no one proportion or division which, applied to the respective numbers of the States, will yield the number and allotment of representatives proposed by the bill. The Constitution has also provided that the number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, which restriction is by the contract, and by fair and obvious construction, to be applied to the separate and respective numbers of the States; and the bill has allotted to eight of the States more than one for thirty thousand.—DRAFT FOR VETO MESSAGE. FORD ED., v, 501. (April 1792.)

392. APPORTIONMENT BILL, History of Veto.—The President [Washington] * * * [referred] to the representation bill, which he had now in his possession for the tenth day. I had before given him my opinion in writing, that the method of apportionment was contrary to the Constitution. He agreed that it was contrary to the common understanding of that instrument, and to what was understood at the time by the makers of it; that yet it would bear the construction which the bill put, and he observed that the vote for and against the bill was perfectly geographical, a northern against a southern vote, and he feared he should be thought to be taking side with a southern party. I admitted this motive of delicacy, but that it should not induce him to do wrong; urged the dangers to which the scramble for the fractionary members would always lead. He here expressed his fear that there would, ere long, be a separation of the Union; that the public mind seemed dissatisfied and tending to this. He went home, sent for Randolph, the Attorney General, desired him to get Mr. Madison immediately and come to me, and if we three concurred in opinion that he should negative the bill, he desired to hear nothing more about it, but that we would draw the instrument for him to sign. They came. Our minds had been before made up. We drew the instrument. Randolph carried it to him, and told him we all concurred in it. He walked with him to the door, and as if he still wished to get off, he said, "and you say you approve of this yourself." "Yes, Sir," says Randolph, "I do upon my honor." He sent it to the House of Representatives instantly. A few of the hottest friends of the bill expressed passion, but the majority were satisfied, and both in and out of doors, it gave pleasure to have, at length, an instance of the negative being exercised.—THE ANAS. ix, 115. FORD ED., i, 192. April 1792.)

393. APPROBATION, Consolation in.—Though I have made up my mind not to suffer calumny to disturb my tranquillity, yet I retain all my sensibilities for the approbation of the good and just. That is, indeed, the chief consolation for the hatred of so many, who, without the least personal knowledge, and on the sacred evidence of "Porcupine" and Fenno alone, cover me with their implacable hatred. The only return I will ever make to them will be to do them all the good I can, in spite of their teeth.—TO SAMUEL SMITH. iv, 256. FORD ED., vii, 279. (M., 1798.)

394. — — — I thank God for an opportunity of retiring without censure, and carrying with me the most consoling proofs of public approbation.—TO DUFONT DE NEMOURS. v, 432. (W., 1809.)

395. APPROBATION OF THE DISCRIMINATING.—With those who wish to think amiss of me, I have learned to be perfectly indifferent; but where I know a mind to be ingenuous, and to need only truth to set it to rights, I cannot be as passive.—TO MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 560. FORD ED., viii, 311. (M., 1804.)

396. APPROBATION BY THE GOOD.—To be praised by those who themselves deserve all praise, is a gratification of high order. Their approbation who, having been high in office themselves, have information and talents to guide their judgment, is a consolation deeply felt. A conscientious devotion to republican government, like charity in religion, has obtained for me much indulgence from my fellow citizens, and the aid of able counsellors has guided me through many difficulties.—TO LARKIN SMITH. v, 441. (M., April 1809.)

397. APPROBATION, Intelligent.—It has been a great happiness to me, to have received the approbation of so great a portion of my fellow citizens, and particularly of those who have opportunities of inquiring, reading and deciding for themselves.—TO C. F. WELLES. v, 484. (M., 1809.)

398. APPROBATION, Legislative.—I learn with pleasure the approbation, by the General Assembly of Rhode Island, of the principles declared by me [in the inaugural address]; principles which flowed sincerely from the heart and judgment, and which, with sincerity, will be pursued. While acting on them, I ask only to be judged with truth and candor.—TO THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY. iv, 397. (W., May 1801.)

399. — — — For the approbation which the Legislature of Vermont has been pleased to express of the principles and measures pursued in the management of their affairs, I am sincerely thankful; and should I be so fortunate as to carry into retirement the equal approbation and good will of my fellow citizens generally, it will be the comfort of my future days, and will close a service of forty years with the only reward it ever wished.*—R. TO A. VERMONT LEGISLATURE. viii, 121. (1807.)

400. — — — The assurances of your approbation, and that my conduct has given satisfaction to my fellow citizens generally, will be an important ingredient in my future happiness.—R. TO A. VIRGINIA ASSEMBLY. viii, 148. (1809.)

401. APPROBATION OF NEIGHBORS.—It is a sufficient happiness to me to know that my fellow citizens of the country generally entertain for me the kind sentiments which have prompted this proposition [to meet him on his way home] without giving to so many the trouble of leaving their homes to meet a single individual. I shall have opportunities of taking them individually by the hand at our court house and other public places, and of exchanging assurances of mutual esteem. Certainly it is the greatest consolation to me to know, that in returning to the bosom of my native country, I shall be again in the midst of their kind affections: and I can say with truth that my return to them will make me happier than I have been since I left them.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. v, 431. FORD ED., ix, 247. (W., Feb. 1809.)

402. APPROBATION, Old friends and.—The approbation of my ancient friends is, above all things, the most grateful to my heart. They know for what objects we relinquished the delights of domestic society, tranquillity and science, and committed ourselves to the ocean of revolution, to wear out the only life God has given us here in scenes the benefits of which will accrue only to those who follow us.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 424. (W., 1801.)

403. APPROBATION, Popular.—The approbation of my constituents is truly the most valued reward for any services it has fallen to my lot to render them—their confidence and esteem the greatest consolation of my life.—R. To A. MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE. viii, 116. (Feb. 1807.)

404. — — — In a virtuous and free State, no rewards can be so pleasing to sensible minds, as those which include the approbation of our fellow citizens.—INAUGURATION SPEECH AS GOVERNOR. FORD ED., ii, 187. (1779.)

405. APPROBATION, Principle and.—Our part is to pursue with steadiness what is right, turning neither to right nor left for the intrigues or popular delusions of the day, assured that the public approbation will in the end be with us.—To GENERAL BRECKENRIDGE. vii, 238. (M., 1822.)

406. APPROBATION, Rewarded by.—The approbation of my fellow citizens is the richest reward I can receive.—To RICHARD M. JOHNSON. v, 256. (W., 1808.)

407. — — — The approving voice of our fellow citizens, for endeavors to be useful, is the greatest of all earthly rewards.*—R. To A. NEW LONDON METHODISTS. viii, 147. (1809.)

408. — — — If, in my retirement to the humble station of a private citizen, I am accompanied with the esteem and approbation of my fellow citizens, trophies obtained by the blood-stained steel, or the tattered flags of the tented field, will never be envied.—R. To A. MARYLAND REPUBLICANS. viii, 165. (1809.)

409. APPROBATION, Right and.—I have ever found in my progress through life,

* Jefferson retired with a reputation and popularity hardly inferior to that of Washington.—John T. Morse, Jr., Life of Jefferson. 318.

that, acting for the public, if we do always what is right, the approbation denied in the beginning will surely follow us in the end. It is from posterity we are to expect remuneration for the sacrifices we are making for their service, of time, quiet and good will.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vii, 394. (M., 1825.)

410. APPROBATION, Undeserved.—I have never claimed any other merit than of good intentions, sensible that in the choice of measures, error of judgment has too often had its influence; and that with whatever indulgence my countrymen * * * have been so kind as to view my course, yet they would certainly not know me in the picture here drawn, and would, I fear, say in the words of the poet, "praise undeserved is satire in disguise." Were, therefore, the piece to be prepared for the press, I should certainly entreat you to revise that part with a severe eye.—To AMELOT DE LA CROIX. v, 422. (W., 1809.)

411. APPROBATION BY THE VIRTUOUS.—Sentiments of esteem from men of worth, of reflection, and of pure attachment to republican government, are my consolation against the calumnies of which it has suited certain writers to make me the object. Under these I hope I shall never bend.—To HARRY INNES. FORD ED., vii, 383. (M., 1799.)

412. APPROPRIATIONS, Borrowing from.—There are funds sufficient and regularly appropriated to the fitting out [ships], but for manning the proper funds are exhausted, consequently we must borrow from other funds, and state the matter to Congress.—ANAS. FORD ED., i, 308. (1805.)

413. APPROPRIATIONS, The Constitution and.—In the answer to Turreau, I think it would be better to lay more stress on the constitutional bar to our furnishing the money, because it would apply in an occasion of peace as well as war. I submit to you, therefore, * * * the inserting, "but, in indulging these dispositions, the President is bound to stop at the limits prescribed by our Constitution and law to the authorities in his hands. One of the limits is that 'no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law,' and no law having made any appropriation of money for any purpose similar to that expressed in your letter, it lies, of course, beyond his constitutional powers."—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 474. (M., Sep. 1806.)

414. APPROPRIATIONS, Discretion over.—The question whether the Berceau was to be delivered up under the treaty was of Executive cognizance entirely, and without appeal. So was the question as to the condition in which she should be delivered. And it is as much an invasion of its independence for a coordinate branch to call for the reasons of the decision, as it would be to call on the Supreme Court for its reasons on any judiciary decision. If an appropriation were asked, the Legislature would have a right to ask reasons. But in this case they had confided an appropriation (for naval contingencies) to the discretion of the Executive. Under this appropriation our predecessors bought the vessel (for there was no order of Congress authorizing them to buy) and began her repairs; we completed them. I will not say that a very gross abuse of discretion in a past appropriation would not furnish ground to the Legislature to take notice of it. In what form is not now necessary to decide. But so far from a gross abuse, the decision in this case was correct, honorable and advantageous to the nation. I cannot see to what legitimate objects any resolution of the House on the subject can lead; and if one is passed on ground not legitimate, our duty will be to resist it.—TO WILLIAM B. GILES. FORD ED., viii, 142. (April 1802.)

415. APPROPRIATIONS, Diverting.—The diversion of the [French] money from its legal appropriation offers a flaw against the Executive which may place them in the wrong.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 179. (1793.)

416. — — — If it should appear that the Legislature has done their part in furnishing the money for the French nation, and that the Executive departments have applied it to other purposes, then it will certainly be desirable that we get back on legal ground as soon as possible, by pressing on the domestic funds and availing ourselves of any proper opportunity which may be furnished of replacing the money to the foreign creditors.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 177. (1793.)

417. APPROPRIATIONS, Estimates and.—I like your idea of kneading all Hamilton's little scraps and fragments into one batch, and adding to it a complementary sum, which, while it forms it into a single mass from which everything is to be paid, will enable us, should a breach of appropriation ever be charged on us, to prove that the sum appropriated, and more, has been applied to its specific object.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 428. FORD ED., viii, 140. (W., 1802.)

418. — — — Congress, aware that too minute a specification has its evil as well as a too general one, does not make the estimate a part of their law, but gives a sum in gross, trusting the Executive discretion for that year, and that sum only; so in other departments, as of War, for instance, the estimate of the Secretary specifies all the items of clothing, subsistence, pay, &c., of the army. And Congress throws this into such masses as they think best, to wit, a sum in gross for clothing, another for subsistence, a third for pay, &c., binding up the Executive discretion only by the sum, and the object generalized to a certain degree. The minute details of the estimate are thus dispensed with in point of obligation, and the discretion of the officer is enlarged to the limits of the classification which Congress thinks it best for the public interest to make.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, (1804.)

419. APPROPRIATIONS, Executive power over.—The Executive * * * has the power, though not the right, to apply money contrary to its legal appropriations. Cases may be imagined, however, where it would be their duty to do this. But they must be cases of extreme necessity. The payment of interest to the domestic creditors has been mentioned as one of the causes of diverting the foreign fund. But this is not an object of greater necessity than that to which it was legally appropriated. It is taking the money from our foreign creditors to pay it to the domestic ones; a preference which neither justice, gratitude, nor the estimation in which these two descriptions of creditors are held in this country will justify. The payment of the Army and the daily expenses of the government have been also mentioned as objects of withdrawing this money. These indeed are pressing objects, and might produce that degree of distressing necessity which would be a justification.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 176. (Pa., 1793.)

420. APPROPRIATIONS, Expenditures and.—A violation of a law making appropriations of money, is a violation of that section of the Constitution of the United States which requires that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequences of appropriations made by law.—GILES TREASURY RESOLUTIONS. FORD ED., vi, 168. (1793.)

421. APPROPRIATIONS, Specific.—It is essential to the due administration of the government of the United States, that laws making specific appropriations of money should be strictly observed by the Secretary of the Treasury thereof.—GILES TREASURY RESOLUTIONS. FORD ED., vi, 168. (1793.)

422. — — — In our care of the public contributions intrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition; by disallowing applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money; and by bringing back to a single department all accountabilities for money where the examination may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 10. FORD ED., viii, 120. (Dec. 1801.) See MONEY BILLS.

423. ARBITRATION, Offer of.—As to our dispute with Schweighauser and Dobrée, in the conversation I had with Dobrée at Nantes, he appeared to think so rationally on the subject, that I thought there would be no difficulty in accommodating it with him, and I wished rather to settle it by accommodation, than to apply to the minister. I afterwards had it intimated to him * * *, that I had it in idea to propose a reference to arbitrators. He expressed a cheerful concurrence in it. I thereupon made the proposition to him formally, by letter, mentioning particularly, that we would choose our arbitrators of some neutral nation, and, of preference, from among the Dutch refugees in Paris. I was surprised to receive an answer from him, wherein, after expressing his own readiness to accede to this proposition, he added, that on consulting with Mr. Puchilberg, he had declined it.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 496. (P., 1788.)

424. ——. I began by offering to Schweighauser and Dobrée an arbitration before honest and judicious men of a neutral nation. They declined this, and had the modesty to propose an arbitration before merchants of their own town. I gave them warning then, that as the offer on the part of a sovereign nation to submit to a private arbitration was an unusual condescendence, if they did not accept them, it would not be repeated, and that the United States would judge the case for themselves hereafter. They continued to decline it.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 365. (Pa., 1791.)

425. ARBORICULTURE, Coffee tree.—Bartram is extremely anxious to get a large supply of seeds of the Kentucky coffee tree. I told him I would use all my interest with you to obtain it, as I think I heard you say that some neighbors of yours had a large number of trees. Be so good as to take measures for bringing a good quantity, if possible, to Bartram when you come to Congress.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 569. FORD ED., vi, 279. (1793.)

426. ARBORICULTURE, Cork Oak.—I expect from the South of France some acorns of the cork oak, which I propose for your society [Agricultural], as I am persuaded they will succeed with you. I observed it to grow in England without shelter, not well, indeed, but so as to give hopes that it would do well with you.—To WILLIAM DRAYTON. i, 555. (P., 1786.)

427. ——. I sent you a parcel of acorns of the cork oak by Colonel Franks. To WILLIAM DRAYTON. ii, 202. (Pa., 1787.)

428. ——. I have been long endeavoring to procure the cork tree from Europe, but without success. A plant which I brought with me from Paris died after languishing some time, and of several parcels of acorns received from a correspondent at Marseilles, not one has ever vegetated. I shall continue my endeavors, although disheartened by the nonchalance of our southern fellow citizens, with whom alone they can thrive.—To JAMES RONALDSON. vi, 92. FORD ED., ix, 370. (M., Jan. 1813.)

429. ARBORICULTURE, Fruit trees.—Should you be able to send me any plants of good fruit, and especially of peaches and eating grapes, they will be thankfully received.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., viii, 16. (W., March 1801.)

— ARBORICULTURE, the Olive.—See OLIVE.

430. ARBORICULTURE, Pecan.—The pecan nut is, as you conjecture, the Illinois nut. The former is the vulgar name south of the Potomac, as also with the Indians and Spaniards, and enters also into the botanical name which is Juglans Pacan.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. ii, 74. (P., 1786.)

431. ——. Procure me two or three hundred pecan nuts from the western country.—To F. HOPKINSON. i, 506. (P., 1786.)

432. ——. I thank you for the pecan nuts.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 156. FORD ED., iv, 396. (P., 1787.)

433. ARBORICULTURE, Sensitive Plant.—Your attention to one burthen I laid on you, encourages me to remind you of another, which is the sending me some of the seeds of the Dionaea Muscipula, or Venus fly-trap, called also with you, I believe, the Sensitive Plant.—To MR. HAWKINS. ii, 3. (P., 1786.)

434. ARBORICULTURE, Trees.—I send a packet of the seeds of trees which I would wish Anthony to sow in a large nursery, noting well their names.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. FORD ED., iv, 344. (P., 1786.)

435. ARBORICULTURE, Vines.—I am making a collection of vines for wine and for the table.—To A. CAREY. i, 508. (P., 1786.)

436. ARCHITECTURE, Bad.—The genius of architecture seems to have shed its maledictions over this land [Virginia].—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 394. FORD ED., iii, 258. (1782.)

437. ARCHITECTURE, Beauty in.—How is a taste in this beautiful art to be formed in our countrymen unless we avail ourselves of every occasion when public buildings are to be erected, of presenting to them models for their study and imitation?—To JAMES MADISON. i, 433. (P., 1785.)

438. ARCHITECTURE, Brick, Stone, Wood.—All we shall do in the way of reformation will produce no permanent improvement to our country, while the unhappy prejudice prevails that houses of brick or stone are less wholesome than those of wood. A dew is often observed on the walls of the former in rainy weather, and the most obvious solution is, that the rain has penetrated through these walls. The following facts, however, are sufficient to prove the error of this solution: 1. This dew on the walls appears when there is no rain, if the state of the atmosphere be moist. 2. It appears on the partition as well as the exterior walls. 3. So, also on pavements of brick or stone. 4. It is more copious in proportion as the walls are thicker; the reverse of which ought to be the case, if this hypothesis were just. If cold water be poured into a vessel of stone, or glass, a dew forms instantly on the outside; but if it be poured into a vessel of wood, there is no such appearance. It is not supposed, in the first case, that the water has exuded through the glass, but that it is precipitated from the circumambient air; as the humid particles of vapor, passing from the boiler of an alembic through its refrigerant, are precipitated from the air, in which they are suspended, on the internal surface of the refrigerant. Walls of brick or stone act as the refrigerant in this instance. They are sufficiently cold to condense and precipitate the moisture suspended in the air of the room, when it is heavily charged therewith. But walls of wood are not so. The question then is, whether the air in which this moisture is left floating, or that which is deprived of it, be most wholesome? In both cases, the remedy is easy. A little fire kindled in the room, whenever the air is damp, prevents the precipitation on the walls; and this practice, found healthy in the warmest as well as coldest seasons, is as necessary in a wooden as in a stone or brick house. (I do not mean to say, that the rain never penetrates through walls of brick. On the contrary, I have seen instances of it. But with us it is only through the northern and eastern walls of the house, after a north-easterly storm, these being the only ones which continue long enough to force through the walls. This, however, happens too rarely to give a just character of unwholesomeness to such houses. In a house, the walls of which are of well-burnt brick and good mortar, I have seen the rain penetrate through but twice in a dozen or fifteen years. The inhabitants of Europe, who dwell chiefly in houses of stone or brick, are surely as healthy as those of Virginia. These houses have the advantage, too, of being warmer in winter and cooler in summer than those of wood; of being cheaper in their first construction, where lime is convenient, and infinitely more durable. The latter consideration renders it of great importance to eradicate this prejudice from the minds of our countrymen. A country whose buildings are of wood, can never increase in its improvements to any considerable degree. Their duration is highly estimated at fifty years. Every half century then our country becomes a tabula rasa, whereon we have to set out anew, as in the first moment of seating it. Whereas when buildings are of durable materials, every new edifice is an actual and permanent acquisition to the State, adding to its value as well as to its ornament.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 395. FORD ED., iii, 258. (1782.)

439. ARCHITECTURE, Delight in.—Architecture is my delight, and putting up and pulling down, one of my favorite amusements.—RAYNER'S LIFE OF JEFFERSON. 524.

440. ARCHITECTURE, Economy in.—I have scribbled some general notes on the plan of a house you enclosed. I have done more. I have endeavored to throw the same area, the same extent of walls, the same number of rooms, and of the same sizes, into another form so as to offer a choice to the builder. Indeed, I varied my plan by showing what it would be with alcove bed rooms, to which I am so much attached.—TO JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 259. (Pa., 1793.)

441. ARCHITECTURE, English.—English architecture is in the most wretched style I ever saw, not meaning to except America, where it is bad, nor even Virginia, where it is worse than in any other part of America, which I have seen.—TO JOHN PAGE. i, 550. FORD ED., iv, 214. (P., 1786.)

442. ARCHITECTURE, Fascination of.—Here I am gazing whole hours at the son quarreé, like a lover at his mistress.

The stocking weavers and silk spinners around it consider me a hypochondriac Englishman, about to write with a pistol the last chapter of his history. This is the second time I have been in love since I left Paris. The first was with a Diana at the Chateau de Laye-Epinaye in Beaujolais, a delicious morsel of sculpture, by M. A. Slodtz. This, you will say, was in rule, to fall in love with a female beauty; but with a house! it is out of all precedent. No, madame, it is not without a precedent in my own history. While in Paris I was violently smitten with the Hotel de Salm, and used to go to the Tuileries almost daily, to look at it.—TO MADAME LA COMTESSE DE TESSE. ii, 131. (N., 1787.)

443. ARCHITECTURE, Faulty.—Buildings are often erected, by individuals, of considerable expense. To give these symmetry and taste, would not increase their cost. It would only change the arrangement of the materials, the form and combination of the members. This would often cost less than the burden of barbarous ornaments with which these buildings are sometimes charged. But the first principles of the art are unknown, and there exists scarcely a model among us sufficiently chaste to give an idea of them.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 394. FORD ED., iii, 258. (1782.)

444. ARCHITECTURE, French.—Were I to proceed to tell you how much I enjoy French architecture * * * I should want words.—TO MR. BELLINI. i, 445. (P., 1785.)

445. ARCHITECTURE, Importance of.—Architecture is worth great attention. As we double our number every twenty years we must double our houses. * * * It is, then, among the most important arts; and it is desirable to introduce taste into an art which shows so much.—TRAVELLING HINTS. ix, 404. (1788.)

446. ARCHITECTURE, Plan of Prison.—With respect to the plan of a Prison, requested [by the Virginia authorities] in 1785, (being then in Paris), I had heard of a benevolent society, in England, which had been indulged by the government, in an experiment of the effect of labor, in solitary confinement, on some of their criminals: which experiment had succeeded beyond expectation. The same idea had been suggested in France, and an architect of Lyons had proposed a plan of a well-contrived edifice, on the principle of solitary confinement. I procured a copy, and as it was too large for our purposes, I drew one on a scale less extensive, but susceptible of additions as they should be wanting. This I sent to the directors, instead of a plan of a common prison, in the hope that it would suggest the idea of labor in solitary confinement, instead of that on the public works, which we had adopted in our Revised Code. Its principle, accordingly, but not its exact form, was adopted by Latrobe in carrying the plan into execution, by the erection of what is now called the Penitentiary, built under his direction.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 46. FORD ED., 64. (1821.)

447. ARCHITECTURE, Porticos.—A portico may be from five to ten diameters of the column deep, or projected from the building. If of more than five diameters, there must be a column in the middle of each flank, since it must never be more than five diameters from center to center of column. The portico of the Maison quarrée is three intercolonnations deep. I never saw as much to a private house.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 327. (1793.)

— ARCHITECTURE, Roman.—See ANTIQUITIES.

448. ARCHITECTURE, Ugly.—The private buildings [in Virginia] are very rarely constructed of stone or brick, much the greater portion being of scantling and boards, plastered with lime. It is impossible to devise things more ugly, uncomfortable, and happily more perishable.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 393. FORD ED., iii, 257. (1782.)

449. ARCHITECTURE, Virginia Capitol.—I was written to in 1785 (being then in Paris) by directors appointed to superintend the building of a Capitol in Richmond, to advise them as to a plan, and to add to it one of a Prison. Thinking it a favorable opportunity of introducing into the State an example of architecture, in the classic style of antiquity, and the Maison quarrée of Nîmes, an ancient Roman temple, being considered as the most perfect model existing of what may be called Cubic architecture, I applied to M. Clerissault, who had published drawings of the Antiquities of Nîmes, to have me a model of the building made in stucco, only changing the order from Corinthian to Ionic, on account of the difficulty of the Corinthian capitals. I yielded, with reluctance, to the taste of Clerissault, in his preference of the modern capital of Scamozzi to the more noble capital of antiquity. This was executed by the artist whom Choiseul Gouffier had carried with him to Constantinople, and employed, while ambassador there, in making those beautiful models of the remains of Grecian architecture which are to be seen at Paris. To adapt the exterior to our use, I drew a plan for the interior, with the apartments necessary for legislative, executive, and judiciary purposes; and accommodated in their size and distribution to the form and dimensions of the building. These were forwarded to the directors, in 1786, and were carried into execution, with some variations, not for the better, the most important of which, however, admit of future correction.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 45. FORD ED., i, 63. (1821.)

450. — — — We took for our model what is called the Maison quarrée of Nîmes, one of the most beautiful, if not the most beautiful and precious morsel of architecture left us by antiquity. It was built by Caius and Lucius Cæsar, and repaired by Louis XIV., and has the suffrage of all the judges of architecture who have seen it, as yielding to no one of the beautiful monuments of Greece, Rome, Palmyra and Balbec, which late travellers have communicated to us. It is very simple, but it is noble beyond expression, and would have done honor to our country, as presenting to travellers a specimen of taste in our infancy, promising much for our maturer age.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 432. (P., 1785.)

451. — — — I shall send them a plan taken from the best morsel of ancient architecture now remaining. It has obtained the approbation of fifteen or sixteen centuries, and is, therefore, preferable to any design which might be newly contrived. It will give more room, be more convenient and cost less than the plan they sent me. Pray encourage them to wait for it, and to execute it. It will be superior in beauty to anything in America, and not inferior to anything in the world. It is very simple.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 415. (P., 1785.)

452. — — — The designs for the Capitol are simple and sublime. More cannot be said. They are not the brat of a whimsical conception never before brought to light, but copied from the most precious, the most perfect model, of ancient architecture remaining on earth; one which has received the approbation of near 2000 years, and which is sufficiently remarkable to have been visited by all travellers.—To Dr. JAMES CURRIE. FORD ED., iv, 133. (P., 1786.)

453. — — — I have been much mortified with information I received * * * from Virginia, that the first brick of the Capitol would be laid within a few days. But surely, the delay of this piece of a summer would have been repaired by the savings in the plan preparing here, were we to value its other superiorities as nothing.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 432. (P., 1785.)

(454. — — —) Do * * * exert yourself to get the plan [of the Capitol] begun on, set aside and that adopted which was drawn here. It was taken from a model which has been the admiration of sixteen centuries; which has been the object of as many pilgrimages as the tomb of Mahomet; which will give unrivalled honor to our State, and furnish a model whereon to form the taste of our young men. It will cost much less, too, than the one begun because it does not cover one-half the area.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 534. FORD ED., iv, 196. (P., 1785.)

455. — — — Pray try if you can effect the stopping of this work. * * * The loss will be only of the laying the bricks already laid, or a part of them. The bricks themselves will do again for the interior walls, and one side wall and one end wall may remain, as they will answer equally well for our plan. This loss is not to be weighed against the saving of money which will arise, against the comfort of laying out the public money for something honorable, the satisfaction of seeing an object and proof of national good taste, and the regret and mortification of erecting a monument of our barbarism, which will be loaded with execrations as long as it shall endure.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 433. (P., 1785.)

456. — — — Our new Capitol, when the corrections are made, of which it is susceptible, will be an edifice of first rate dignity. Whenever it shall be finished with the proper ornaments belonging to it (which will not be in this age), it will be worthy of being exhibited alongside the most celebrated remains of antiquity. Its extreme convenience has acquired it universal approbation.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 136. (1789.)

457. — — — The capitol in the city of Richmond, in Virginia, is the model of the Temples of Erectheus at Athens, of Balbec, and of the Maison quarrée of Nîmes. All of which are nearly of the same form and proportions, and are considered as the most perfect examples of cubic architecture, as the Pantheon of Rome is of the spherical. Their dimensions not being sufficient for the purposes of the Capitol, they were enlarged, but their proportions rigorously observed. The Capitol is of brick, one hundred and thirty four feet long, seventy feet wide, and forty-five feet high, exclusive of the basement. Twenty-eight feet of its length is occupied by a portico of the whole breadth of the house, showing six columns in front, and two intercolonnations in flank. It is of a single order, which is Ionic; its columns four feet two inches diameter, and their entablature running round the whole building. The portico is crowned by a pediment, the height of which is two-ninths of its span.—JEFFERSON MANUSCRIPTS. ix, 446.

458. ARCHITECTURE, Washington Capitol.—I have had under consideration Mr. Hallet's plans for the Capitol, which undoubtedly have a great deal of merit. Dr. Thornton has also given me a view of his. * * * The grandeur, simplicity and beauty of the exterior, the propriety with which the apartments are distributed, and economy in the mass of the whole structure, will, I doubt not, give it a preference in your eyes, as it has done in mine and those of several others whom I have consulted. * * * Some difficulty arises with respect to Mr. Hallet, who you know was in some degree led into his plan by ideas we all expressed to him. This ought not to induce us to prefer it to a better; but while he is liberally rewarded for the time and labor he has expended on it, his feelings should be saved and soothed as much as possible.—TO THE WASHINGTON COMMISSIONERS. iii, 507. (1793.)

459. ———. Dr. Thornton's plan of a Capitol has * * * so captivated the eyes and judgment of all as to leave no doubt you will prefer it. * * * Among its admirers none is more decided than he [Washington] whose decision is most important. It is simple, noble, beautiful, excellently distributed, and moderate in size. * * * A just respect for the right of approbation in the commissioners will prevent any formal decision in the President till the plan shall be laid before you and be approved by you.—TO MR. CARROLL. iii, 508. (Pa., 1793.)

460. ———. The Representative's chamber will remain a durable monument of your talents as an architect. * * * The Senate room I have never seen.—TO MR. LATROBE. vi, 75. (M., 1812.)

461. ———. I shall live in the hope that the day will come when an opportunity will be given you of finishing the middle building in a style worthy of the two wings, and worthy of the first temple dedicated to the sovereignty of the people, embellishing with Athenian taste the course of a nation looking far beyond the range of Athenian destinies.—TO MR. LATROBE. vi, 75. (M., 1812.) See CAPITOL (U. S.) and WASHINGTON CITY.

462. ARCHITECTURE, Williamsburg Capitol.—The only public buildings worthy mention [in Virginia] are the Capitol, the Palace, the College, and the Hospital for Lunatics, all of them in Williamsburg, heretofore the seat of our government. The Capitol is a light and airy structure, with a portico in front of two orders, the lower of which, being Doric, is tolerably just in its proportions and ornaments, save only that the intercolonnations are too large. The upper is Ionic, much too small for that on which it is mounted, its ornaments proper to the order, nor proportioned within themselves. It is crowned with a pediment, which is too large for its span. Yet, on the whole, it is the most pleasing piece of architecture we have. The Palace is not handsome without, but it is spacious and commodious within, is prettily situated, and with the grounds annexed to it, is capable of being made an elegant seat. The College and Hospital are rude, misshapen piles, which, but that they have roofs, would be taken for brick-kilns. There are no other public buildings but churches and court-houses, in which no attempts are made at elegance. Indeed, it would not be easy to execute such an attempt, as a workman could scarcely be found here capable of drawing an order.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 394. FORD ED., iii, 257. (1782.)

463. ARISTOCRACY, Artificial vs. Natural.—There is a natural aristocracy among men. The grounds of this are virtue and talents. Formerly, bodily powers gave place among the aristoi. But since the invention of gunpowder has armed the weak as well as the strong with missile death, bodily strength, like beauty, good humor, politeness and other accomplishments, has become but an auxiliary ground of distinction. There is, also, an artificial aristocracy, founded on wealth and birth, without either virtue or talents: for with these it would belong to the first class. The natural aristocracy I consider as the most precious gift of nature for the instruction, the trusts, and government of society. And indeed, it would have been inconsistent in creation to have formed man for the social state, and not to have provided virtue and wisdom enough to manage the concerns of the society. May we not even say, that that form of government is the best, which provides the most effectually for a pure selection of these natural aristoi into the offices of government? The artificial aristocracy is a mischievous ingredient in government, and provision should be made to prevent its ascendancy. On the question, what is the best provision, you and I differ: but we differ as rational friends, using the free exercise of our own reason, and mutually indulging its errors. You think it best to put the pseudo-aristoi into a separate chamber of legislation, where they may be hindered from doing mischief by their coordinate branches and where, also, they may be a protection to wealth against the agrarian and plundering enterprises of the majority of the people. I think that to give them power in order to prevent them from doing mischief, is arming them for it, and increasing instead of remedying the evil. For, if the coordinate branches can arrest their action, so may they that of the coordinates. Mischief may be done negatively as well as positively. Of this, a cabal in the Senate of the United States has furnished many proofs. Nor do I believe them necessary to protect the wealthy; because enough of these will find their way into every branch of the legislature to protect themselves. From fifteen to twenty legislatures of our own, in action for thirty years past, have proved that no fears of an equalization of property are to be apprehended from them. I think the best remedy is exactly that provided by all our constitutions, to leave to the citizens the free election and separation of the aristoi from the pseudo-aristoi, of the wheat from the chaff. In general they will elect the really good and wise. In some instances, wealth may corrupt, and birth blind them, but not in sufficient degree to endanger the society.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 223. FORD ED., ix, 425. (M., 1813.)

464. ARISTOCRACY, Banking.—I hope we shall * * * crush in its birth the aristocracy of our moneyed corporations, which dare already to challenge our government to a trial of strength and bid defiance to the laws of our country.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., x, 69. (P. F., Nov. 1816.)

— ARISTOCRACY, Cincinnati Society and.—See CINCINNATI.

465. ARISTOCRACY, Despised.—An industrious farmer occupies a more dignified place in the scale of beings, whether moral or political, than a lazy lounge, valuing himself on his family, too proud to work, and drawing out a miserable existence by eating on that surplus of other men's labor, which is the sacred fund of the helpless poor.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 271. FORD ED., iv, 176. (P., 1786.)

466. ARISTOCRACY, Education and.—The bill [of the Revised Code of Virginia] for the more general diffusion of learning proposed to divide every county into wards of five or six miles square, like the [New England] townships; to establish in each ward a free school for reading, writing and common arithmetic; to provide for the annual selection of the best subjects from these schools, who might receive, at the public expense, a higher degree of education at a district school; and from these district schools to select a certain number of the most promising subjects, to be completed at an University, where all the useful sciences should be taught. Worth and genius would thus have been sought out from every condition of life, and completely prepared by education for defeating the competition of wealth and birth for public trusts.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 225. FORD ED., ix, 427. (P., 1813.)

467. — — — This bill on education would have raised the mass of the people to the high ground of moral respectability necessary to their own safety, and to orderly government; and would have completed the great object of qualifying them to secure the veritable aristoi for the trusts of government to the exclusion of the pseudalists. * * * Although this law has not yet been acted on but in a small and inefficient degree, it is still considered as before the Legislature, * * * and I have great hope that some patriotic spirit will, at a favorable moment, call it up, and make it the key stone of the arch of our government.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 226. FORD ED., ix, 428. (M., 1813.)

468. ARISTOCRACY, Evils of.—To detail the real evils of aristocracy, they must

469. — — — A due horror of the evils which flow from these distinctions could be excited in Europe only, where the dignity of man is lost in arbitrary distinctions, where the human species is classed into several stages of degradation, where the many are crushed under the weight of the few, and where the order established can present to the contemplation of a thinking being no other picture than that of God Almighty and his angels trampling under foot the host of the damned.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 270. FORD ED., iv, 175. (P., 1786.)

470. — — — To know the mass of evil which flows from this fatal source, a person must be in France. He must see the finest soil, the finest climate, the most compact state, the most benevolent character of people, and every earthly advantage combined, insufficient to prevent this scourge from rendering existence a curse to twenty-four out of twenty-five parts of the inhabitants of this country.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 62. FORD ED., iv, 329. (P., 1786.)

471. ARISTOCRACY, Insurrection against.—But even in Europe a change has sensibly taken place in the mind of man. Science has liberated the ideas of those who read and reflect, and the American example has kindled feelings of right in the people. An insurrection has consequently begun of science, talents, and courage, against rank and birth, which have fallen into contempt. It has failed in its first effort, because the mobs of the cities, the instrument used for its accomplishment, debased by ignorance, poverty and vice, could not be restrained to rational action. But the world will soon recover from the panic of this first catastrophe. Science is progressive, and talents and enterprise are on the alert. Resort may be had to the people of the country, a more governable power from their principles and subordination; and rank, and birth, and tinsel-aristocracy will finally shrink into insignificance, even there. This, however, we have no right to meddle with. It suffices for us, if the moral and physical condition of our own citizens qualifies them to select the able and good for the direction of their government, with a recurrence of elections at such short periods as will enable them to displace an unfaithful servant, before the mischief he meditates may be irremediable.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 227. FORD ED., ix, 429. (M., 1813.)

— ARISTOCRACY, Kings, Priests and.—See 472.

472. ARISTOCRACY, Liberty and.—The complicated organization of kings, nobles, and priests, is not the wisest or best to effect the happiness of associated man. * * * The trappings of such a machinery consume by their expense those earnings of industry they were meant to protect, and, by the inequalities they produce, expose liberty to sufferance.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 291. FORD ED., x, 227. (M., 1823.)

473. ARISTOCRACY, Religious.—The law for religious freedom, * * * put down the aristocracy of the clergy [in Virginia] and restored to the citizen the freedom of the mind.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 226. FORD ED., ix, 428. (M., 1813.)

474. ARISTOCRACY, Repressed by.—A heavy aristocracy and corruption are two bridles in the mouths of the Irish which will prevent them from making any effectual efforts against their masters.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 38. (P., 1785.)

475. ARISTOCRACY, Reverence for.—From what I have seen of Massachusetts and Connecticut myself, and still more from what I have heard, and the character given of the former by yourself, who know them so much better, there seems to be in those two States a traditional reverence for certain families, which has rendered the offices of the government nearly hereditary in those families. I presume that from an early period of your history, members of those families happening to possess virtue and talents, have honestly exercised them for the good of the people, and by their services have endeared their names to them. In coupling Connecticut with you, I mean it politically only, not morally. For having made the Bible the common law of their land, they seem to have modeled their morality on the story of Jacob and Laban. But although this hereditary succession to office with you, may, in some degree, be founded in real family merit, yet in a much higher degree, it has proceeded from your strict alliance of Church and State. Those families are canonized in the eyes of the people on common principles, "you tickle me, and I will tickle you."—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 224. FORD ED., ix, 426. (M., 1813.)

476. ARISTOCRACY, Royalty and.—The [French] aristocracy [in 1788-9] was cemented by a common principle of preserving the ancient régime, or whatever should be nearest to it. Making this their Polar star, they moved in phalanx, gave preponderance on every question to the minorities of the Patriots, and always to those who advocated the least change.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 104. FORD ED., i, 144. (1821.)

— ARISTOCRACY, Trappings of.—See 472.

477. ARISTOCRACY, Unpopular.—In Virginia, we have no traditional reverence for certain families. Our clergy, before the Revolution, having been secured against rivalry by fixed salaries, did not give themselves the trouble of acquiring influence over the people. Of wealth, there were great accumulations in particular families, handed down from generation to generation, under the English law of entails. But the only object of ambition for the wealthy was a seat in the King's council. All their court was paid to the crown and its creatures; and they Philipised in all collisions between the King and the people. Hence they were unpopular; and that unpopularity continues attached to their names. A Randolph, a Carter, or a Burwell must have great personal superiority over a common competitor to be elected by the people even at this day.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 224. FORD ED., ix, 426. (M., 1813.)

478. ARISTOCRACY, Uprooting.—At the first session of our Legislature after the Declaration of Independence, we passed a law abolishing entails. And this was followed by one abolishing the privilege of primogeniture, and dividing the lands of intestates equally among all the children, or other representatives. These laws, drawn by myself, laid the axe to the root of pseudo-aristocracy. And had another which I had prepared been adopted by the Legislature, our work would have been complete. It was a bill for the more general diffusion of learning.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 225. FORD ED., ix, 427. (M., 1813.)

479. ———. I considered four of these bills [of the Revised Code of Virginia] * * * as forming a system by which every fibre would be eradicated of ancient or future aristocracy; and a foundation laid for a government truly republican. The repeal of the laws of entail would prevent the accumulation and perpetuation of wealth, in select families, and preserve the soil of the country from being daily more and more absorbed in mortmain. The abolition of primogeniture, and equal partition of inheritances removed the feudal and unnatural distinctions which made one member of every family rich, and all the rest poor, substituting equal partition, the best of all Agrarian laws. The restoration of the rights of conscience relieved the people from taxation for the support of a religion not theirs; for the Establishment was truly of the religion of the rich, the dissenting sects being entirely composed of the less wealthy people; and these, by the bill for a general education, would be qualified to understand their rights, to maintain them, and to exercise with intelligence their parts in self-government; and all this would be effected without the violation of a single natural right of any one individual citizen.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 49. FORD ED., i, 68. (1821.)

480. ARISTOCRACY IN VIRGINIA.—To state the difference between the classes of society and the lines of demarcation which separated them [in Virginia] would be difficult. The law admitted none except as to our twelve counsellors. Yet in a country insulated from the European world, insulated from its sister colonies, with whom there was scarcely any intercourse, little visited by foreigners, and having little matter to act upon within itself, certain families had risen to splendor by wealth and the preservation of it from generation to generation under the law of entails; some had produced a series of men of talents; families in general had remained stationary on the grounds of their forefathers, for there was no emigration to the westward in those days; the wild Irish, who had gotten possession of the valley between the Blue Ridge and North Mountain, forming a barrier over which none ventured to leap, and would still less venture to settle among. In such a state of things, scarcely admitting any change of station, society would settle itself down into several strata, separated by no marked lines, but shading off imperceptibly from top to bottom, nothing disturbing the order of their repose. There were there aristocrats, half-breeds, pretenders, a solid yeomanry, looking askance at those above yet venturing to jostle them, and last and lowest, a feculum of beings called overseers, the most abject, degraded and unprincipled race, always cap in hand to the Dons who employed them, and furnishing materials for the exercise of their pride, insolence and spirit of domination.—To WILLIAM WIRT. vi, 484. FORD ED., ix, 473. (M., 1815.)

481. ——. You surprise me with the account you give of the strength of family distinction still existing in Massachusetts. With us it is so totally extinguished, that not a spark of it is to be found but working in the hearts of some of our old Tories; but all bigotries hang to one another, and this in the Eastern States hangs, as I suspect, to that of the priesthood. Here youth, beauty, mind and manners, are more valued than a pedigree.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 305. (M., 1814.)

482. ARISTOCRACY, Virtuous.—Nature has wisely provided an aristocracy of virtue and talent for the direction of the interests of society, and scattered it with equal hand through all its conditions.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 36. FORD ED., i, 49. (1821.)

483. ARISTOCRACY OF WEALTH.—An aristocracy of wealth [is] of more harm and danger than benefit to society.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 36. FORD ED., i, 49. (1821.)

484. ARISTOCRATS, Impotent.—We, too, have our aristocrats and monarchs, and as they float on the surface, they show much though they weigh little.—To J. P. BRISSOT DE WARVILLE. FORD ED., vi, 249. (Pa., 1793.)

485. ARISTOCRATS, The People and.—Aristocrats fear the people, and wish to transfer all power to the higher classes of society.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 391. FORD ED., x, 335. (M., 1825.)

486. ARISTOTLE, Writings of.—So different was the style of society then, and with those people, from what it is now and with us, that I think little edification can be obtained from their writings on the subject of government. They had just ideas of the value of personal liberty, but none at all of the structure of government best calculated to preserve it. They knew no medium between a democracy (the only pure republic, but impracticable beyond the limits of a town) and an abandonment of themselves to an aristocracy, or a tyranny independent of the people. It seems not to have occurred that where the citizens can not meet to transact their business in person, they alone have the right to choose the agents who shall transact it; and that in this way a republican, or popular government, of the second grade of purity, may be exercised over any extent of country. The full experiment of a government, democratical, but representative, was and is still reserved for us. * * * The introduction of this new principle of representative democracy has rendered useless almost everything written before on the structure of government; and, in a great measure, relieves our regret, if the political writings of Aristotle, or of any other ancient, have been lost, or are unfaithfully rendered or explained to us.—To ISAAC H. TIFFANY. vii, 32. (M., 1816.)

487. ARMS, Loan of.—I am in hopes that your State [New York] will provide by the loan of arms for your immediate safety.—To JACOB J. BROWN. v, 240. (W. 1808.)

488. ——. I enclose you * * * an application from * * * citizens of New York, residing on the St. Lawrence and Lake Ontario, setting forth their defenceless situation for the want of arms, and praying to be furnished from the magazines of the United States. Similar applications from other parts of our frontier in every direction have sufficiently shown that did the laws permit such a disposition of the arms of the United States, their magazines would be completely exhausted, and nothing would remain for actual war. But it is only when troops take the field, that the arms of the United States can be delivered to them. For the ordinary safety of the citizens of the several States, whether against dangers within or without, their reliance must be on the means to be provided by their respective States. Under the circumstances I have thought it my duty to transmit to you the representation received, not doubting that you will have done for the safety of our fellow citizens, on a part of our frontier so interesting and so much exposed, what their situation requires, and the means under your control may permit.—To GOVERNOR TOMPKINS. v, 238. (W., 1808.)

489. ARMS, Right to bear.—No freeman shall be debarred the use of arms [within his own lands].*—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 27. (June, 1776.)

490. ARMS, Device for the American States.—A proper device (instead of arms) for the American states united would be the Father presenting the bundle of rods to his sons. The motto "Insuperabiles si Inseparabiles", an answer given in part to the H. of Lds & Comm. 4. Inst. 35. He cites 4. H. 6. ru. 12. parl. rolls, which I suppose was the time it happd. †—FORD ED., i, 420.

* Brackets by Jefferson.—EDITOR.

† This is a note written in Jefferson's copy of the Virginia Almanach for 1774. All his other entries in this volume are contemporary with the date of the almanac, and if, as all the internal evidence indicates, this was also written at that time, it is not merely interesting as a proposed emblem, but even more so as the earliest reference to the "American States." In a letter of John Adams (Familiar Letters, 211), Aug. 4, 1776, on the subject of the national arms, is the following: "Mr. Jefferson proposed the children of Israel in the wilderness, led by a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night; and on the other side, Hengist and Horsa, the Saxon chiefs from whom we claim the honor of being descended, and whose political principles and forms of government we have assumed."—NOTE IN FORD'S ED.

whatever service, distant or at home, should require them.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 418. FORD ED., ix, 502. (M., Feb. 1815.)

525. ARMY, Seniority in.—We received from Colonel R. H. Lee a resolution of Convention, recommending us to endeavor that the promotions of the officers be according to seniority without regard to regiments or companies. In one instance, indeed, the Congress reserved to themselves a right of departing from seniority; that is where a person either out of the line of command, or in an inferior part of it, has displayed eminent talents. Most of the general officers have been promoted in this way. Without this reservation, the whole continent must have been supplied with general officers from the Eastern Colonies, where a large army was formed and officered before any other colony had occasion to raise troops at all, and a number of experienced, able and valuable officers must have been lost to the public merely from the locality of their situation.—To GOVERNOR PATRICK HENRY. FORD ED., ii, 67. (Pa., 1776.)

526. — —. We [Congress] wait your recommendation for the two vacant majorities. Pray regard militaryment alone.—To JOHN PAGE. FORD ED., ii, 88. (Pa., 1776.)

527. — —. Several vacancies having happened in our battalions, we [Congress] are unable to have them filled for want of a list of the officers, stating their seniority. We must beg the favor of you to furnish us with one.—To GOVERNOR HENRY. FORD ED., ii, 67. (Pa., 1776.)

528. — —. The unfortunate obstinacy of the Senate in preferring the greatest blockhead to the greatest military genius, if one day longer in commission, renders it doubly important to sift well the candidates for command in new corps, and to marshal them at first, towards the head, in proportion to their qualifications.—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. FORD ED., ix, 380. (M., Feb. 1813.)

529. — —. There is not, I believe, a service on earth where seniority is permitted to give a right to advance beyond the grade of captain.—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. FORD ED., ix, 380. (M., Feb. 1813.)

530. — —. We are doomed. * * * to sacrifice the lives of our citizens by thousands to this blind principle, for fear the peculiar interest and responsibility of our Executive should not be sufficient to guard his selection of officers against favoritism.—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. FORD ED., ix, 380. (M., 1813.)

531. — —. When you have new corps to raise you are free to prefer merit: and our mechanical law of promotion, when once men have been set in their places, makes it most interesting indeed to place them originally according to their capacities. It is not for me even to ask whether in the raw regiments now to be raised, it would not be advisable to draw from the former the few officers who may already have discovered military talent, and to bring them forward in the new corps to those higher grades, to which, in the old, the blocks in their way do not permit you to advance them?—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. FORD ED., ix, 380. (M., Feb. 1813.). See GENERALS.

532. ARMY, A standing.—Standing armies [are] inconsistent with the freedom [of the Colonies], and subversive of their quiet.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 477. (July 1775.)

533. — —. There shall be no standing army but in time of actual war.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 27. (June 1776.)

534. — —. He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by [keeping among us], in time of peace, standing armies and ships of war.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 10. (June 1776.)

535. — —. He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies and ships of war * without the consent of our legislatures.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

536. — —. I do not like [in the new Federal Constitution] the omission of a bill of rights, providing clearly and without the aid of sophisms for * * * protection against standing armies.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 329. FORD ED., iv, 476. (P., Dec. 1787.)

537. — —. I sincerely rejoice at the acceptance of our new Constitution by nine States. It is a good canvas, on which some strokes only want retouching. What these are, I think are sufficiently manifested by the general voice from north to south, which calls for a bill of rights. It seems pretty generally understood that this should go to * * * standing armies. * * * If no check can be found to keep the number of standing troops within safe bounds, while they are tolerated as far as necessary, abandon them altogether, discipline well the militia, and guard the magazines with them. More than magazine guards will be useless if few, and dangerous if many. No European nation can ever send against us such a regular army as we need fear, and it is hard if our militia are not equal to those of Canada, or Florida.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 445. FORD ED., v, 45. (P., July 1788.)

538. — —. By declaration of rights, I mean one which shall stipulate * * * no standing armies.—To A. DONALD. ii, 355. (P., 1788.)

539. — —. There are instruments so dangerous to the rights of the nation, and which place them so totally at the mercy of their governors, that those governors; whether legislative or executive, should be restrained from keeping such instruments on foot, but in well-defined cases. Such an instrument is a standing army.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 13. FORD ED., v, 90. (P., 1789.)

540. ———. I hope a militia bill will be passed. Anything is preferable to nothing, as it takes away one of the arguments for a standing army.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. FORD ED., v, 454. (Pa., 1792.)

541. ———. I am not for a standing army in time of peace, which may overawe the public sentiment.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

542. ———. Bonaparte has transferred the destinies of the republic from the civil to the military arm. Some will use this as a lesson against the practicability of republican government. I read it as a lesson against the danger of standing armies.—To SAMUEL ADAMS. iv, 322. FORD ED., vii, 425. (Pa., Feb. 1800.)

543. ———. It is not conceived needful or safe that a standing army should be kept up in time of peace for defence against invasion.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 11. FORD ED., 121. (1801.)

544. ———. I hope Kentucky will * * * finish the matter [Burr's enterprise] for the honor of popular government, and the discouragement of all arguments for standing armies.—To REV. CHARLES CLAY. v, 28. FORD ED., ix, 7. (W., 1807.)

545. ———. We propose to raise seven regiments only for the present year, depending always on our militia for the operations of the first year of war. On any other plan, we should be obliged always to keep a large standing army.—To CHARLES PINCKNEY. v, 266. (W., March 1808.)

546. ———. The Greeks and Romans had no standing armies, yet they defended themselves. The Greeks by their laws, and the Romans by the spirit of their people, took care to put into the hands of their rulers no such engine of oppression as a standing army. Their system was to make every man a soldier, and oblige him to repair to the standard of his country whenever that was reared. This made them invincible; and the same remedy will make us so.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 379. (M., 1814.)

547. ARMY, Threatened by an.—We cannot, my lord, close with the terms of that Resolution, [Lord North's conciliatory propositions] * * * because at the very time of requiring from us grants, they are making disposition to invade us with large armaments by sea and land, which is a style of asking gifts not reconcilable to our freedom.—ADDRESS TO LORD DUNMORE. FORD ED., i, 457. (1775.)

548. ARMY, An unnecessary.—One of my favorite ideas is, never to keep an unnecessary soldier.—THE ANAS. ix, 431. FORD ED., i, 198. (1792.)

549. ———. Were armies to be raised whenever a speck of war is visible in our horizon, we never should have been without them. Our resources would have been exhausted on dangers which have never happened, instead of being reserved for what is really to take place.—SIXTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 69. FORD ED., viii, 495. (Dec. 1806.)

550. ARMY, An unauthorized.—When, in the course of the late war, it became expedient that a body of Hanoverian troops should be brought over for the defence of Great Britain, his Majesty's grandfather, our late sovereign, did not pretend to introduce them under any authority he possessed. Such a measure would have given just alarm to his subjects in Great Britain, whose liberties would not be safe if armed men of another country, and of another spirit, might be brought into the realm at any time without the consent of their legislature. He, therefore, applied to Parliament, who passed an act for that purpose, limiting the number to be brought in, and the time they were to continue. In like manner is his Majesty restrained in every part of the empire.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 140. FORD ED., i, 445. (1774.)

551. ———. He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitutions, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation for quartering large bodies of armed troops among us; for protecting them by a mock trial from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these States.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

552. ———. He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by combining with others to subject us to a foreign jurisdiction, giving his assent to their pretended acts of legislation for quartering large bodies of armed troops among us.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 10. (June 1776.)

553. ———. In order to enforce [his] arbitrary measures * * * his Majesty has, from time to time, sent among us large bodies of armed forces, not made up of the people here, nor raised by authority of our laws. Did his Majesty possess such a right as this, it might swallow up all our other rights whenever he should think proper. But his Majesty has no right to land a single armed man on our shores, and those whom he sends here are liable to our laws made for the suppression and punishment of riots, and unlawful assemblies; or are hostile bodies, invading us in defiance of the law.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 140. FORD ED., i, 445. (1774.)

diers on us in times of profound peace.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 480. (July 1775.)

555. ARMY, A volunteer.—[With respect to] the proposition for substituting 32,000 twelve-month volunteers instead of 15,000 regulars as a disposable force, I like the idea much. It will, of course, be a subject of consideration when we all meet again, but I repeat that I like it greatly.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. v, 155. FORD ED., ix, 123. (M., Aug. 1807.)

556. — — — General Dearborn has sent me a plan of a war establishment for 15,000 regulars for garrisons, and instead of 15,000 others, as a disposable force, to substitute 32,000 twelve-month volunteers, to be exercised and paid three months in the year, and consequently costing no more than 8,000 permanent, giving us the benefit of 32,000 for any expedition, who would be themselves nearly equal to regulars, but could on occasion be put into the garrisons, and the regulars employed in the expedition primâ facie. I like it well.—To JAMES MADISON. v, 154. FORD ED., ix, 123. (M., Aug. 1807.) See WAR.

557. ARMY, (French), Dangerous standing.—The French flatter themselves they shall form a better Constitution than the English one. I think it will be better in some points—worse in others. * * * It will be worse, as their situation obliges them to keep up the dangerous machine of a standing army.—To DR. PRICE. ii, 557. (P., Jan. 1789.)

558. ARMY (French), Decision by the.—If the appeal to arms is made [in France] it will depend entirely on the disposition of the army whether it issue in liberty or despotism.—To E. RUTLEDGE. ii, 435. FORD ED., v, 42. (P., 1788.)

559. ARMY OFFICERS, Accountability of.—Whereas it is apprehended that sufficient care and attention hath not been always had by officers to the cleanliness, to the health and to the comfort of the soldiers entrusted to their command, Be it therefore enacted, that so long as any troops from this Commonwealth [Virginia] shall be in any service to the northward thereof, it shall and may be lawful for our delegates in Congress, and they are hereby required from time to time to enquire into the state and condition of the troops, and the conduct of the officers commanding; and where any troops, raised in this Commonwealth, are upon duty within the same, or anywhere to the southward, there the Governor and Council are required to make similar enquiry by such ways or means as shall be in their power: and whensoever it shall be found that any officer, appointed by this Commonwealth, shall have been guilty of negligence, or want of fatherly care, of the soldiers under his command, they are hereby respectively required to report to this Assembly the whole truth of the case, who hereby reserve to themselves a power of removing such officer; and whenever they shall find that such troops shall have suffered through the negligence or inattention of any officer of Contimental appointment, they are, in like manner, to make report thereof to this Assembly, whose duty it will be to represent the same to Congress: and they are further respectively required, from time to time, to procure and lay before this Assembly exact returns of the numbers and conditions of such of their troops.—ARMY BILL. FORD ED., ii, 115. (1776.)

560. ARMY OFFICERS, Foreign.—I believe I mentioned to you, on a former occasion, that the last act of Congress for raising additional troops required that the officers should all be citizens of the United States. Should there be war, however, I am persuaded this policy must be abandoned, and that we must avail ourselves of the experience of other nations, in certain lines of service at least.—To AMELOT DE LA CROIX. v, 422. (W., Feb. 1809.)

561. ARMY OFFICERS, Prosecutions of.—Many officers of the army being involved in the offence of intending a military enterprise [Burr's] against a nation at peace with the United States, to remove the whole without trial, by the paramount authority of the executive, would be a proceeding of unusual gravity. Some line must, therefore, be drawn to separate the more from the less guilty. The only sound one which occurs to me is between those who believed the enterprise was with the approbation of the government, open or secret, and those who meant to proceed in defiance of the government. Concealment would be no line at all, because all concealed it. Applying the line of defiance to the case of Lieutenant Mead, it does not appear by any testimony I have seen, that he meant to proceed in defiance of the government, but, on the contrary, that he was made to believe the government approved of the expedition. If it be objected that he concealed a part of what had taken place in his communications to the Secretary of War, yet if a concealment of the whole would not furnish a proper line of distinction, still less would the concealment of a part. This too would be a removal for prevarication, not for unauthorised enterprise, and could not be a proper ground for exercising the extraordinary power of removal by the President.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. v, 60. FORD ED., ix, 38. (W., March 1807.)

562. ARMY OFFICERS, Undesirable French.—I would not advise that the French gentlemen should come here. [Philadelphia.] We have so many of that country, and have been so much imposed on that the Congress begins to be sore on that head. * * * If you approve of the Chevalier de St. Aubin, why not appoint him yourselves, as your troops of horse are colonial, not continental?—To JOHN PAGE. FORD ED., ii, 70. (Pa., 1776.)

563. ARNOLD (Benedict), Expedition to Quebec.—The march of Arnold [to Quebec] is equal to Xenophon's retreat.—To JOHN PAGE. FORD ED., i, 496. (1775.)

564. — — — I never understood that Arnold formed this enterprise, nor do I believe he did. I heard and saw all General Washington's letters on this subject. I do not think he mentioned Arnold as author of the proposition; yet he was always just in ascribing to every officer the merit of his own works; and he was disposed particularly in favor of Arnold. This officer is entitled to great merit in the execution, but to ascribe to him that of having formed the enterprise, is probably to ascribe to him what belongs to General Washington or some other person.—ANSWERS TO M. SOULES. ix, 301. FORD ED., iv, 300. (P., 1786.)

565. ——. General Arnold, (a fine sailor) has undertaken to command our fleet on the Lakes.—TO FRANCIS EPPES. FORD ED., ii, 77. (Pa., 1776.)

566. ARNOLD (Benedict), Reward for capture of.—It is above all things desirable to drag Arnold from those under whose wing he is now sheltered. On his march to and from this place [Richmond], I am certain it might have been done with facility by men of enterprise and firmness. I think it may still be done. * * * Having peculiar confidence in the men from the western side of the mountains, I meant, as soon as they should come down, to get the enterprise proposed to a chosen number of them; such whose courage and whose fidelity would be above all doubt. Your perfect knowledge of those men personally, and my confidence in your discretion, induce me to ask you to pick from among them proper characters, in such number as you think best, to reveal to them our desire, and engage them to undertake to seize and bring off this greatest of all traitors. Whether this may be best effected by their going in (within the British lines) as friends and awaiting their opportunity, or otherwise, is left to themselves. The smaller the number the better, so that they be sufficient to manage him. Every necessary caution must be used on their part, to prevent a discovery of their design by the enemy; as, should they be taken, the laws of war will justify against them the most rigorous sentence. I will undertake, if they are successful in bringing him off alive, that they shall receive five thousand guineas reward among them. And to men, formed for such an enterprise, it must be a great incitement to know that their names will be recorded with glory in history, with those of Van Wart, Paulding and Williams.*—TO ——. i, 289. FORD ED., ii, 441. (R., 1781.)

567. ARNOLD (Benedict), Treason of.—The parricide Arnold.—TO GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 284. FORD ED., ii, 408. (R., 1781.)

568. ART, Selecting works of.—With respect to the figures, I could only find three of those you named, matched in size. Those were Minerva, Diana and Apollo. I was obliged to add a fourth, unguided by your choice. They offered me a fine Venus; but I thought it out of taste to have two at table at the same time. Paris and Helen were represented. I conceived it would be cruel to remove them from their peculiar shrine. When they shall pass the Atlantic, it will be to sing a requiem over our freedom and happiness. At length a fine Mars was offered, calm, bold, his falchion not drawn but ready to be drawn. This will do, thinks I, for the table of the American Minister in London, where those whom it may concern may look and learn that though Wisdom is our guide, and the Song and Chase our supreme delight, yet we offer adoration to that tutelary God also who rocked the cradle of our birth, who has accepted our infant offerings, and has shown himself the patron of our rights and avenger of our wrongs. The group then was closed and your party formed. Envy and malice will never be quiet. I hear it already whispered to you that in admitting Minerva to your table, I have departed from the principle which made me reject Venus; in plain English that I have paid a just respect to the daughter but failed to the mother. No, Madam, my respect to both is sincere. Wisdom, I know, is social. She seeks her fellows, but Beauty is jealous, and illy bears the presence of a rival.—TO MRS. JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., iv, 99. (P., 1785.)

569. ARTISANS, Americans as.—While we have land to labor, let us never wish to see our citizens occupied at a work-bench, or twirling a distaff. Carpenters, masons, and smiths, are wanting in husbandry; but for the general operations of manufacture, let our workshops remain in Europe.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 405. FORD ED., iii, 269. (1782.)

570. ARTISANS, Condemnation of.—I consider the class of artificers as the panders of vice, and the instruments by which the liberties of a country are generally overturned.—TO JOHN JAY. i, 404. FORD ED., iv, 88. (P., 1785.)

571. ARTISANS, Explanation of views on.—Mr. Duane informed me that he meant to publish a new edition of the Notes on Virginia, and I had in contemplation some particular alterations which would require little time to make. My occupations by no means permit me at this time to revise the text, and make those changes in it which I should now do. I should in that case certainly qualify several expressions * * * which have been construed differently from what they were intended. I had under my eye, when writing, the manufacturers of the great cities in the old countries, at the time present, with whom the want of food and clothing necessary to sustain life, has begotten a depravity of morals, a dependence and corruption, which render them an undesirable accession to a country whose morals are sound. My expressions looked forward to the time when our great cities would get into the same state. But they have been quoted as if meant for the present time here. As yet our manufacturers are as much at their ease, as independent and moral as our agricultural inhabitants, and they will continue so as long as there are vacant lands for them to resort to; because whenever it shall be attempted by the other classes to reduce them to the minimum of subsistence, they will quit their trades and go to laboring the earth. A first question is, whether it is desirable for us to receive at present the dissolute and demoralized handicraftsmen of the old cities of Europe? A second and more difficult one is, when even good handicraftsmen arrive here, is it better for them to set up their trade, or go to the culture of the earth? Whether their labor in their trade is worth more than their labor on the soil, increased by the creative energies of the earth? Had I time to revise that chapter, this question should be discussed, and other views of the subject taken, which are presented by the wonderful changes which have taken place here since 1781, when the Notes on Virginia were written.—TO MR. LITGOW. iv, 563. FORD ED., iii, 269. (W., Jan. 1805.)

572. ARTISANS, French and English.—The English mechanics certainly exceed all others in some lines. But be just to your own nation. They have not patience, it is true, to sit rubbing a piece of steel from morning to night, as a lethargic Englishman will do, full charged with porter. But do not their benevolence, their cheerfulness, their amiability, when compared with the growling temper and manners of the people among whom you are, compensate their want of patience?—To MADAME DE CARNY. ii, 161. (P., 1787.)

573. ARTISANS, Science and.—The mechanic needs ethics, mathematics, chemistry and natural philosophy. To them the languages are but ornament and comfort.—To JOHN BRAZIER. vii, 133. (P. F., 1819.)

574. ARTISTS, Member of Society of.—I am very justly sensible of the honor the Society of Artists of the United States has done me in making me an honorary member of their Society. * * * I fear that I can be but a very useless associate. Time which withers the fancy, as the other faculties of the mind and body presses on me with a heavy hand, and distance intercepts all personal intercourse. I can offer, therefore, but my zealous good wishes for the success of the institution, and that, embellishing with taste a country already overflowing with the useful productions, it may be able to give an innocent and pleasing direction to accumulations of wealth, which would otherwise be employed in the nourishment of coarse and vicious habits.—To THOMAS SULLY. vi, 34. (M., Jan. 1812.)

575. ARTS, Enthusiasm for the.—I am an enthusiast on the subject of the arts. But it is an enthusiasm of which I am not ashamed, as its object is to improve the taste of my countrymen, to increase their reputation, to reconcile to them the respect of the world, and procure them its praise.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 433. (P., 1785.)

576. ARTS, French Excellence in.—Were I to proceed to tell you how much I enjoy the architecture, sculpture, painting, music [of the French], I should want words. It is in these arts they shine.—To MR. BELLINI. i, 445. (P., 1785.)

577. ARTS, Mechanical.—The mechanical arts in London are carried to a wonderful perfection. But of these I need not speak, because of them my countrymen have unfortunately* too many samples before their eyes.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 550. FORD ED., iv, 214. (P., 1786.)

578. ASSASSINATION, Government and.—Assassination, poison, perjury * * * were legitimate principles [of government] in the dark ages which intervened between ancient and modern civilization, but exploded and held in just horror in the eighteenth century.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 99. FORD ED., v, 111. (P., 1789.)

579. ASSIGNATS, Payments in.—I have communicated to the President what passed between us * * * on the subject of the payments made to France by the United States in the assignats of that country, since they have lost their par with gold and silver; and after conferences, by his instruction, with the Secretary of the Treasury, I am authorized to assure you, that the government of the United States have no idea of paying their debt in a depreciated medium, and that in the final liquidation of the payments * * * due regard will be had to an equitable allowance for the circumstance of depreciation.*—To JEAN BAPTISTE TERNANT. FORD ED., v, 383. (Pa., Nov. 1791.)

580. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Acrimony over.—The assumption of State debts has appeared as revolting to several States as their non-assumption to others. It is proposed to strip the proposition of the injustice it would have done by leaving the States who have redeemed much of their debts on no better footing than those who have redeemed none; on the contrary, it is recommended to assume a fixed sum, allotting a portion of it to every State in proportion to its census. Consequently, every State will receive exactly what they will have to pay, or they will be exonerated so far by the General Government's taking their creditors off their hands. There will be no injustice then. But there will be the objection still, that Congress must then lay taxes for those debts which would have been much better laid and collected by the State governments. And this is the objection on which the accommodation now hangs with the non-assumptioners, many of whom committed themselves in their advocacy of the new Constitution by arguments drawn from the improbability that Congress would ever lay taxes where the States could do it separately. These gentlemen feel the reproaches which will be levelled at them personally. I have been, and still am of their opinion that Congress should always prefer letting the States raise money in their own way, where it can be done. But, in the present instance, I see the necessity of yielding for this time to the cries of the creditors in certain parts of the Union; for the sake of Union, and to save us from the greatest of all calamities, the total extinction of our credit in Europe.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 153. FORD ED., v, 188. (N. Y., June 1790.)

581. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Compromise plans.—The question for assuming the State debts has created greater animosities than I ever yet saw take place on any occasion. There are three ways in which it may yet terminate. 1. A rejection of the measure, which will prevent their funding any part of the public debt, and will be something very like a dissolution of the government. 2. A bargain between the Eastern members, who have had it so much at heart, and the middle members, who are indifferent about it, to adopt those debts without any modification on condition of removing the seat of government to Philadelphia or Baltimore. 3. An adoption of them with this modification, that the whole sum to be assumed shall be divided among the States in proportion to their census; so that each shall receive as much as they are to pay; and perhaps this might bring about so much good humor as to induce them to give the temporary seat of government to Philadelphia, and then to Georgetown permanently. It is evident that this last is the least bad of all the turns the thing can take. The only objection to it will be

* Jefferson's first draft of this letter ended as follows: "And that they will take measures for making these payments in their just value, avoiding all benefit from depreciation, and desiring on their part to be guarded against any unjust loss from the circumstances of mere exchange." It was changed to meet Hamilton's views.—EDITOR.

that Congress will then have to lay and collect taxes to pay these debts, which could much better have been laid and collected by the State governments. This, though an evil, is a less one than any of the others in which it may issue, and will probably give us the seat of government at a day not very distant, which will vivify our agriculture and commerce by circulating through our State an additional sum every year of half a million of dollars.—To Dr. GEORGE GILMER. iii, 150. FORD ED., v, 192. (N. Y., June 1790.)

582. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Credit, Union and.—Congress has been long embarrassed by two of the most irritating questions that can ever be raised among them: 1. The funding of the public debt; and 2. the fixing on a more central residence. After exhausting their arguments and patience on these subjects, they have for some time been resting on their oars, unable to get along as to these businesses, and indisposed to attend to anything else till they are settled. And, in fine, it has become probable that unless they can be reconciled by some plan of compromise, there will be no funding bill agreed to; our credit (raised by late prospects to be the first on the exchange at Amsterdam, where our money is above par), will burst and vanish, and the States separate, to take care every one of itself. This prospect appears probable to some well-informed and well-disposed minds. Endeavors are, therefore, using to bring about a disposition to some mutual sacrifices.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 153. FORD ED., v, 187. (N. Y., June 1790.)

583. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Federal capital and.—It is proposed to pass an act fixing the temporary residence of twelve or fifteen years at Philadelphia, and that at the end of that time, it shall stand ipso facto, and without further declaration transferred to Georgetown. In this way, there will be something to displease and something to soothe every part of the Union but New York, which must be contented with what she has had. If this plan of compromise does not take place, I fear one infinitely worse, an unqualified assumption, and the perpetual residence on the Delaware. The Pennsylvania and Virginia delegates have conducted themselves honorably and unexceptionably on the question of residence. Without descending to talk about bargains, they have seen that their true interests lay in not listening to insidious propositions, made to divide and defect them, and we have seen them at times voting against their respective wishes rather than separate.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 153. FORD ED., v, 189. (N. Y., June 1790.)

584. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Justice and.—The assumption must be admitted, but in so qualified a form as to divest it of its injustice. This may be done by assuring to the creditors of every State, a sum exactly proportioned to the contribution of the State; so that the State will on the whole neither gain nor lose. There will remain against the measure only the objection that Congress must lay taxes for these debts which might be better laid and collected by the States.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 185. (N. Y., 1790.)

585. — — — I am in hopes the assumption will be put into a just form, by assuming to the creditors of each State in proportion to the census of each State, so that the State will be exonerated towards its creditors just as much as it will have to contribute to the assumption, and consequently no injustice done.—To FRANCIS EPPES. FORD ED., v, 194. (N. Y., July 1790.)

586. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Mutual sacrifices.—The impossibility that certain States could ever pay the debts they had contracted, the acknowledgment that nine-tenths of these debts were contracted for the general defence as much as those contracted by Congress directly, the clamors of the creditors within those States, and the possibility that they might defeat the funding of any part of the public debt, if theirs also were not assumed, were motives not to be neglected. I saw the first proposition for their assumption with as much aversion as any man, but the development of circumstances have convinced me that if it is obdurately rejected, something much worse will happen. Considering it, therefore, as one of the cases in which mutual sacrifice and accommodation are necessary, I shall see it pass with acquiescence.—To JOHN HARVIE. FORD ED., v, 214. (N. Y., July 1790.)

587. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Opposition engendered.—It is not to be expected that our system of finance has met your approbation in all its parts. It has excited even here great opposition; and more especially that part of it which transferred the State debts to the General Government. The States of Virginia and North Carolina are peculiarly dissatisfied with this measure. I believe, however, that it is harped on by many to mask their disaffection to the government on other grounds.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 198. FORD ED., v, 250. (Pa., Nov. 1790.)

588. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Payment by States.—With respect to the increase of the debt by the Assumption, I observed to him [Washington] that what was meant and objected to was, that it increased the debt of the General Government, and carried it beyond the possibility of payment; that if the balances had been settled, and the debtor States directed to pay their deficiencies to the creditor States, they would have done it easily, and by resources of taxation in their power, and acceptable to the people; by a direct tax in the South, and an excise in the North.—THE ANAS. ix, 118. FORD ED., i, 200. (July 1792.)

589. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Review of.—The game [Funding the debt] was over, and another was on the carpet at the moment of my arrival* [in New York in 1790], and to this I was most ignorantly and innocently made to hold the candle. This fiscal manœuvre is well known by the name of the Assumption. Independently of the debts of Congress, the States had, during the war, contracted separate and heavy debts; and Massachusetts particularly in an absurd attempt, absurdly conducted, on the British post of Penobscott; and the more debt Hamilton could rake up the more plunder for his mercenaries. This money, whether wisely or foolishly spent, was pretended to have been spent for general purposes, and ought, therefore, to be paid from the general purse. But it was objected that nobody knew what these debts were, what their amount, or what their proofs. No matter; we will guess them to be twenty millions. But of these twenty millions, we do not know how much should be reimbursed to one State, nor how much to another. No matter; we will guess. And so another scramble was set on foot among the several States, and some got much, some little, some nothing. But the main object was attained, the phalanx of the treasury was reinforced by additional recruits. This measure produced the most bitter and angry contests ever known in Congress, before or since the Union of the States. I arrived in the midst of it. But a stranger to the ground, a stranger to the actors on it, so long absent [in France] as to have lost all familiarity with the subject, and as yet unaware of its object, I took no concern in it. The great and trying question, however, was lost in the House of Representatives. So high were the feuds excited by this subject, that on its rejection business was suspended. Congress met and adjourned from day to day without doing anything, the parties being too much out of temper to do business together. The Eastern members particularly, who, with Smith from South Carolina, were the principal gamblers in these scenes, threatened a secession and dissolution. Hamilton was in despair. As I was going to the President's one day, I met him in the street. He walked me backwards and forwards before the President's door for half an hour. He painted pathetically the temper into which the Legislature had been wrought; the disgust of those who were called the creditor States; the danger of the secession of their members, and the separation of the States. He observed that the members of the administration ought to act in concert; that though this question was not one of my department, yet a common duty should make it a common concern; that the President was the centre on which all administrative questions ultimately rested, and that all of us should rally around him, and support, with joint efforts, measures approved by him; and that the question having been lost by a small majority only, it was probable that an appeal from me to the judgment and discretion of some of my friends might effect a change in the vote, and the machine of government, now suspended, might be again set into motion. I told him that I was really a stranger to the whole subject; that not having yet informed myself of the system of finance adopted, I knew not how far this was a necessary sequence; that undoubtedly, if its rejection endangered a dissolution of our Union at this incipient stage, I should deem that the most unfortunate of all consequences, to avert which all partial and temporary evils should be yielded. I proposed to him, however, to dine with me the next day, and I would invite another friend or two, to bring them into conference together, and I thought it impossible that reasonable men, consulting together coolly, could fail, by some mutual sacrifices of opinion, to form a compromise which was to save the Union. The discussion took place. I could take no part in it, but an exhortatory one, because I was a stranger to the circumstances which should govern it. But it was finally agreed that, whatever importance had been attached to the rejection of this proposition, the preservation of the Union, and of concord among the States was more important, and that therefore, it would be better that the vote of rejection should be rescinded, to effect which some members should change their votes. But it was observed that this bill would be peculiarly bitter to the Southern States, and that some concomitant measure should be adopted, to sweeten it a little to them. There had before been proposals to fix the seat of government either at Philadelphia, or at Georgetown on the Potomac; and it was thought that by giving it to Philadelphia for ten years, and to Georgetown permanently afterwards, this might, as an anodyne, calm in some degree the ferment which might be excited by the other measure alone. So two of the Potomac members ([Alexander] White and [Richard Bland] Lee but White with a revulsion of stomach almost convulsive), agreed to change their votes, and Hamilton undertook to carry the other point. In doing this the influence he had established over the Eastern members, with the agency of Robert Morris with those of the middle States effected his side of the engagement, and so the Assumption was passed, and twenty millions of stock divided among the favored States, and thrown in as pabulum to the stock-jobbing herd. This added to the number of votaries to the Treasury, and made its Chief the master of every vote in the Legislature which might give to the government the directions suited to his political views.—THE ANAS. ix, 92. FORD ED., i, 161. (1818.)

* Jefferson has here made the curious errors of separating the funding and assumption act, and of supposing the latter "was over" before he reached New York. Hamilton's report was debated in the House of Representatives from February to April, and it was not till May 6th that the funding bill was presented, the section relating to assumption having been negatived in committee. This bill passed the House on June 2d, and in the Senate had the assumption section restored. Not till August 4th did the bill so altered become a law.—NOTE IN FORD'S ED.

590. ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS, Jefferson's agency in.—The Assumption of the State debts in 1790, was a supplementary measure in Hamilton's fiscal system. When attempted in the House of Representatives it failed. This threw Hamilton himself, and a number of members into deep dismay. Going to the President's one day I met Hamilton, as I approached the door. His look was sombre, haggard, and dejected beyond description; even his dress uncouth and neglected. He asked to speak with me. He stood in the street near the door; he opened the subject of the Assumption of the State debts, the necessity of it in the general fiscal arrangement, and its indispensable necessity towards a preservation of the Union; and particularly of the New England States, who had made great expenditures during the war on expeditions which, though of their own undertaking, were for the common cause: that they considered the Assumption of these by the Union so just, and its denial so probably injurious that they would make it a sine qua non of a continuance of the Union. That as to his own part, if he had not credit enough to carry such a measure as that, he could be of no use and was determined to resign. He observed at the same time, that though our particular business lay in separate departments, yet the administration and its success was a common concern, and that we should make common cause in supporting one another. He added his wish that I would interest my friends from the South, who were those most opposed to it. I answered that I had been so long absent from my country [in France] that I had lost a familiarity with its affairs, and being but lately returned had not yet got into the train of them; that the fiscal system being out of my department I had not yet undertaken to consider and understand it; that the Assumption had struck me in an unfavorable light, but still, not having considered it sufficiently, I had not concerned [myself] in it, but that I would revolve what he had urged in my mind. It was a real fact that the Eastern and Southern members (South Carolina however was with the former) had got into the most extreme ill humor with one another. This broke out on every question with the most alarming heat; the bitterest animosity seemed to be engendered, and though they met every day, little or nothing could be done from mutual distrust and antipathy. On considering the situation of things, I thought the first step towards some conciliation of views would be to bring Mr. Madison and Colonel Hamilton to a friendly discussion of the subject. I immediately wrote to each to come and dine with me the next day, mentioning that we should be alone, that the object was to find some temperament for the present fever, and that I was persuaded that men of sound heads and honest views needed nothing more than explanation and mutual understanding to enable them to unite in some measures which might enable us to get along. They came; I opened the subject to them, acknowledged that my situation had not permitted me to understand it sufficiently but encouraged them to consider the thing together. They did so. It ended in Mr. Madison's acquiescence in a proposition that the question should be again brought before the House by way of amendment from the Senate: that though he would not vote for it, nor entirely withdraw his opposition, yet he should not be strenuous but leave it to its fate. It was observed, I forget by which of them, that as the pill would be a bitter one to the Southern States, something should be done to soothe them; that the removal of the seat of government to the Potomac was a just measure, and would probably be a popular one with them, and would be a proper one to follow the Assumption. It was agreed to speak to Mr. [Hugh] White and Mr. [Richard Bland] Lee whose districts lay on the Potomac, and to refer to them to consider how far the interests of their particular districts might be a sufficient inducement in them to yield to the Assumption. This was done. Lee came into it without hesitation: Mr. White had some qualms but finally agreed. The measure came down by way of amendment from the Senate and was finally carried by the change of White and Lee's votes. But the removal to the Potomac could not be carried unless Pennsylvania could be engaged in it. This Hamilton took on himself, and chiefly, as I understood, through the agency of Robert Morris, obtained a vote of that State, on agreeing to an intermediate residence at Philadelphia. This is the real history of the Assumption, about which many erroneous conjectures have been published. It was unjust in itself, oppressive to the States, and was acquiesced in merely from a fear of discussion. While our government was still in its most infant state, it enabled Hamilton so to strengthen himself by corrupt services to many that he could afterwards carry his bank scheme, and every measure he proposed in defiance of all opposition. In fact, it was a principal ground whereon was reared up that speculating phalanx, in and out of Congress, which has since been able to give laws to change the political complexion of the government of the United States.—To ———. FORD ED., vi, 172. (1793.)

591. ASTOR'S SETTLEMENT, Protection of.—I learn with great pleasure the progress you have made towards an establishment on Columbia river. I view it as the germ of a great, free, and independent empire on that side of our continent, and that liberty and self-government spreading from that as well as from this side, will insure their complete establishment over the whole. It must be still more gratifying to yourself to foresee that your name will be handed down with that of Columbus and Raleigh, as the father of the establishment and founder of such an empire. It would be an afflicting thing, indeed, should the English be able to break up the settlement. Their bigotry to the bastard liberty of their own country, and habitual hostility to every degree of freedom in any other, will induce the attempt; they would not lose the sale of a bale of furs for the empire of the whole world. But I hope your party will be able to maintain themselves * * * and have no doubt our government will do for its success whatever they have power to do and especially that at the negotiations for peace, they will provide, by convention with the English, for the safety and independence of that country, and an acknowledgment of our right of patronizing the Indians in all cases of injury from foreign nations.—To JOHN JACOB ASTOR. vi, 247. (M., 1813.) See FUR TRADE.

592. ASTOR'S SETTLEMENT, Territory and.—On the waters of the Pacific, we can found no claim in right of Louisiana. If we claim that country at all, it must be on Astor's settlement near the mouth of the Columbia, and the principle of the jus gentium of America, that when a civilized nation takes possession of the mouth of a river in a new country, that possession is considered as including all its waters.—To JOHN MELISH. vii, 51. (M., 1816.)

593. ASTRONOMY, Apparatus for.—This letter [is] to remind you of your kind promise of making me an accurate clock; which, being intended for astronomical purposes only, I would have divested of all apparatus for striking, or for any other purpose, which, by increasing its complication, might disturb its accuracy. A companion to it, for keeping seconds, and which might be moved easily, would greatly add to its value.—To DAVID RITTENHOUSE. i, 210. FORD ED., ii, 162. (M., 1778.)

594. ASTRONOMY, Bowditch's papers.—I am indebted to you for Mr. Bowditch's very learned mathematical papers, the calculations of which are not for every reader, although their results are readily enough understood. One of these impairs the confidence I had reposed in Laplace's demonstration, that the eccentricities of the planets of our system could oscillate only within narrow limits, and therefore could authorize no inference that the system must, by its own laws, come one day to an end. This would have left the question one of infinitude, at both ends of the line of time, clear of physical authority.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 112. (M., 1819.)

595. ASTRONOMY, Discoveries in.—Herschel has pushed his discoveries of double stars, now, to upwards of nine hundred, being twice the number of those communicated in the Philosophical Transactions. You have probably seen, that a Mr. Pigott had discovered periodical variations of light in the star Algol. He has observed the same in the η of Antinous, and makes the period of variation seven days, four hours, and thirty minutes, the duration of the increase sixty-three hours, and of the decrease thirty-six hours. What are we to conclude from this? That there are suns which have their orbits of revolution too? But this would suppose a wonderful harmony in their planets, and present a new scene, where the attracting powers should be without, and not within the orbit. The motion of our sun would be a miniature of this. But this must be left to you astronomers.—To PROFESSOR JAMES MADISON. i, 447. (P., 1785.)

596. ASTRONOMY, Planet Herschel.—I shall send you * * * the "Connoissance de l'ems" for the years 1786 and 1787, being all as yet published. You will find in these the tables for the planet Herschel, as far as the observations hitherto made, admit them to be calculated. You will see, also, that Herschel was only the first astronomer who discovered it to be a planet, and not the first who saw it. Meyer saw it in the year 1756, and placed it in the catalogue of his zodiacal stars, supposing it to be such. A Prussian astronomer, in the year 1781, observed that the 964th star of Meyer's catalogue was missing; and the calculations now prove that at the time Meyer saw his 964th star, the planet Herschel should have been precisely in the place where he noted that star.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 402. (P., 1785.)

597. — It is fixed on grounds which scarcely admit a doubt that the planet Herschel was seen by Meyer in the year 1756, and was considered by him as one of the zodiacal stars, and, as such, arranged in his catalogue, being the 964th which he describes. This 964th of Meyer has been since missing, and the calculations for the planet Herschel show that it should have been, at the time of Meyer's observation, where he places his 964th star.—To DR. STILES. i, 363. (P., 1785.)

598. ASTRONOMY, Solar eclipse.—We were much disappointed in Virginia generally on the day of the great eclipse, which proved to be cloudy. In Williamsburg, where it was total, I understand only the beginning was seen. At this place, (Monticello,) which is latitude 38° 3' and longitude west from Williamsburg, about 1° 45', as is conjectured, 11 digits only were supposed to be covered. It was not seen at all until the moon had advanced nearly one-third over the sun's disc. Afterwards it was seen at intervals through the whole. The egress particularly was visible. It proved, however, of little use to me, for want of a time piece that could be depended on.—To DAVID RITTENHOUSE. i, 210. FORD ED., ii, 162. (M., July, 1778.)

599. ASTRONOMY, Variations of light.—I think your conjecture that the periodical variation of light in certain fixed stars proceeds from maculæ, is more probable than that of Maupertius, who supposes those bodies may be flat, and more probable also than that which supposes the star to have an orbit of revolution so large a —y sensibly its degree of light. The latter —led more difficult of belief from the — of the period of variation.—To PROFES. J. MADISON. ii, 247. (P., 1787.)

600. ASYLUM, America as an.—America is now, I think, the only country of tranquillity, and should be the asylum of all those who wish to avoid the scenes which have crushed our friends in Paris.—To MRS. CHURCH. FORD ED., vi, 289. (Pa., 1793.)

601. — I think it fortunate for the United States to have become the asylum for so many virtuous patriots of different denominations; but their circumstances, with which you were so well acquainted before, enabled them to be but a bare asylum, and to offer nothing for them but an entire freedom to use their own means and faculties as they please.—To M. DE MEUNIER. FORD ED., vii, 13. (M., 1795.)

602. — Small means of being useful to you are left to me, but they shall be freely exercised for your advantage, and that, not on the selfish principle of increasing our own population at the expense of other nations, * * * but to consecrate a sanctuary for those whom the misrule of Europe may compel to seek happiness in other climes. This refuge, once known, will produce reaction on the happiness even of those who remain there, by warning their task-masters that when the evils of Egyptian oppression become heavier than those of the abandonment of country, another Canaan is open where their subjects will be received as brothers, and secured against like oppressions by a participation in the right of self government.—To GEORGE FLOWER. vii, 84. (P.F., 1817.)

603. ASYLUM, Consuls and.—The clause in the Consular convention with France of 1784 giving the right of sanctuary to consuls' houses, was reduced to a protection of their chancery room and its papers.—NOTES ON CONSULAR CONVENTION. ix, 463. (1803.)

604. ASYLUM, Public vessels and.—Article 12 [of the French treaty], giving asylum in the ports of either to the armed vessels of the other, with the prizes taken from the enemies of that other, must be qualified as it is in the 19th article of the Prussian treaty; as the stipulation in the latter part of the article, "that no shelter or refuge shall be given in the ports of the one, to such as shall have made prize on the subjects of the other of the parties," would forbid us in case of a war between France and Spain, to give shelter in our ports to prizes made by the latter on the former. while the first part of the article would oblige us to shelter those made by the former on the latter—a very dangerous covenant, and which ought never to be repeated in any other instance.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 588. FORD ED., v, 478. (March 1792.)

605. — The Executive has never denied the right of asylum in our ports to the public armed vessels of [the British] nation. They, as well as the French, are free to come to them, in all cases of weather, piracies, enemies, or other urgent necessity, and to refresh, victual and repair, &c.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iv, 65. FORD ED., vi, 423. (Pa., 1793.) See EXPATRIATION, FUGITIVES, IMPRESSMENT.

606. ATHEISM, Calumnious charges of.—As to the calumny of Atheism, I am so broken to calumnies of every kind, from every department of government, Executive, Legislative, and Judiciary, and from every minion of theirs holding office or seeking it, that I entirely disregard it, and from Chace it will have less effect than from any other man in the United States.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 447. (Ep., May 1800.)

607. ATHEIST, Not an.—An atheist * * * I can never be.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 281. (M., 1823.)

608. ATHENS, Government of.—The government of Athens was that of the people of one city making laws for the whole country subjected to them. That of Lacedæmon was the rule of military monks over the laboring class of the people, reduced to abject slavery. These are not the doctrines of the present age. The equal rights of man, and the happiness of every individual, are now acknowledged to be the only legitimate objects of government.—To M. CORAY. vii, 319. (M., 1823.)

609. ATTAINDER, Bills of.—The occasion and proper office of a bill of attainder is this: When a person charged with a crime withdraws from justice, or resists it by force, either in his own or a foreign country, no other recourse of bringing him to trial or punishment being practicable, a special act is passed by the legislature adapted to the particular case. This prescribes to him a sufficient time to appear and submit to a trial by his peers; declares that his refusal to appear shall be taken as a confession of guilt, as in the ordinary case of an offender at the bar refusing to plead, and pronounces the sentence which would have been rendered on his confession or conviction in a court of law. No doubt that these acts of attainder have been abused in England as instruments of vengeance by a successful over a defeated party. But what institution is insusceptible of abuse in wicked hands?—To L. H. GIRARDIN. vi, 440. FORD ED., ii, 151. (M., 1815.)

610. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Appointment of.—An Attorney General shall be appointed by the House of Representatives. PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 20. (June 1776.)

611. ATTORNEYS, Federal District.—The only shield for our republican citizens against the federalism of the courts is to have the attorneys and marshals republicans.—To A. STUART. iv, 394. FORD ED., viii, 47. (M., April 1801.)

612. — — — Republican attorneys and marshals, being the doors of entrance into the courts, are indispensably necessary as a shield to the republican part of our fellow citizens, which, I believe, is the main body of the people.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. iv, 381. FORD ED., viii, 25. (W., 1801.)

613. AUBAINE, Droit d'.—The expression in the eleventh article of our treaty of commerce and amity with France, "that the subjects of the United States shall not be reputed Aubaines in France, and consequently shall be exempted from the Droit d'Aubaine, or other similar duty, under what name soever," has been construed so rigorously to the letter, as to consider us as Aubaines in the colonies of France. Our intercourse with those colonies is so great, that frequent and important losses will accrue to individuals, if this construction be continued. * * * I presume that the enlightened Assembly now engaged in reforming the remains of feudal abuse among them, will not leave so inhospitable an one as the Droit d'Aubaine existing in France, or any of its dominions. If this may be hoped it will be better that you should not trouble the minister with any application for its abolition in the colonies as to us. This would be creating into a special favor to us the extinction of a general abuse, which will, I presume, extinguish of itself. Only be so good as to see, that in abolishing this odious law in France, its abolition in the colonies, also, be not omitted by mere oversight; but if, contrary to expectation, this fragment of barbarism be suffered to remain, then it will become necessary to bring forward the enclosed case, and press a liberal and just exposition of our treaty, so as to relieve our citizens from this species of risk and ruin hereafter.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 189. 614. AUTHORITY, Civil and Military.—Instead of subjecting the military to the civil power, his Majesty has expressly made the civil subordinate to the military. But can his Majesty thus put down all law under his feet? Can he erect a power superior to that which erected himself? He has done it indeed by force, but let him remember that force cannot give right.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 140. FORD ED., i, 445. (1774.)

615. — — — He [George III.], has endeavored to pervert the exercises of the Kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny. * * * by [affecting] to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 19. (June 1776.)

616. — — — He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

617. — — — The military shall be subordinate to the civil power.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. viii, 452. FORD ED., iii, 312. (1783.)

618. — — — A distinction is kept up between the civil and military which it is for the happiness of both to obliterate.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 335. FORD ED., iii, 467. (A., 1784.)

619. — — — A distinction [will be continued] between the civil and military which it would be for the good of the whole to obliterate as soon as possible.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 270. FORD ED., iv, 175. (P., 1786.)

620. — — — I do not see how they [the framers of the French constitution] can prohibit altogether the aid of the military in cases of riot, and yet I doubt whether they can descend from the sublimity of ancient military pride, to let a Marechal of France with his troops, be commanded by a magistrate. They cannot conceive that General Washington, at the head of his army, during the late war, could have been commanded by a common constable to go as his posse comitatus to suppress a mob, and that Count Rochambeau, when he was arrested at the head of his army by a sheriff, must have gone to jail if he had not given bail to appear in court. Though they have gone astonishing lengths, they are not yet thus far. It is probable, therefore, that not knowing how to use the military as a civil weapon, they will do too much or too little with it.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. iii, 90. (P., Aug. 1789.)

621. — —. The military shall be subordinate to the civil authority.—FRENCH CHARTER OF RIGHTS. iii, 47. FORD ED., v, 102. (P., 1789.)

622. — —. Bonaparte has transferred the destinies of the republic from the civil to the military arm. Some will use this as a lesson against the practicability of republican government. I read it as a lesson against the danger of standing armies.—To SAMUEL ADAMS. iv, 322. FORD ED., vii, 425. (Pa., Feb. 1800.)

623. — —. The supremacy of the civil over the military authority, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. 'viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.)

624. — —. I sincerely wish General Wilkinson could be appointed as you propose. But besides the objection from principle, that no military commander should be so placed as to have no civil superior, his residence at Natchez is entirely inconsistent with his superintendence of the military posts.—To SAMUEL SMITH. FORD ED., viii, 29. (W., March 1801.)

625. — —. Not a single fact has appeared, which occasions me to doubt that I could have made a fitter appointment than General Wilkinson. One qualm of principle I acknowledge I do feel, I mean the union of the civil and military authority. You remember that when I went into office * * * he was pressed on me to be made Governor of the Mississippi Territory, and that I refused it on that very principle. When, therefore, the House of Representatives took that ground, I was not insensible to its having some weight. But in the appointment to Louisiana, I did not think myself departing from my own principle, because I consider it not as a civil government, but merely a military station. The Legislature had sanctioned that idea by the establishment of the office of the Commandant, in which were completely blended the civil and military powers. It seemed therefore, that the Governor should be in suit with them. I observed, too, that the House of Representatives, on the very day they passed the stricture on this union of authorities, passed a bill making the Governor of Michigan commander of the regular troops which should at any time be within his government.—To SAMUEL SMITH. v, 13. FORD ED., viii, 450. (W., May 1806.)

626. AUTHORITY, Civil and Military united.—From a belief that, under the pressure of the [British] invasion under which we [Virginia] were then [1781] laboring, the public would have more confidence in a military chief, and that the military commander, being invested with the civil power also, both might be wielded with more energy, promptitude and effect for the defence of the State, I resigned the administration [the Governorship] at the end of my second year, [1781] and General Nelson was appointed to succeed me.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 50. FORD ED., i, 70. (1821.)

627. AUTHORITY, Conflict of.—Congress having * * * directed that they [British prisoners in Virginia] should not be removed, and our Assembly that they should, the Executive [of Virginia] are placed in a very disagreeable situation. We can order them to the banks of the Potomac, but our authority will not land them on the opposite shore.—To BENJAMIN HARRISON. FORD ED., ii, 439. (R., 1781.)

630. AUTHORITY, Enforcing.—We would do anything in our power to support and manifest your authority, were anything wanting. But nothing can be added to the provision which the military institutions have made to enforce obedience, and it would be presumption in us to say what is that provision to you.—To MAJOR-GENERAL STEUBEN. FORD ED., ii, 491. (R., 1781.)

631. — —. We cannot be respected by France as a neutral nation, nor by the world ourselves as an independent one, if we do not take effectual measures to support, at every risk, our authority in our own harbors.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 558. FORD ED., viii, 315. (M., Aug. 1804.)

632. AUTHORITY, Habits of.—If the President can be preserved a few years till habits of authority and obedience [to the new government] can be established generally, we have nothing to fear.—To M. DE LAFAYETTE. iii, 132. FORD ED., v, 152. (N.Y., April 1790.)

637. AUTHORITY, Religion and Federal.—Civil powers alone have been given to the President of the United States, and no authority to direct the religious exercises of his constituents.—To REV. SAMUEL MILLER. v, 237. FORD ED., ix, 175. (W., 1808.)

638. — — — No power to prescribe any religious exercise, or to assume authority in religious discipline, has been delegated to the General Government. It must then rest with States, so far as it can be in any human authority.—To REV. SAMUEL MILLER. v, 237. FORD ED., ix, 174. (W., 1808.)

639. AUTHORITY, Repudiated.—The British Parliament has no right to exercise authority over us.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 130. FORD ED., i, 434. (1774.)

640. AUTHORITY, Resistance to usurped.—It is a dangerous lesson to say to the people "whenever your functionaries exercise unlawful authority over you, if you do not go into actual resistance, it will be deemed acquiescence and confirmation." How long had we acquiesced under usurpations of the British parliament? Had that confirmed them in right, and made our Revolution a wrong? Besides no authority has yet decided whether this resistance must be instantaneous: when the right to resist ceases, or whether it has yet ceased?—To JOHN HAMBLEN PLEASANTS. vii, 345. FORD ED., x, 302. (M., 1824.)

641. AUTHORITY, Self-constituted.—I deem no government safe which is under the vassalage of any self-constituted authorities, or any other authority than that of the nation, or its regular functionaries.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 519. FORD ED., viii, 285. (W., Dec. 1803.)

642. AUTHORITY, Source of.—I consider the source of authority with us to be the Nation. Their will, declared through its proper organ, is valid, till revoked by their will declared through its proper organ again also. Between 1776 and 1789, the proper organ for pronouncing their will, whether legislative or executive, was a Congress formed in a particular manner. Since 1789, it is a Congress formed in a different manner, for laws, and a President, elected in a particular way, for making appointments and doing other executive acts. The laws and appointments of the ancient Congress were as valid and permanent in their nature, as the laws of the new Congress, or appointments of the new Executive; these laws and appointments, in both cases, deriving equally their source from the will of the Nation.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 332. FORD ED., v, 437. (Pa., 1792.)

643. — — — I consider the people who constitute a society or nation as the source of all authority in that nation; as free to transact their common concerns by any agents they think proper; to change these agents individually, or the organization of them in form or function whenever they please; that all the acts done by these agents under the authority of the nation are the acts of the nation, are obligatory to them and inure to their use, and can in no wise be annulled or affected by any change in the form of the government, or of the persons administering it.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 612. FORD ED., vi, 220. (1793.)

644. AUTHORITY, Upholding.—In no country on earth is it [forcible opposition to the law] so impracticable as in one where every man feels a vital interest in maintaining the authority of the laws, and instantly engages in it as in his own personal cause.—To BENJAMIN SMITH. v, 293. FORD ED., ix, 195. (M., 1808.)

645. — — — Forcible opposition [to the embargo] will rally the whole body of republicans of every shade to a single point.—that of supporting the public authority.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 347. (M., Aug. 1808.)

646. AUTHORITY, Usurpation of.—Necessities which dissolve a government do not convey its authority to an oligarchy or a monarchy. They throw back into the hands of the people the powers they had delegated, and leave them as individuals to shift for themselves.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 369. FORD ED., iii, 233. (1782.)

647. AUTHORITY, Washington and Civil.—You [General Washington] have conducted the great military contest with wisdom and fortitude, invariably regarding the rights of the civil power through all disasters and changes.—CONGRESS TO GEN. WASHINGTON. (Dec. 23, 1783.)

648. AVARICE, Commercial.—It seems to me that in proportion as commercial avarice and corruption advance on us from the North and East, the principles of free government are to retire to the agricultural States of the South and West, as their last asylum and bulwark.—To HENRY MIDDLETON. vi, 91. 650. BAINBRIDGE (William), Victory of.—After the loss of the Philadelphia, Captain Bainbridge had a character to redeem. He has done it most honorably, and no one is more gratified by it than myself.—To MATTHEW CARR. vi, 132. (M., 1813.)

651. BALLOONS, Experiments with.—There seems a possibility that the great desideratum in the use of the balloon may be obtained. There are two persons at Javel (opposite to Auteuil), who are pushing this matter. They are able to rise and fall at will, without expending their gas, and they can deflect forty-five degrees from the course of the wind.—To R. IZARD. i, 443. (P., 1785.)

652. BALLOONS, Fall from.—An accident has happened here [France] which will probably damp the ardor with which aerial navigation has been pursued. Monsieur Pilatre de Roziere had been waiting for many months at Boulogne a fair wind to cross the channel in a balloon which was compounded of one of inflammable air, and another called a Montgolfier with rarefied air only. He at length thought the wind fair and with a companion, Romain, ascended. After proceeding in a proper direction about two leagues, the wind changed and brought them again over the French coast. Being at the height of about six thousand feet, some accident, unknown, burst the balloon of inflammable air, and the Montgolfier, being unequal alone to sustain their weight, they precipitated from that height to the earth and were crushed to atoms.—To JOSEPH JONES. i, 353. (P., June 1785.)

653. — — — The arts, instead of advancing, have lately received a check which will probably render stationary for awhile, that branch of them which had promised to elevate us to the skies. Pilatre de Roziere, who had first ventured into that region, has fallen a sacrifice to it. In an attempt to pass from Boulogne over to England, a change in the wind having brought him on the coast of France, some accident happened to his balloon of inflammable air, which occasioned it to burst, and that of rarefied air combined with it being then unequal to the weight, they fell to the earth from a height, which the first reports made six thousand feet, but later ones have reduced to sixteen hundred. Pilatre de Roziere was dead when a peasant distant one hundred yards away, ran to him; but Romain, his companion, lived about ten minutes, though speechless, and without his senses.—To CHARLES THOMSON. i, 355. (P., 1785.)

654. BALLOONS, Peril of.—Though navigation by water is attended with frequent accidents, and in its infancy must have been attended with more, yet these are now so familiar that we think little of them, while that which has signalized the two first martyrs to the aeronautical art will probably deter very many from the experiments they would have been disposed to make.—To CHARLES THOMSON. i, 354. (P., 1785.)

— BALLOT.—See SUFFRAGE.

— BANISHMENT.—See EXILE.

655. BANK (National 1813), Charter of.—The scheme is for Congress to establish a national bank, suppose of thirty millions capital, of which they shall contribute ten millions in six per cent. stock, the States ten millions, and individuals ten millions, one half of the two last contributions to be of a similar stock, for which the parties are to give cash to Congress; the whole, however, to be under the exclusive management of the individual subscribers, who are to name all the directors; neither Congress nor the States having any power of interference in its administration. Discounts are to be at five per cent., but the profits are expected to be at seven per cent. Congress then will be paying six per cent. on twenty millions, and receiving seven per cent. on ten millions, being its third of the institution; so that on the ten millions cash which they receive from the States and individuals, they will, in fact, have to pay but five per cent. interest. This is the bait. The charter is proposed to be for forty or fifty years, and if any future augmentations should take place, the individual proprietors are to have the privilege of being the sole subscribers for that. Congress are further allowed to issue to the amount of three millions of notes, bearing interest, which they are to receive back in payment for lands at a premium of five or ten per cent., or as subscriptions for canals, roads, and bridges, in which undertakings they are, of course, to be engaged. This is a summary of the case as I understand it; but it is very possible I may not understand it in all its parts, these schemes being always made unintelligible for the gulls who are to enter into them.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 228. FORD ED., ix, 403. (M., Nov. 1813.)

656. BANK (National 1813), Considerations on.—The advantages and disadvantages shall be noted promiscuously as they occur; leaving out the speculation of canals &c., which, being an episode only in the scheme, may be omitted, to disentangle it as much as we can. 1. Congress are to receive five millions from the States (if they will enter into this partnership, which few probably will), and five millions from the individual subscribers, in exchange for ten millions of six per cent. stock, one per cent. of which, however, they will make on their ten millions of stock remaining in bank, and so reduce it, in effect, to a loan of ten millions at five per cent. interest. This is good; but, 2. They authorize this bank to throw into circulation ninety millions of dollars (three times the capital), which increases our circulating medium fifty per cent.; depreciates proportionably the present value of a dollar, and raises the price of all future purchases in the same proportion. 3. This loan of ten millions at five per cent., is to be once for all, only. Neither the terms of the scheme, nor their own prudence could ever permit them to add to the circulation in the same, or any other way, for the supplies of the succeeding years of the war. These succeeding years then are to be left unprovided for, and the means of doing it in a great measure precluded. 4. The individual subscribers, on paying their own five millions of cash to Congress, become the depositors of ten millions of stock belonging to Congress, five millions belonging to the States, and five millions to themselves, say twenty millions, with which, as no one has a right ever to see their books, or to ask a question, they may choose their time for running away, after adding to their booty the proceeds of as much of their own notes as they shall be able to throw into circulation. 5. The subscribers may be one, two, or three, or more individuals (many single individuals being able to pay in the five millions), whereupon this bank oligarchy or monarchy enters the field with ninety millions of dollars, to direct and control the politics of the nation; and of the influence of these institutions on our politics, and into what scale it will be thrown, we have had abundant experience. Indeed, England herself may be the real, while her friend and trustee here shall be the nominal and sole subscriber. 6. This state of things is to be fastened on us, without the power of relief, for forty or fifty years. That is to say, the eight millions of people now existing, for the sake of receiving one dollar and twenty-five cents apiece, at five per cent. interest, are to subject the fifty millions of people who are to succeed them within that term, to the payment of forty-five millions of dollars, principal and interest, which will be payable in the course of the fifty years. 7. But the great and national advantage is to be the relief of the present scarcity of money, which is produced and proved by, 1. The additional industry created to supply a variety of articles for the troops, ammunition, &c. 2. By the cash sent to the frontiers, and the vacuum occasioned in the trading towns by that. 3. By the late loans. 4. By the necessity of recurring to shavers with good paper, which the existing banks are not able to take up; and 5. By the numerous applications of bank charters showing that an increase of circulating medium is wanting.—To J. W. EPPES, vi, 229. FORD ED., ix, 403. (M., Nov. 1813.)

657. BANK (National 1813), Increased Medium and.—Let us examine these causes and proofs of the want of our increase of medium, one by one. 1. The additional industry created to supply a variety of articles for troops, ammunition, &c. Now, I had always supposed that war produced a diminution of industry, by the number of hands it withdraws from industrious pursuits for employment in arms, &c., which are totally unproductive. And if it calls for new industry in the articles of ammunition and other military supplies, the hands are borrowed from other branches on which the demand is slackened by the war; so that it is but a shifting of these hands from one pursuit to another. 2. The cash sent to the frontiers occasions a vacuum in the trading towns, which requires a new supply. Let us examine what are the calls for money to the frontiers. Not for clothing, tents, ammunition, arms, which are all bought in the trading towns. Not for provisions; for although these are bought partly in the immediate country, bank bills are more acceptable there than even in the trading towns. The pay of the army calls for some cash, but not a great deal, as bank notes are as acceptable with the military men, perhaps more so; and what cash is sent must find its way back again in exchange for the wants of the upper from the lower country. For we are not to suppose that cash stays accumulating there forever. 3. This scarcity has been occasioned by the late loans. But does the government borrow money to keep it in their coffers? Is it not instantly restored to circulation by payment for its necessary supplies? And are we to restore a vacuum of twenty millions of dollars by an emission of ninety millions? 4. The want of medium is proved by the recurrence of individuals with good paper to brokers at exorbitant interest; and 5. By the numerous applications to the State governments for additional banks; New York wanting eighteen millions, Pennsylvania ten millions, &c. But say more correctly, the speculators and spendthrifts of New York and Pennsylvania, but never consider them as being the States of New York and Pennsylvania. These two items shall be considered together.—To J. W. EPPES, vi, 231. FORD ED., ix, 405. (M., Nov. 1813.)

658. BANK (National 1813), Paper, Specie and.—It is a litigated question, whether the circulation of paper, rather than of specie, is a good or an evil. In the opinion of England and of English writers it is a good; in that of all other nations it is an evil; and excepting England and her copyist, the United States, there is not a nation existing, I believe, which tolerates a paper circulation. The experiment is going on, however, desperately in England, pretty boldly with us, and at the end of the chapter, we shall see which opinion experience approves: for I believe it to be one of those cases where mercantile clamor will bear down reason, until it is corrected by ruin.—To J. W. EPPES, vi, 232. FORD ED., ix, 405. (M., Nov. 1813.)

659. BANK (National 1813), Unconstitutional.—After the solemn decision of Congress against the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, and the grounds of that decision (the want of constitutional power), I had imagined that question at rest, and that no more applications would be made to them for the incorporation of banks. The opposition on that ground to its first establishment, the small majority by which it was overborne, and the means practiced for obtaining it, cannot be already forgotten. The law having passed, however, by a majority, its opponents, true to the sacred principle of submission to a majority, suffered the law to flow through its term without obstruction. During this, the nation had time to consider the constitutional question, and when the renewal was proposed, they condemned it, not by their representatives in Congress only, but by express instructions from different organs of their will. Here an appropriation (for naval contingencies) to the discretion of the Executive. Under this appropriation our predecessors bought the vessel (for there was no order of Congress authorizing them to buy) and began her repairs; we completed them. I will not say that a very gross abuse of discretion in a past appropriation would not furnish ground to the Legislature to take notice of it. In what form is not now necessary to decide. But so far from a gross abuse, the decision in this case was correct, honorable and advantageous to the nation. I cannot see to what legitimate objects any resolution of the House on the subject can lead; and if one is passed on ground not legitimate, our duty will be to resist it.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. FORD ED., viii, 142. (April 1802.)

415. APPROPRIATIONS, Diverting.—The diversion of the [French] money from its legal appropriation offers a flaw against the Executive which may place them in the wrong.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 179. (1793.)

416. — —. If it should appear that the Legislature has done their part in furnishing the money for the French nation, and that the Executive departments have applied it to other purposes, then it will certainly be desirable that we get back on legal ground as soon as possible, by pressing on the domestic funds and availing ourselves of any proper opportunity which may be furnished of replacing the money to the foreign creditors.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 177. (1793.)

417. APPROPRIATIONS, Estimates and.—I like your idea of kneading all Hamilton's little scraps and fragments into one batch, and adding to it a complementary sum, which, while it forms it into a single mass from which everything is to be paid, will enable us, should a breach of appropriation ever be charged on us, to prove that the sum appropriated, and more, has been applied to its specific object.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 428. FORD ED., viii, 140. (W., 1802.)

418. — —. Congress, aware that too minute a specification has its evil as well as a too general one, does not make the estimate a part of their law, but gives a sum in gross, trusting the Executive discretion for that year, and that sum only; so in other departments, as of War, for instance, the estimate of the Secretary specifies all the items of clothing, subsistence, pay, &c., of the army. And Congress throws this into such masses as they think best, to wit, a sum in gross for clothing, another for subsistence, a third for pay, &c., binding up the Executive discretion only by the sum, and the object generalized to a certain degree. The minute details of the estimate are thus dispensed with in point of obligation, and the discretion of the officer is enlarged to the limits of the classification which Congress thinks it best for the public interest to make.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 529. (1804.)

419. APPROPRIATIONS, Executive power over.—The Executive * * * has the power, though not the right, to apply money contrary to its legal appropriations. Cases may be imagined, however, where it would be the duty to do this. But they must be cases of extreme necessity. The payment of interest to the domestic creditors has been mentioned as one of the causes of diverting the foreign fund. But this is not an object of greater necessity than that to which it was legally appropriated. It is taking the money from our foreign creditors to pay it to the domestic ones; a preference which neither justice, gratitude, nor the estimation in which the two descriptions of creditors are held in the country will justify. The payment of the Army and the daily expenses of the government have been also mentioned as objects withdrawing this money. These indeed are pressing objects, and might produce that degree of distressing necessity which would be a justification.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 176. (Pa., 1793.)

420. APPROPRIATIONS, Expenditures and.—A violation of a law making appropriations of money, is a violation of the section of the Constitution of the United States which requires that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.—GILES TREASURY RESOLUTIONS. FORD ED., vi, 110. (1793.)

421. APPROPRIATIONS, Specific.—It is essential to the due administration of the government of the United States, that the making specific appropriations of money should be strictly observed by the Secretary of the Treasury thereof.—GILES TREASURY RESOLUTIONS. FORD ED., vi, 168. (1793.)

422. — —. In our care of the public contributions intrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition; by disallowing applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, thereby circumscribing discretionary power over money; and by bringing back to the same department all accountabilities for money where the examination may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 10. FORD ED., viii, 120. (1801.) See MONEY BILLS.

423. ARBITRATION, Offer of.—As our dispute with Schweighauser and Dobrée in the conversation I had with Dobrée at Nantes, he appeared to think so rationally of the subject, that I thought there would be difficulty in accommodating it with him. I wished rather to settle it by accommodation than to apply to the minister. I afterwards had it intimated to him * * *, that I had in idea to propose a reference to arbitration. He expressed a cheerful concurrence in it thereupon made the proposition to him.

mally, by letter, mentioning particularly, that we would choose our arbitrators of some neutral nation, and, of preference, from among the Dutch refugees in Paris. I was surprised to receive an answer from him, wherein, after expressing his own readiness to accede to this proposition, he added, that on consulting with Mr. Puchilberg, he had declined it.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 496. (P., 1788.)

424. ——. I began by offering to Schweighauser and Dobrée an arbitration before honest and judicious men of a neutral nation. They declined this, and had the modesty to propose an arbitration before merchants of their own town. I gave them warning then, that as the offer on the part of a sovereign nation to submit to a private arbitration was an unusual condescendence, if they did not accept them, it would not be repeated, and that the United States would judge the case for themselves hereafter. They continued to decline it.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 365. (Pa., 1791.)

425. ARBORICULTURE, Coffee tree.—Bartram is extremely anxious to get a large supply of seeds of the Kentucky coffee tree. I told him I would use all my interest with you to obtain it, as I think I heard you say that some neighbors of yours had a large number of trees. Be so good as to take measures for bringing a good quantity, if possible, to Bartram when you come to Congress.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 569. FORD ED., vi, 279. (1793.)

426. ARBORICULTURE, Cork Oak.—I expect from the South of France some acorns of the cork oak, which I propose for your society [Agricultural], as I am persuaded they will succeed with you. I observed it to grow in England without shelter, not well, indeed, but so as to give hopes that it would do well with you.—To WILLIAM DRAYTON. i, 555. (P., 1786.)

427. ——. I sent you a parcel of acorns of the cork oak by Colonel Franks. To WILLIAM DRAYTON. ii, 202. (Pa., 1787.)

428. ——. I have been long endeavoring to procure the cork tree from Europe, but without success. A plant which I brought with me from Paris died after languishing some time, and of several parcels of acorns received from a correspondent at Marseilles, not one has ever vegetated. I shall continue my endeavors, although disheartened by the nonchalance of our southern fellow citizens, with whom alone they can thrive.—To JAMES RONALDSON. vi, 92. FORD ED., ix, 370. (M., Jan. 1813.)

429. ARBORICULTURE, Fruit trees.—Should you be able to send me any plants of good fruit, and especially of peaches and eating grapes, they will be thankfully received.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., viii, 16. (W., March 1801.)

— ARBORICULTURE, the Olive.—See OLIVE.

430. ARBORICULTURE, Pecan.—The pecan nut is, as you conjecture, the Illinois nut. The former is the vulgar name south of the Potomac, as also with the Indians and Spaniards, and enters also into the botanical name which is Juglano Pacan.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. ii, 74. (P., 1786.)

431. ——. Procure me two or three hundred pecan nuts from the western country.—To F. HOPKINSON. i, 506. (P., 1786.)

432. ——. I thank you for the pecan nuts.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 156. FORD ED., iv, 396. (P., 1787.)

433. ARBORICULTURE, Sensitive Plant.—Your attention to one burthen I laid on you, encourages me to remind you of another, which is the sending me some of the seeds of the Dionæa Muscipula, or Venus fly-trap, called also with you, I believe, the Sensitive Plant.—To MR. HAWKINS. ii, 3. (P., 1786.)

434. ARBORICULTURE, Trees.—I send a packet of the seeds of trees which I would wish Anthony to sow in a large nursery, noting well their names.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. FORD ED., iv, 344. (P., 1786.)

435. ARBORICULTURE, Vines.—I am making a collection of vines for wine and for the table.—To A. CAREY. i, 508. (P., 1786.)

436. ARCHITECTURE, Bad.—The genius of architecture seems to have shed its maledictions over this land [Virginia].—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 394. FORD ED., iii, 258. (1782.)

437. ARCHITECTURE, Beauty in.—How is a taste in this beautiful art to be formed in our countrymen unless we avail ourselves of every occasion when public buildings are to be erected, of presenting to them models for their study and imitation?—To JAMES MADISON. i, 433. (P., 1785.)

438. ARCHITECTURE, Brick, Stone, Wood.—All we shall do in the way of reformation will produce no permanent improvement to our country, while the unhappy prejudice prevails that houses of brick or stone are less wholesome than those of wood. A dew is often observed on the walls of the former in rainy weather, and the most obvious solution is, that the rain has penetrated through these walls. The following facts, however, are sufficient to prove the error of this solution: 1. This dew on the walls appears when there is no rain, if the state of the atmosphere be moist. 2. It appears on the partition as well as the exterior walls. 3. So, also on pavements of brick or stone. 4. It is more copious in proportion as the walls are thicker; the reverse of which ought to be the case, if this hypothesis were just. If cold water be poured into a vessel of stone, or glass, a dew forms instantly on the outside; but if it be poured into a vessel of wood, there is no such appearance. It is not supposed, in the first case, that the water has exuded through the glass, but that it is precipitated from the circumambient air; as the humid particles of vapor, passing from the boiler of an alembic through its refrigerant, are precipitated from the air, in which they are suspended, on the internal surface of the refrigerant. Walls of brick or stone act as the refrigerant in this instance. They are sufficiently cold to condense and precipitate the moisture suspended in the air of the room, when it is heavily charged therewith. But

walls of wood are not so. The question then is, whether the air in which this moisture is left floating, or that which is deprived of it, be most wholesome? In both cases, the remedy is easy. A little fire kindled in the room, whenever the air is damp, prevents the precipitation on the walls; and this practice, found healthy in the warmest as well as coldest seasons, is as necessary in a wooden as in a stone or brick house. I do not mean to say, that the rain never penetrates through walls of brick. On the contrary, I have seen instances of it. But with us it is only through the northern and eastern walls of the house, after a north-easterly storm, these being the only ones which continue long enough to force through the walls. This, however, happens too rarely to give a just character of unwholesomeness to such houses. In a house, the walls of which are of well-burnt brick and good mortar, I have seen the rain penetrate through but twice in a dozen or fifteen years. The inhabitants of Europe, who dwell chiefly in houses of stone or brick, are surely as healthy as those of Virginia. These houses have the advantage, too, of being warmer in winter and cooler in summer than those of wood; of being cheaper in their first construction, where lime is convenient, and infinitely more durable. The latter consideration renders it of great importance to eradicate this prejudice from the minds of our countrymen. A country whose buildings are of wood, can never increase in its improvements to any considerable degree. Their duration is highly estimated at fifty years. Every half century then our country becomes a tabula rasa, whereon we have to set out anew, as in the first moment of seating it. Whereas when buildings are of durable materials, every new edifice is an actual and permanent acquisition to the State, adding to its value as well as to its ornament.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 395. FORD ED., iii, 258. (1782.)

439. ARCHITECTURE, Delight in.—Architecture is my delight, and putting up and pulling down, one of my favorite amusements.—RAYNER'S LIFE OF JEFFERSON. 524.

440. ARCHITECTURE, Economy in.—I have scribbled some general notes on the plan of a house you enclosed. I have done more. I have endeavored to throw the same area, the same extent of walls, the same number of rooms, and of the same sizes, into another form so as to offer a choice to the builder. Indeed, I varied my plan by showing what it would be with alcove bed rooms, to which I am so much attached.—TO JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 259. (Pa., 1793.)

441. ARCHITECTURE, English.—English architecture is in the most wretched style I ever saw, not meaning to except America, where it is bad, nor even Virginia, where it is worse than in any other part of America, which I have seen.—TO JOHN PAGE. i, 550. FORD ED., iv, 214. (P., 1786.)

442. ARCHITECTURE, Fascination of.—Here I am gazing whole hours at the Maison quarée, like a lover at his mistress.

The stocking weavers and silk spinners around it consider me a hypochondriac Englishman, about to write with a pistol the last chapter of his history. This is the second time I have been in love since I left Paris. The first was with a Diana at the Chateau Laye-Epinaye in Beaujolais, a delicious model of sculpture, by M. A. Slodtz. This, you will say, was in rule, to fall in love with female beauty; but with a house! it is out of all precedent. No, madame, it is not without a precedent in my own history. While in Paris I was violently smitten with the House of Salm, and used to go to the Tuileries almost daily, to look at it.—TO MADAME DE COMTESSE DE TESSE. ii, 131. (N., 1787.)

443. ARCHITECTURE, Faulty.—Buildings are often erected, by individuals, considerable expense. To give these symmetry and taste, would not increase their cost. It would only change the arrangement of the materials, the form and combination of the members. This would often cost less than the burden of barbarous ornaments with which these buildings are sometimes charged. But the first principles of the art are unknown, and there exists scarcely a model among us sufficiently chaste to give an idea of them. NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 394. FORD ED., iii, 258. (1782.)

444. ARCHITECTURE, French.—Would I proceed to tell you how much I enjoy French architecture  I should waste many words.—TO MR. BELLINI. i, 445. (P., 1786.)

445. ARCHITECTURE, Importance of.—Architecture is worth great attention. If we double our number every twenty years, we must double our houses.  It is, therefore, among the most important arts; and it is desirable to introduce taste into an art which shows so much.—TRAVELLING HINTS. ix, 4 (1788.)

446. ARCHITECTURE, Plan of Prison.—With respect to the plan of a Prison, I have questioned [by the Virginia authorities] in 1787 (being then in Paris), I had heard of a benevolent society, in England, which had been indulged by the government, in an experiment of the effect of labor, in solitary confinement, on some of their criminals: which experiment had succeeded beyond expectation. The same idea had been suggested in France, and an architect of Lyons had proposed a plan of a well-contrived edifice, on the principle of solitary confinement. I procured a copy, and it was too large for our purposes. I drew on a scale less extensive, but susceptible of additions as they should be wanting. This I sent to the directors, instead of a plan of a common prison, in the hope that it would suggest the idea of labor in solitary confinement, instead of that on the public works which we had adopted in our Revised Code. Its principle, accordingly, but not its form, was adopted by Latrobe in carrying his plan into execution, by the erection of what is now called the Penitentiary, built under his direction.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 46. FORD ED., vi, 64. (1821.)

447. ARCHITECTURE, Porticos.—A portico may be from five to ten diameters of the column deep, or projected from the building. If of more than five diameters, there must be a column in the middle of each flank, since it must never be more than five diameters from center to center of column. The portico of the Maison quarrée is three intercolumniations deep. I never saw as much to a private house.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 327. (1793.)

— ARCHITECTURE, Roman.—See ANTIQUITIES.

448. ARCHITECTURE, Ugly.—The private buildings [in Virginia] are very rarely constructed of stone or brick, much the greater portion being of scantling and boards, plastered with lime. It is impossible to devise things more ugly, uncomfortable, and happily more perishable.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 393. FORD ED., iii, 257. (1782.)

449. ARCHITECTURE, Virginia Capitol.—I was written to in 1785 (being then in Paris) by directors appointed to superintend the building of a Capitol in Richmond, to advise them as to a plan, and to add to it one of a Prison. Thinking it a favorable opportunity of introducing into the State an example of architecture, in the classic style of antiquity, and the Maison quarrée of Nîmes, an ancient Roman temple, being considered as the most perfect model existing of what may be called Cubic architecture, I applied to M. Clerissault, who had published drawings of the Antiquities of Nîmes, to have me a model of the building made in stucco, only changing the order from Corinthian to Ionic, on account of the difficulty of the Corinthian capitals. I yielded, with reluctance, to the taste of Clerissault, in his preference of the modern capital of Scamozzi to the more noble capital of antiquity. This was executed by the artist whom Choiseul Gouffier had carried with him to Constantinople, and employed, while ambassador there, in making those beautiful models of the remains of Grecian architecture which are to be seen at Paris. To adapt the exterior to our use, I drew a plan for the interior, with the apartments necessary for legislative, executive, and judiciary purposes; and accommodated in their size and distribution to the form and dimensions of the building. These were forwarded to the directors, in 1786, and were carried into execution, with some variations, not for the better, the most important of which, however, admit of future correction.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 45. FORD ED., i, 63. (1821.)

450. ——. We took for our model what is called the Maison quarrée of Nîmes, one of the most beautiful, if not the most beautiful and precious morsel of architecture left us by antiquity. It was built by Caius and Lucius Cæsar, and repaired by Louis XIV., and has the suffrage of all the judges of architecture who have seen it, as yielding to no one of the beautiful monuments of Greece, Rome, Palmyra and Balbec, which late travellers have communicated to us. It is very simple, but it is noble beyond expression, and would have done honor to our country, as presenting to travellers a specimen of taste in our infancy, promising much for our maturer age.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 432. (P., 1785.)

451. ——. I shall send them a plan taken from the best model of ancient architecture now remaining. It has obtained the approbation of fifteen or sixteen centuries, and is, therefore, preferable to any design which might be newly contrived. It will give more room, be more convenient and cost less than the plan they sent me. Pray encourage them to wait for it, and to execute it. It will be superior in beauty to anything in America, and not inferior to anything in the world. It is very simple.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 415. (P., 1785.)

452. ——. The designs for the Capitol are simple and sublime. More cannot be said. They are not the brat of a whimsical conception never before brought to light, but copied from the most precious, the most perfect model, of ancient architecture remaining on earth; one which has received the approbation of near 2000 years, and which is sufficiently remarkable to have been visited by all travellers.—To Dr. JAMES CURRIE. FORD ED., iv, 133. (P., 1786.)

453. ——. I have been much mortified with information I received * * * from Virginia, that the first brick of the Capitol would be laid within a few days. But surely, the delay of this piece of a summer would have been repaired by the savings in the plan preparing here, were we to value its other superiorities as nothing.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 432. (P., 1785.)

(454. ——. Do * * * exert yourself to get the plan [of the Capitol] begun on, set aside and that adopted which was drawn here. It was taken from a model which has been the admiration of sixteen centuries; which has been the object of as many pilgrimages as the tomb of Mahomet; which will give unrivalled honor to our State, and furnish a model whereon to form the taste of our young men. It will cost much less, too, than the one begun because it does not cover one-half the area.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 534. FORD ED., iv, 196. (P., 1785.)

455. ——. Pray try if you can effect the stopping of this work. * * * The loss will be only of the laying the bricks already laid, or a part of them. The bricks themselves will do again for the interior walls, and one side wall and one end wall may remain, as they will answer equally well for our plan. This loss is not to be weighed against the saving of money which will arise, against the comfort of laying out the public money for something honorable, the satisfaction of seeing an object and proof of national good taste, and the regret and mortification of erecting a monument of our barbarism, which will be loaded with execrations as long as it shall endure.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 433. (P., 1785.)

456. ——. Our new Capitol, when the corrections are made, of which it is susceptible, will be an edifice of first rate dignity. Whenever it shall be finished with the proper ornaments belonging to it (which will not be in this age), it will be worthy of being exhibited alongside the most celebrated remains of antiquity. Its extreme convenience has acquired it universal approbation.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 136. (1789.)

457. ——. The capitol in the city of Richmond, in Virginia, is the model of the Temples of Erectheus at Athens, of Balbec, and of the Maison quarrée of Nîmes. All of which are nearly of the same form and proportions, and are considered as the most perfect examples of cubic architecture, as the

among the several States according to their respective numbers; and there is no one proportion or division which, applied to the respective numbers of the States, will yield the number and allotment of representatives proposed by the bill. The Constitution has also provided that the number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, which restriction is by the contract, and by fair and obvious construction, to be applied to the separate and respective numbers of the States; and the bill has allotted to eight of the States more than one for thirty thousand.—DRAFT FOR VETO MESSAGE. FORD ED., v, 501. (April 1792.)

392. APPORTIONMENT BILL, History of Veto.—The President [Washington] * * * [referred] to the representation bill, which he had now in his possession for the tenth day. I had before given him my opinion in writing, that the method of apportionment was contrary to the Constitution. He agreed that it was contrary to the common understanding of that instrument, and to what was understood at the time by the makers of it; that yet it would bear the construction which the bill put, and he observed that the vote for and against the bill was perfectly geographical, a northern against a southern vote, and he feared he should be thought to be taking side with a southern party. I admitted this motive of delicacy, but that it should not induce him to do wrong; urged the dangers to which the scramble for the fractionary members would always lead. He here expressed his fear that there would, ere long, be a separation of the Union; that the public mind seemed dissatisfied and tending to this. He went home, sent for Randolph, the Attorney General, desired him to get Mr. Madison immediately and come to me, and if we three concurred in opinion that he should negative the bill, he desired to hear nothing more about it, but that we would draw the instrument for him to sign. They came. Our minds had been before made up. We drew the instrument. Randolph carried it to him, and told him we all concurred in it. He walked with him to the door, and as if he still wished to get off, he said, "and you say you approve of this yourself." "Yes, Sir," says Randolph, "I do upon my honor." He sent it to the House of Representatives instantly. A few of the hottest friends of the bill expressed passion, but the majority were satisfied, and both in and out of doors, it gave pleasure to have, at length, an instance of the negative being exercised.—THE ANAS. ix, 115. FORD ED., i, 192. April 1792.)

393. APPROBATION, Consolation in.—Though I have made up my mind not to suffer calumny to disturb my tranquillity, yet I retain all my sensibilities for the approbation of the good and just. That is, indeed, the chief consolation for the hatred of so many, who, without the least personal knowledge, and on the sacred evidence of "Porcupine" and Fenno alone, cover me with their implacable hatred. The only return I will ever make to them will be to do them all the good I can, in spite of their teeth.—To SAMUEL SMITH. iv, 256. FORD ED., vii, 279. (M., 1798.)

394. — — — I thank God for an opportunity of retiring without censure, and carrying with me the most consoling proofs of public approbation.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 432. (W., 1809.)

395. APPROBATION OF THE DECRIMINATING.—With those who wish to think amiss of me, I have learned to be perfectly indifferent; but where I know a mind to be ingenuous, and to need only truth to set to rights, I cannot be as passive.—To MR. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 560. FORD ED., viii, 3 (M., 1804.)

396. APPROBATION BY THE GOOD.—To be praised by those who themselves deserve all praise, is a gratification of high order. Their approbation who, having been in office themselves, have information and talents to guide their judgment, is a consolation deeply felt. A conscientious devotion to publican government, like charity in religion, has obtained for me much indulgence from my fellow citizens, and the aid of able co-sellers has guided me through many difficulties.—To LARKIN SMITH. v, 441. (M., April 1809.)

397. APPROBATION, Intelligent.—It has been a great happiness to me, to have received the approbation of so great a portion of my fellow citizens, and particularly those who have opportunities of inquiry, reading and deciding for themselves.—To F. WELLES. v, 484. (M., 1809.)

398. APPROBATION, Legislative.—To learn with pleasure the approbation, by the General Assembly of Rhode Island, of principles declared by me [in the inaugural address]; principles which flowed sincerely from the heart and judgment, and which, with sincerity, will be pursued. While acting on this I ask only to be judged with truth and candor.—To THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY. 397. (W., May 1801.)

399. — — — For the approbation which the Legislature of Vermont has been pleased to express of the principles and measures pursued in the management of their affairs, I am sincerely thankful; and should I be so fortunate as to carry into retirement the approbation and good will of my fellow citizens generally, it will be the comfort of future days, and will close a service of forty years with the only reward it ever wished for.—To A. VERMONT LEGISLATURE. viii, (1807.)

400. — — — The assurances of your approbation, and that my conduct has given satisfaction to my fellow citizens generally will be an important ingredient in my future happiness.—R. To A. VIRGINIA ASSEMBLY. viii, 148. (1809.)

401. APPROBATION OF NEIGHBORS.—It is a sufficient happiness to me to know that my fellow citizens of the country generally entertain for me the kind sentiments which have prompted this proposition.

* To addresses from Georgia, New York, Maryland, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, received about the same time, similar replies were sent.—EDITOR.

681. BANKS, Abuses of.—The crisis of the abuses of banking is arrived. The banks have pronounced their own sentence of death. Between two and three hundred millions of dollars of their promissory notes are in the hands of the people, for solid produce and property sold, and they formally declare they will not pay them. This is an act of bankruptcy, of course, and will be so pronounced by any court before which it shall be brought. But cui bono? The laws can only uncover their insolvency, by opening to its suitors their empty vaults. Thus by the dupery of our citizens, and tame acquiescence of our legislators, the nation is plundered of two or three hundred millions of dollars, treble the amount of debt contracted in the Revolutionary war, and which, instead of redeeming our liberty, has been expended on sumptuous houses, carriages, and dinners. A fearful tax! if equalized on all; but overwhelming and convulsive by its partial fall.—To THOMAS COOPER vi, 381. (M., Sep. 1814.)

682. ——. Everything predicted by the enemies of banks, in the beginning, is now coming to pass. We are to be ruined now by the deluge of bank paper, as we were formerly by the old Continental paper. It is cruel that such revolutions in private fortunes should be at the mercy of avaricious adventurers, who, instead of employing their capital, if any they have, in manufactures, commerce, and other useful pursuits, make it an instrument to burthen all the interchanges of property with their swindling profits, profits which are the price of no useful industry of theirs. Prudent men must be on their guard in this game of Robin's alive, and take care that the spark does not extinguish in their hands. I am an enemy to all banks discounting bills or notes for anything but coin. But our whole country is so fascinated by this Jack-lantern wealth, that they will not stop short of its total and fatal explosion.*—To DR THOMAS COOPER vi, 295. (M., Jan. 1814.)

683. ——. The enormous abuses of the banking system are not only prostrating our commerce, but producing revolution of property, which without more wisdom than we possess, will be much greater than were produced by the Revolutionary paper. That, too, had the merit of purchasing our liberties, while the present trash has only furnished alimnt to usurers and swindlers.—To RICHARD RUSH. FORD ED., x, 133. (M., June 1819.)

684. BANKS, Aristocracy.—I hope we shall * * * crush in its birth the aristocracy of our moneyed corporations, which dare already to challenge our government to a trial of strength, and bid defiance to the laws of our country.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., x, 69. (P.F., Nov. 1816.)

685. ——. The bank mania * * * is raising up a moneyed aristocracy in our country which has already set the government at defiance, and although forced at length to yield a little on this first essay of their strength, their principles are unyielded and unyielding. These have taken deep root in the hearts of that class from which our legislators are drawn, and the sop to Cerberus from fable has become history. Their principles lay hold of the good, their pelf of the bad, and thus those whom the Constitution had placed as guards to its portals, are sophisticated or suborned from their duties.—To DR. J. B. STUART. vii, 64. (M., 1817.)

686. BANKS, Capital and.—At the time we were funding our national debt, we heard much about "a public debt being a public blessing"; that the stock representing it was a creation of active capital for the aliment of commerce, manufactures and agriculture. This paradox was well adapted to the minds of believers in dreams, and the gulls of that size entered bonâ fide into it. But the art and mystery of banks is a wonderful improvement on that. It is established on the principle that "private debts are a public blessing." That the evidences of those private debts, called bank notes, become active capital, and aliment the whole commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of the United States. Here are a set of people, for instance, who have bestowed on us the great blessing of running in our debt about two hundred millions of dollars, without our knowing who they are, where they are, or what property they have to pay this debt when called on; nay, who have made us so sensible of the blessings of letting them run in our debt, that we have exempted them by law from the repayment of these debts beyond a given proportion (generally estimated at one-third). And to fill up the measure of blessing, instead of paying, they receive an interest on what they owe from those to whom they owe; for all the notes, or evidences of what they owe, which we see in circulation, have been lent to somebody on an interest which is levied again on us through the medium of commerce. And they are so ready still to deal out their liberalities to us, that they are now willing to let themselves run in our debt ninety millions more, on our paying them the same premium of six or eight per cent. interest, and on the same legal exemption from the repayment of more than thirty millions of the debt, when it shall be called for. But let us look at this principle in its original form, and its copy will then be equally understood. "A public debt is a public blessing." That our debt was juggled from forty-three up to eighty millions, and funded at that amount, according to this opinion was a great public blessing, because the evidences of it could be vested in commerce, and thus converted into active capital, and then the more the debt was made to be, the more active capital was created. That is to say, the creditors could now employ in commerce the money due them from the public, and make from it an annual profit of five per cent., or four millions of dollars. But observe, that the public were at the same time paying on it an interest of exactly the same

* This accordingly took place four years later.—NOTE, WASHINGTON EDITION.

an appropriation (for naval contingencies) to the discretion of the Executive. Under this appropriation our predecessors bought the vessel (for there was no order of Congress authorizing them to buy) and began her repairs; we completed them. I will not say that a very gross abuse of discretion in a past appropriation would not furnish ground to the Legislature to take notice of it. In what form is not now necessary to decide. But so far from a gross abuse, the decision in this case was correct, honorable and advantageous to the nation. I cannot see to what legitimate objects any resolution of the House on the subject can lead; and if one is passed on ground not legitimate, our duty will be to resist it.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. FORD ED., viii, 142. (April 1802.)

415. APPROPRIATIONS, Diverting.—The diversion of the [French] money from its legal appropriation offers a flaw against the Executive which may place them in the wrong.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 179. (1793.)

416. ——. If it should appear that the Legislature has done their part in furnishing the money for the French nation, and that the Executive departments have applied it to other purposes, then it will certainly be desirable that we get back on legal ground as soon as possible, by pressing on the domestic funds and availing ourselves of any proper opportunity which may be furnished of replacing the money to the foreign creditors.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 177. (1793.)

417. APPROPRIATIONS, Estimates and.—I like your idea of kneading all Hamilton's little scraps and fragments into one batch, and adding to it a complementary sum, which, while it forms it into a single mass from which everything is to be paid, will enable us, should a breach of appropriation ever be charged on us, to prove that the sum appropriated, and more, has been applied to its specific object.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 428. FORD ED., viii, 140. (W., 1802.)

418. ——. Congress, aware that too minute a specification has its evil as well as a too general one, does not make the estimate a part of their law, but gives a sum in gross, trusting the Executive discretion for that year, and that sum only; so in other departments, as of War, for instance, the estimate of the Secretary specifies all the items of clothing, subsistence, pay, &c., of the army. And Congress throws this into such masses as they think best, to wit, a sum in gross for clothing, another for subsistence, a third for pay, &c., binding up the Executive discretion only by the sum, and the object generalized to a certain degree. The minute details of the estimate are thus dispensed with in point of obligation, and the discretion of the officer is enlarged to the limits of the classification which Congress thinks it best for the public to make.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, (1804.)

419. APPROPRIATIONS, Executive power over.—The Executive * * * has the power, though not the right, to apply money contrary to its legal appropriations. Cases may be imagined, however, where it would be the duty to do this. But they must be cases of extreme necessity. The payment of interest to the domestic creditors has been mentioned as one of the causes of diverting the foreign fund. But this is not an object of greater necessity than that to which it was legally appropriated. It is taking the money from our foreign creditors to pay it to the domestic ones; a preference which neither justice nor gratitude, nor the estimation in which the two descriptions of creditors are held in the country will justify. The payment of the Army and the daily expenses of the government have been also mentioned as objects of withdrawing this money. These indeed are pressing objects, and might produce that degree of distressing necessity which would justify a justification.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 176. (Pa., 1793.)

420. APPROPRIATIONS, Expenditures and.—A violation of a law making appropriations of money, is a violation of the section of the Constitution of the United States which requires that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.—GILES TREASURY RESOLUTIONS. FORD ED., vi, 16 (1793.)

421. APPROPRIATIONS, Specific.—It is essential to the due administration of the government of the United States, that law making specific appropriations of money should be strictly observed by the Secretary of the Treasury thereof.—GILES TREASURY RESOLUTIONS. FORD ED., vi, 168. (1793.)

422. ——. In our care of the public contributions intrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition; by disallowing applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, thereby circumscribing discretionary power over money; and by bringing back to a single department all accountabilities for money where the examination may be prompt, efficient, and uniform.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 10. FORD ED., viii, 120. (1801.) See MONEY BILLS.

423. ARBITRATION, Offer of.—As our dispute with Schweighauser and Dobrée in the conversation I had with Dobbé at Nantes, he appeared to think so rationally of the subject, that I thought there would be difficulty in accommodating it with him. I wished rather to settle it by accommodation than to apply to the minister. I afterwards had it intimated to him * * *, that I had in idea to propose a reference to arbitration. He expressed a cheerful concurrence in it, and thereupon made the proposition to him.

mally, by letter, mentioning particularly, that we would choose our arbitrators of some neutral nation, and, of preference, from among the Dutch refugees in Paris. I was surprised to receive an answer from him, wherein, after expressing his own readiness to accede to this proposition, he added, that on consulting with Mr. Puchilberg, he had declined it.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 496. (P., 1788.)

424. ——. I began by offering to Schweighauser and Dobrée an arbitration before honest and judicious men of a neutral nation. They declined this, and had the modesty to propose an arbitration before merchants of their own town. I gave them warning then, that as the offer on the part of a sovereign nation to submit to a private arbitration was an unusual condescendence, if they did not accept them, it would not be repeated, and that the United States would judge the case for themselves hereafter. They continued to decline it.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 365. (Pa., 1791.)

425. ARBORICULTURE, Coffee tree.—Bartram is extremely anxious to get a large supply of seeds of the Kentucky coffee tree. I told him I would use all my interest with you to obtain it, as I think I heard you say that some neighbors of yours had a large number of trees. Be so good as to take measures for bringing a good quantity, if possible, to Bartram when you come to Congress.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 569. FORD ED., vi, 279. (1793.)

426. ARBORICULTURE, Cork Oak.—I expect from the South of France some acorns of the cork oak, which I propose for your society [Agricultural], as I am persuaded they will succeed with you. I observed it to grow in England without shelter, not well, indeed, but so as to give hopes that it would do well with you.—To WILLIAM DRAYTON. i, 555. (P., 1786.)

427. ——. I sent you a parcel of acorns of the cork oak by Colonel Franks. To WILLIAM DRAYTON. ii, 202. (Pa., 1787.)

428. ——. I have been long endeavoring to procure the cork tree from Europe, but without success. A plant which I brought with me from Paris died after languishing some time, and of several parcels of acorns received from a correspondent at Marseilles, not one has ever vegetated. I shall continue my endeavors, although disheartened by the nonchalance of our southern fellow citizens, with whom alone they can thrive.—To JAMES RONALDSON. vi, 92. FORD ED., ix, 370. (M., Jan. 1813.)

429. ARBORICULTURE, Fruit trees.—Should you be able to send me any plants of good fruit, and especially of peaches and eating grapes, they will be thankfully received.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., viii, 16. (W., March 1801.)

— ARBORICULTURE, the Olive.—See OLIVE.

430. ARBORICULTURE, Pecan.—The pecan nut is, as you conjecture, the Illinois nut. The former is the vulgar name south of the Potomac, as also with the Indians and Spaniards, and enters also into the botanical name which is Juglans Pacan.—To FRANCIS HOPKINSON. ii, 74. (P., 1786.)

431. ——. Procure me two or three hundred pecan nuts from the western country.—To F. HOPKINSON. i, 506. (P., 1786.)

432. ——. I thank you for the pecan nuts.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 156. FORD ED., iv, 396. (P., 1787.)

433. ARBORICULTURE, Sensitive Plant.—Your attention to one burthen I laid on you, encourages me to remind you of another, which is the sending me some of the seeds of the Dionea Muscipula, or Venus fly-trap, called also with you, I believe, the Sensitive Plant.—To MR. HAWKINS. ii, 3. (P., 1786.)

434. ARBORICULTURE, Trees.—I send a packet of the seeds of trees which I would wish Anthony to sow in a large nursery, noting well their names.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. FORD ED., iv, 344. (P., 1786.)

435. ARBORICULTURE, Vines.—I am making a collection of vines for wine and for the table.—To A. CAREY. i, 508. (P., 1786.)

436. ARCHITECTURE, Bad.—The genius of architecture seems to have shed its maledictions over this land [Virginia].—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 394. FORD ED., iii, 258. (1782.)

437. ARCHITECTURE, Beauty in.—How is a taste in this beautiful art to be formed in our countrymen unless we avail ourselves of every occasion when public buildings are to be erected, of presenting to them models for their study and imitation?—To JAMES MADISON. i, 433. (P., 1785.)

438. ARCHITECTURE, Brick, Stone, Wood.—All we shall do in the way of reformation will produce no permanent improvement to our country, while the unhappy prejudice prevails that houses of brick or stone are less wholesome than those of wood. A dew is often observed on the walls of the former in rainy weather, and the most obvious solution is, that the rain has penetrated through these walls. The following facts, however, are sufficient to prove the error of this solution: 1. This dew on the walls appears when there is no rain, if the state of the atmosphere be moist. 2. It appears on the partition as well as the exterior walls. 3. So, also on pavements of brick or stone. 4. It is more copious in proportion as the walls are thicker; the reverse of which ought to be the case, if this hypothesis were just. If cold water be poured into a vessel of stone, or glass, a dew forms instantly on the outside; but if it be poured into a vessel of wood, there is no such appearance. It is not supposed, in the first case, that the water has exuded through the glass, but that it is precipitated from the circumambient air; as the humid particles of vapor, passing from the boiler of an alembic through its refrigerant, are precipitated from the air, in which they are suspended, on the internal surface of the refrigerant. Walls of brick or stone act as the refrigerant in this instance. They are sufficiently cold to condense and precipitate the moisture suspended in the air of the room, when it is heavily charged therewith. But

walls of wood are not so. The question then is, whether the air in which this moisture is left floating, or that which is deprived of it, be most wholesome? In both cases, the remedy is easy. A little fire kindled in the room, whenever the air is damp, prevents the precipitation on the walls; and this practice, found healthy in the warmest as well as coldest seasons, is as necessary in a wooden as in a stone or brick house. I do not mean to say, that the rain never penetrates through walls of brick. On the contrary, I have seen instances of it. But with us it is only through the northern and eastern walls of the house, after a north-easterly storm, these being the only ones which continue long enough to force through the walls. This, however, happens too rarely to give a just character of unwholesomeness to such houses. In a house, the walls of which are of well-burnt brick and good mortar, I have seen the rain penetrate through but twice in a dozen or fifteen years. The inhabitants of Europe, who dwell chiefly in houses of stone or brick, are surely as healthy as those of Virginia. These houses have the advantage, too, of being warmer in winter and cooler in summer than those of wood; of being cheaper in their first construction, where lime is convenient, and infinitely more durable. The latter consideration renders it of great importance to eradicate this prejudice from the minds of our countrymen. A country whose buildings are of wood, can never increase in its improvements to any considerable degree. Their duration is highly estimated at fifty years. Every half century then our country becomes a tabula rasa, whereon we have to set out anew, as in the first moment of seating it. Whereas when buildings are of durable materials, every new edifice is an actual and permanent acquisition to the State, adding to its value as well as to its ornament.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 395. FORD ED., iii, 258. (1782.)

439. ARCHITECTURE, Delight in.—Architecture is my delight, and putting up and pulling down, one of my favorite amusements.—RAYNER'S LIFE OF JEFFERSON. 524.

440. ARCHITECTURE, Economy in.—I have scribbled some general notes on the plan of a house you enclosed. I have done more. I have endeavored to throw the same area, the same extent of walls, the same number of rooms, and of the same sizes, into another form so as to offer a choice to the builder. Indeed, I varied my plan by showing what it would be with alcove bed rooms, to which I am so much attached.—TO JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 259. (Pa., 1793.)

441. ARCHITECTURE, English.—English architecture is in the most wretched style I ever saw, not meaning to except America, where it is bad, nor even Virginia, where it is worse than in any other part of America, which I have seen.—TO JOHN PAGE. i, 550. FORD ED., iv, 214. (P., 1786.)

442. ARCHITECTURE, Fascination of.—Here I am gazing whole hours at the Maison quarrée, like a lover at his mistress.

The stocking weavers and silk spinners around it consider me a hypochondriac Englishman, about to write with a pistol the last chapter of his history. This is the second time I have been in love since I left Paris. The first was with a Diana at the Chateau Laye-Epinaye in Beaujolois, a delicious model of sculpture, by M. A. Slodtz. This, you will say, was in rule, to fall in love with female beauty; but with a house! it is out of all precedent. No, madame, it is not without a precedent in my own history. While in Paris I was violently smitten with the House of Salm, and used to go to the Tuileries almost daily, to look at it.—TO MADAME DE COMTESSE DE TESSE. ii, 131. (N., 1787.)

443. ARCHITECTURE, Faulty.—Buildings are often erected, by individuals, at considerable expense. To give these symmetry and taste, would not increase their cost. It would only change the arrangement of the materials, the form and combination of the members. This would often cost less than the burden of barbarous ornaments with which these buildings are sometimes charged. But the first principles of the art are unknown, and there exists scarcely a model among us sufficiently chaste to give an idea of them. NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 394. FORD ED., iii, 258. (1782.)

444. ARCHITECTURE, French.—Would I to proceed to tell you how much I enjoy French architecture  I should waste many words.—TO MR. BELLINI. i, 445. (P., 1782.)

445. ARCHITECTURE, Importance of.—Architecture is worth great attention. If we double our number every twenty years, we must double our houses.  It is, therefore, among the most important arts; and it is desirable to introduce taste into an art which shows so much.—TRAVELLING HINTS. ix, 4 (1788.)

446. ARCHITECTURE, Plan of Prison.—With respect to the plan of a Prison, I have requested [by the Virginia authorities] in 1779 (being then in Paris), I had heard of a benevolent society, in England, which had been indulged by the government, in an experiment of the effect of labor, in solitary confinement, on some of their criminals: which experiment had succeeded beyond expectation. The same idea had been suggested in France, and an architect of Lyons had proposed a plan of a well-contrived edifice, on the principle of solitary confinement. I procured a copy, and it was too large for our purposes, I drew it on a scale less extensive, but susceptible of additions as they should be wanting. This I sent to the directors, instead of a plan of a common prison, in the hope that it would suggest the idea of labor in solitary confinement, instead of that on the public works which we had adopted in our Revised Code. Its principle, accordingly, but not its execution, was adopted by Latrobe in carrying his plan into execution, by the erection of what is now called the Penitentiary, built under his direction.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 46. FORD ED., iii, 64. (1821.)

447. ARCHITECTURE, Porticos.—A portico may be from five to ten diameters of the column deep, or projected from the building. If of more than five diameters, there must be a column in the middle of each flank, since it must never be more than five diameters from center to center of column. The portico of the Maison quarrée is three intercolonnations deep. I never saw as much to a private house.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 327. (1793.)

— ARCHITECTURE, Roman.—See ANTIQUITIES.

448. ARCHITECTURE, Ugly.—The private buildings [in Virginia] are very rarely constructed of stone or brick, much the greater portion being of scantling and boards, plastered with lime. It is impossible to devise things more ugly, uncomfortable, and happily more perishable.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 393. FORD ED., iii, 257. (1782.)

449. ARCHITECTURE, Virginia Capitol.—I was written to in 1785 (being then in Paris) by directors appointed to superintend the building of a Capitol in Richmond, to advise them as to a plan, and to add to it one of a Prison. Thinking it a favorable opportunity of introducing into the State an example of architecture, in the classic style of antiquity, and the Maison quarrée of Nîmes, an ancient Roman temple, being considered as the most perfect model existing of what may be called Cubic architecture, I applied to M. Clerissault, who had published drawings of the Antiquities of Nîmes, to have me a model of the building made in stucco, only changing the order from Corinthian to Ionic, on account of the difficulty of the Corinthian capitals. I yielded, with reluctance, to the taste of Clerissault, in his preference of the modern capital of Scamozzi to the more noble capital of antiquity. This was executed by the artist whom Choiseul Gouffier had carried with him to Constantinople, and employed, while ambassador there, in making those beautiful models of the remains of Grecian architecture which are to be seen at Paris. To adapt the exterior to our use, I drew a plan for the interior, with the apartments necessary for legislative, executive, and judiciary purposes; and accommodated in their size and distribution to the form and dimensions of the building. These were forwarded to the directors, in 1786, and were carried into execution, with some variations, not for the better, the most important of which, however, admit of future correction.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 45. FORD ED., i, 63. (1821.)

450. ———. We took for our model what is called the Maison quarrée of Nîmes, one of the most beautiful, if not the most beautiful and precious morsel of architecture left us by antiquity. It was built by Caius and Lucius Cæsar, and repaired by Louis XIV., and has the suffrage of all the judges of architecture who have seen it, as yielding to no one of the beautiful monuments of Greece, Rome, Palmyra and Balbec, which late travellers have communicated to us. It is very simple, but it is noble beyond expression, and would have done honor to our country, as presenting to travellers a specimen of taste in our infancy, promising much for our maturer age.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 432. (P., 1785.)

451. ———. I shall send them a plan taken from the best morsel of ancient architecture now remaining. It has obtained the approbation of fifteen or sixteen centuries, and is, therefore, preferable to any design which might be newly contrived. It will give more room, be more convenient and cost less than the plan they sent me. Pray encourage them to wait for it, and to execute it. It will be superior in beauty to anything in America, and not inferior to anything in the world. It is very simple.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 415. (P., 1785.)

452. ———. The designs for the Capitol are simple and sublime. More cannot be said. They are not the brat of a whimsical conception never before brought to light, but copied from the most precious, the most perfect model, of ancient architecture remaining on earth; one which has received the approbation of near 2000 years, and which is sufficiently remarkable to have been visited by all travellers.—To Dr. JAMES CURRIE. FORD ED., iv, 133. (P., 1786.)

453. ———. I have been much mortified with information I received * * * from Virginia, that the first brick of the Capitol would be laid within a few days. But surely, the delay of this piece of a summer would have been repaired by the savings in the plan preparing here, were we to value its other superiorities as nothing.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 432. (P., 1785.)

(454. ———. Do * * * exert yourself to get the plan [of the Capitol] begun on, set aside that adopted which was drawn here. It was taken from a model which has been the admiration of sixteen centuries; which has been the object of as many pilgrimages as the tomb of Mahomet; which will give unrivalled honor to our State, and furnish a model whereon to form the taste of our young men. It will cost much less, too, than the one begun because it does not cover one-half the area.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 534. FORD ED., iv, 196. (P., 1785.)

455. ———. Pray try if you can effect the stopping of this work. * * * The loss will be only of the laying the bricks already laid, or a part of them. The bricks themselves will do again for the interior walls, and one side wall and one end wall may remain, as they will answer equally well for our plan. This loss is not to be weighed against the saving of money which will arise, against the comfort of laying out the public money for something honorable, the satisfaction of seeing an object and proof of national good taste, and the regret and mortification of erecting a monument of our barbarism, which will be loaded with execrations as long as it shall endure.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 433. (P., 1785.)

456. ———. Our new Capitol, when the corrections are made, of which it is susceptible, will be an edifice of first rate dignity. Whenever it shall be finished with the proper ornaments belonging to it (which will not be in this age), it will be worthy of being exhibited alongside the most celebrated remains of antiquity. Its extreme convenience has acquired it universal approbation.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 136. (1789.)

457. ———. The capitol in the city of Richmond, in Virginia, is the model of the Temples of Erectheus at Athens, of Balbec, and of the Maison quarrée of Nîmes, which are nearly of the same form portions, and are considered as the best examples of cubic architecture

then we might stop, and consider the memorial as answered. But, setting authority apart, we will examine whether the Legislature ought to comply with it, even if they had the power.—To J. W. EFFES. vi, 232. FORD ED., ix, 406. (M., Nov. 1813.)

660. ——. The idea of creating a national bank, I do not concur in, because it seems now decided that Congress has not that power (although I sincerely wish they had it exclusively), and because I think there is already a vast redundancy, rather than a scarcity of paper medium. The rapid rise in the nominal price of land and labor (while war and blockade should produce a fall) proves the progressive state of the depreciation of our medium.—To THOMAS LAW. FORD ED., ix, 433. (M., 1813.)

661. BANK OF NORTH AMERICA, Incorporation of.—The Philadelphia Bank was incorporated by Congress. This is, perhaps, the only instance of their having done that which they had no power to do. Necessity obliged them to give this institution the appearance of their countenance, because in that moment they were without any other resource for money.—COUNT VAN HOGENDORP. ii, 24. FORD ED., iv, 286. (P., 1786.)

662. BANK OF NORTH AMERICA, Pennsylvania and.—The Legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act of incorporation for the bank, and declared that the holders of stock should be responsible only to the amount of their stock. Lately that Legislature has repealed their act. The consequence is, that the bank is now altogether a private institution, and every holder is liable for its engagements in his whole property. This has had a curious effect. It has given those who deposit money in the bank a greater faith in it, while it has rendered the holders very discontented, as being more exposed to risk, and it has induced many to sell it, so that I have heard (I know not how truly) the bank stock sells somewhat below par.—To COUNT VAN HOGENDORP. ii, 24. FORD ED., iv, 286. (P., 1786.)

663. BANK (U. S.), Beginning of.—A division, not very unequal, had * * * taken place in the honest part of * * * [Congress in 1791] between the parties styled republican and federal. The latter, being monarchists in principle, adhered to [Alexander] Hamilton of course, as their leader in that principle, and this mercenary phalanx,* added to them, ensured him always a majority in both Houses; so that the whole action of the Legislature was now under the direction of the Treasury. Still the machine was not complete. The effect of the Funding system, and of the Assumption [of the State debts], would be temporary. It would be lost with the loss of the individual members whom it had enriched, and some engine of influence more permanent must be contrived while these myrmidons were yet in place to carry it through all opposition. This engine was the Bank of the United States.—THE ANAS. ix, 95. FORD ED., i, 164. (1818.)

664. BANK (U. S.), Constitutionality of.—The bill for establishing a National Bank undertakes among other things:—1. To form the subscribers into a corporation. 2. To enable them in their corporate capacities to receive grants of land; and so far is against the laws of Mortmain.* 3. To make alien subscribers capable of holding lands; and so far is against the laws of Alienage. 4. To transmit these lands, on the death of a proprietor, to a certain line of successors; and so far changes the course of Descents. 5. To put the lands out of the reach of forfeiture or escheat; and so far is against the laws of Forfeiture and Escheat. 6. To transmit personal chattels to successors in a certain line; and so far is against the laws of Distribution. 7. To give them the sole and exclusive right of banking under the national authority; and so far is against the laws of Monopoly. 8. To communicate to them a power to make laws paramount to the laws of the States; for so they must be construed, to protect the institution from the control of the State Legislatures; and so, probably, they will be construed.

I consider the foundation of the Constitution as laid on this ground:† That “all powers not delegated to the United States, by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people.” (XIIth amendment.) To take a single step beyond the boundaries thus specially drawn around the powers of Congress, is to take possession of a boundless field of power, no longer susceptible of any definition. The incorporators of a bank, and the powers assumed by this bill, have not, in my opinion, been delegated to the United States, by the Constitution. 1. They are not among the powers specially enumerated: for these are: 1st. A power to lay taxes for the purpose of paying the debts of the United States; but no debt is paid by this bill, nor any tax laid. Were it a bill to raise money, its origination in the Senate would condemn it by the Constitution. 2nd “To borrow money.” But this bill neither borrows money nor ensures the borrowing it. The proprietors of the bank will be just as free as any other money holders, to lend or not to lend their money to the public. The operation proposed in the bill, first, to lend them two millions, and then to borrow them back again, cannot change the nature of the latter act, which will still be in a payment, and not a loan, call it by what name you please. 3rd To "regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the States, and with the Indian tribes." To erect a bank, and to regulate commerce, are very different acts. He who erects a bank, creates a subject of commerce in its bills; so does he who makes a bushel of wheat, or digs a dollar out of the mines: yet neither of these persons regulates commerce thereby. To make a thing which may be bought and sold, is not to prescribe regulations for buying and selling. Besides, if this was an exercise of the power of regulating commerce, it would be void, as extending as much to the internal commerce of every State as to its external. For the power given to Congress by the Constitution does not extend to the internal regulation of the commerce of a State (that is to say of the commerce between citizen and citizen), which remains exclusively with its own legislature; but to its external commerce only, that is to say, its commerce with another State, or with foreign nations, or with the Indian tribes. Accordingly the bill does not propose the measure as a regulation of trade, but as, "productive of considerable advantages to trade." Still less are these powers covered by any other of the special enumerations.

* Though the Constitution controls the laws of Mortmain so far as to permit Congress itself to hold land for certain purposes, yet not so far as to permit them to communicate a similar right to other corporate bodies.—NOTE BY JEFFERSON.

† Washington requested the written opinions of the Cabinet on the constitutionality of the bill. Those of the Secretaries of the Treasury, and of War, were in favor of the constitutionality of the act. Those of the Secretary of State, and Attorney General, were against it. The opinion of Jefferson is an unanswerable argument against the doctrine of implied powers, and is justly considered the text of the true republican faith, on the subject of constitutional interpretation.—RAYNER'S Life of Jefferson, p. 304.

II. Nor are they within either of the general phrases, which are the two following:—
1. To lay taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States, that is to say, "to lay taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare." For the laying of taxes is the power, and the general welfare the purpose for which the power is to be exercised. They are not to lay taxes ad libitum for any purpose they please; but only to pay the debts or provide for the welfare of the Union. In like manner, they are not to do anything they please to provide for the general welfare, but only to lay taxes for that purpose. To consider the latter phrase, not as describing the purpose of the first, but as giving a distinct and independent power to do any act they please, which might be for the good of the Union, would render all the preceding and subsequent enumerations of power completely useless. It would reduce the whole instrument to a single phrase, that of instituting a Congress with power to do whatever would be for the good of the United States; and, as they would be the sole judges of the good or evil, it would be also a power to do whatever evil they please. It is an established rule of construction where a phrase will bear either of two meanings, to give to it that which will allow some meaning to the other parts of the instrument and not that which would render all the others useless. Certainly no such universal power was meant to be given them. It was intended to lace them up straitly within the enumerated powers, and those without which, as means, these powers could not be carried into effect. It is known that the very power now proposed as a means was rejected as an end by the Convention which formed the Constitution. A proposition was made to them to authorize Congress to open canals, and an amendatory one to empower them to incorporate. But the whole was rejected, and one of the reasons for rejection urged in debate was, that then they would have power to erect a bank, which would render the great cities, where there were prejudices and jealousies on the subject, adverse to the reception of the Constitution. 2. The second general phrase is, "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the enumerated powers." But they can all be carried into execution without a bank. A bank therefore is not necessary, and consequently not authorized by this phrase.

It has been urged that a bank will give great facility or convenience in the collection of taxes. Suppose this were true: yet the Constitution allows only the means which are "necessary," not those which are merely "convenient" for effecting the enumerated powers. If such a latitude of construction be allowed to this phrase as to give any non-enumerated power, it will go to every one; for there is not one which ingenuity may not torture into a convenience in some instance or other, to some one of so long a list of enumerated powers. It would swallow up all the delegated powers, and reduce the whole to one power, as before observed. Therefore it was that the Constitution restrained them to the necessary means, that is to say, to those means without which the grant of power would be nugatory. But let us examine this convenience and see what it is. The report on this subject, page 3, states the only general convenience to be, the preventing the transportation and retransportation of money between the States and the treasury (for I pass over the increase of circulating medium, ascribed to it as a want, and which, according to my ideas of paper money, is clearly a demerit). Every State will have to pay a sum of tax money into the treasury; and the treasury will have to pay, in every State, a part of the interest on the public debt, and salaries to the officers of government resident in that State. In most of the States there will still be a surplus of tax money to come up to the seat of government for the officers residing there. The payments of interest and salary in each State may be made by treasury orders on the State collector. This will take up the great export of the money he has collected in his State, and consequently prevent the great mass of it from being drawn out of the State. If there be a balance of commerce in favor of that State against the one in which the government resides, the surplus of taxes will be remitted by the bills of exchange drawn for that commercial balance. And so it must be if there was a bank. But if there be no balance of commerce, either direct or circuitous, all the banks in the world could not bring up the surplus of taxes, but in the form of money. Treasury orders then, and bills of exchange may prevent the displacement of the main mass of the money collected, without the aid of any bank; and where these fail, it cannot be prevented even with that aid. Perhaps, indeed, bank bills may be a more convenient vehicle than treasury orders. But a little difference in the degree of conveniences, cannot constitute the necessity which the Constitution makes the ground for assuming any non-enumerated power.

Besides; the existing banks will, without a doubt, enter into arrangements for lending their agency, and the more favorable, as there will be a competition among them for it; whereas the bill delivers us up bound to the national bank, who are free to refuse all arrangement, but on their own terms, and the public not free, on such refusal, to employ any other bank. That of Philadelphia, I believe, now does this business, by their post-notes, which, by an arrangement with the treasury, are paid by any State collector to whom they are presented. This expedient alone suffices to prevent the existence of that necessity which may justify the assumption of a non-enumerated power as a means for carrying into effect an enumerated one. The thing may be done, and has been done, and well done, without this assumption; therefore, it does not stand on that degree of necessity which can honestly justify it. It may be said that a bank whose bills would have a currency all over the States, would be more convenient than one whose currency is limited to a single State. So it would be still more convenient that there should be a bank, whose bills should have a currency all over the world. But it does not follow from this superior convenience, that there exists anywhere a power to establish such a bank; or that the world may not go on very well without it. Can it be thought that the Constitution intended that for a shade or two of convenience, more or less, Congress should be authorized to break down the most ancient and fundamental laws of the several States; such as those against Mortmain, the laws of Alienage, the rules of Descent, the acts of Distribution, the laws of Escheat and Forfeiture, the laws of Monopoly? Nothing but a necessity invincible by any other means, can justify such a prostitution of laws, which constitute the pillars of our whole system of jurisprudence. Will Congress be too straight-laced to carry the Constitution into honest effect, unless they may pass over the foundation laws of the State government for the slightest convenience of theirs?

The negative of the President is the shield provided by the Constitution to protect against the invasions of the Legislature: 1. The right of the Executive. 2. Of the Judiciary. 3. Of the States and State Legislatures. The present is the case of a right remaining exclusively with the States, and consequently one of those intended by the Constitution to be placed under its protection. It must be added, however, that unless the President's mind on a view of everything which is urged for and against this bill, is tolerably clear that it is unauthorized by the Constitution; if the pro and the con hang so even as to balance his judgment, a just respect for the wisdom of the Legislature would naturally decide the balance in favor of their opinion. It is chiefly for cases where they are clearly misled by error, ambition, or interest, that the Constitution has placed a check in the negative of the President.—NATIONAL BANK OPINION. vii, 555. FORD ED., v, 284. (February 1791.)

665. BANK (U. S.), Directors of.—While the Government remained at Philadelphia, a selection of members of both Houses were constantly kept as directors, who, on every question interesting to that institution, or to the views of the federal head, voted at the will of that head; and, together with the stockholding members, could always make the federal vote that of the majority. By this combination, legislative expositions were given to the Constitution, and all the administrative laws were shaped on the model of England, and so passed. And from this influence we were not relieved, until the removal from the precincts of the Bank, to Washington.—THE ANAS. ix, 95. FORD ED., i, 164. (1818.)

666. BANK (U. S.), Dividends of.—The bank has just notified its proprietors that they may call for a dividend of ten per cent. on their capital for the last six months. This makes a profit of twenty-six per cent. per annum. Agriculture, commerce, and everything useful must be neglected, when the useless employment of money is so much more lucrative.—TO PLUMARD DE RIEUX. FORD ED., v, 420. (Pa., 1792.)

667. BANK (U. S.), Fall in stock.—The failure of some stock gamblers and some other circumstances, have brought the public paper low. The 6 per cents have fallen from 26 to 21-4, and bank paper stock from 115 or 120 to 73 or 74, within two or three weeks. This nefarious business is becoming more and more the public detestation, and cannot fail, when the knowledge of it shall be sufficiently extended, to tumble its authors headlong from their heights.—TO WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 342. FORD ED., v, 459. (Pa., March 1792.)

668. BANK (U. S.), Hostility to U. S. Government.—This institution is one of the most deadly hostility existing, against the principles and form of our Constitution. The nation is, at this time, so strong and united in its sentiments, that it cannot be shaken at this moment. But suppose a series of untoward events should occur, sufficient to bring into doubt the competency of a republican government to meet a crisis of great danger, or to unhinge the confidence of the people in the public functionaries: an institution like this, penetrating by its branches every part of the Union, acting by command and in phalanx, may, in a critical moment, upset the government. I deem no government safe which is under the vassalage of any self-constituted authorities, or any other authority than that of the nation, or its regular func-tionaries. What an obstruction could not this Bank of the United States, with all its branch banks, be in time of war? It might dictate to us the peace we should accept, or withdraw its aids. Ought we then to give further growth to an institution so powerful, so hostile? That it is so hostile we know: 1, from a knowledge of the principles of the persons composing the body of directors in every bank, principal or branch; and those of most of the stockholders; 2, from their opposition to the measures and principles of the government, and to the election of those friendly to them; and 3, from the sentiments of the newspapers they support. Now, while we are strong, it is the greatest debt we owe to the safety of our Constitution, to bring its powerful enemy to a perfect subordination under its authorities. The first measure would be to reduce them to an equal footing only with other banks, as to the favors of the government. But, in order to be able to meet a general combination of the banks against us, in a critical emergency, could we not make a beginning towards an independent use of our own money, towards holding our own bank in all the deposits where it is received, and letting the treasurer give his draft or note, for payment at any particular place, which, in a well-conducted government, ought to have as much credit as any private draft, or bank note, or bill, and would give us the same facilities which we derive from the banks?—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 519. FORD ED., viii, 284. (W., Dec. 1803.)

669. BANK (U. S.), Inflation projects.—The Bank is so firmly mounted on us that we must go where they will guide. They openly publish a resolution, that the national property being increased in value, they must by an increase of circulating medium furnish an adequate representation of it, and by further additions of active capital promote the enterprises of our merchants. It is supposed that the paper in circulation in and around Philadelphia, amounts to twenty millions of dollars, and that in the whole Union, to one hundred millions.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 140. FORD ED., vii, 80. (M., June 1796.)

670. BANK (U. S.), Regulation of.—The Attorney General having considered and decided that the prescription in the law for establishing a bank, that the officers in the subordinate offices of discount and deposit, shall be appointed "on the same terms and in the same manner practiced in the principal bank," does not extend to them the principle of rotation, established by the Legislature in the body of directors in the principal bank, it follows that the extension of that principle has been merely a voluntary and prudential act of the principal bank, from which they are free to depart. I think the extension was wise and proper on their part, because the Legislature having deemed rotation useful in the principal bank constituted by them, there would be the same reason for it in the subordinate banks to be established by the principal. It breaks in upon the esprit de corps

so apt to prevail in permanent bodies: it gives a chance for the public eye penetrating into the sanctuary of those proceedings and practices, which the avarice of the directors may introduce for their personal emolument, and which the resentments of excluded directors, or the honesty of those duly admitted, might betray to the public; and it gives an opportunity at the end of the year, or at other periods, of correcting a choice, which, on trial, proves to have been unfortunate: an evil of which themselves complain in their distant institutions. Whether, however, they have a power to alter this, or not, the Executive has no right to decide: and their consultation with you has been merely an act of complaisance, or a desire to shield so important an innovation under the cover of executive sanction. But ought we to volunteer our sanction in such a case? Ought we to disarm ourselves of any fair right of animadversion, whenever that institution shall be a legitimate subject of consideration? I own, I think the most proper answer would be that we do not think ourselves authorized to give an opinion on the question.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 518. FORD ED., viii, 284. (W., 1803.)

671. BANK (U. S.), Richmond Branch.—It seems nearly settled with the Treasury-bankites that a branch shall be established at Richmond. Could not a counter-bank be set up to befriend the agricultural man by letting him have money on a deposit of tobacco notes, or even wheat, for a short time, and would not such a bank enlist the legislature in its favor, and against the Treasury bank?—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 98. (Pa., 1792.)

672. BANK (U. S.), Ruin by.—It was impossible the Bank and paper mania should not produce great and extensive ruin. The President is fortunate to get off just as the bubble is bursting, leaving others to hold the bag. Yet, as his departure will mark the moment when the difficulties begin to work, you will see, that they will be ascribed to the new administration, and that he will have his usual good fortune of reaping credit from the good acts of others, and leaving to them that of his errors.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 104. (Jan. 1797.)

673. BANK (U. S.), Saddled by.—We are completely saddled and bridled, and the bank is so firmly mounted on us that we must go where they will guide.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 140. FORD ED., vii, 80. (M., June 1796.)

674. BANK (U. S.), Subscriptions to.—You will have seen the rapidity with which the subscriptions to the bank were filled. As yet the delirium of speculation is too strong to admit sober reflection. It remains to be seen whether in a country whose capital is too small to carry on its own commerce, to establish manufactures, erect buildings, &c., such sums should have been withdrawn from these useful pursuits to be employed in gambling? Whether it was well judged to force on the public a paper circulation of so many millions for which they will be paying about 7 per cent. per ann. and thereby banish as many millions of gold and silver for which they would have paid no interest? I am afraid it is the intention to nourish this spirit of gambling by throwing in from time to time new alimnt.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. FORD ED., v, 357. (Pa., 1791.)

675. ——. The subscriptions to the Bank from Virginia were almost none. * * * This gives so much uneasiness to Colonel Hamilton that he thinks to propose to the President to sell some of the public shares to subscribers from Virginia and North Carolina, if any more should offer. This partiality would offend the other States without pleasing those two: for I presume they would rather the capitals of their citizens should be employed in commerce than be locked up in a strong box here [Philadelphia]: nor can sober thinkers prefer a paper medium at 13 per cent. interest to gold and silver for nothing.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., v, 350. (Pa., 1791.)

676. ——. The bank filled and overflowed in the moment it was opened. Instead of twenty thousand shares, twenty-four thousand were offered, and a great many were presented, who had not suspected that so much haste was necessary. Thus it is that we shall be paying 13 per cent. per ann. for eight millions of paper money, instead of having that circulation of gold and silver for nothing. Experience has proved to us that a dollar of silver disappears for every dollar of paper emitted; and, for the paper emitted from the bank, seven per cent. profits will be received by the subscribers for it as bank paper (according to the last division of profits by the Philadelphia bank), and six per cent. on the public paper of which it is the representative. Nor is there any reason to believe, that either the six millions of public paper, or the two millions of specie deposited, will not be suffered to be withdrawn, and the paper thrown into circulation. The cash deposited by strangers for safe keeping will probably suffice for cash demands.—To JAMES MONROE. iii, 268. FORD ED., v, 352. (Pa., 1791.)

677. BANKRUPTCY, Agriculture, Commerce and.—I find you are to be harassed again with a bankrupt law. Could you not compromise between agriculture and commerce by passing such a law which like the by-laws of incorporate towns, should be binding on the inhabitants of such towns only, being the residence of commerce, leaving the agriculturists, inhabitants of the country, in undisturbed possession of the rights and modes of proceedings to which their habits, their interests and their partialities attach them? This would be as uniform as other laws of local obligation.—To JAMES PLEASANTS. FORD ED., x, 198. (M., 1821.)

678. BANKRUPTCY, Agriculturists and.—A bankrupt bill is brought in in such a form as to render almost all the landholders south of Pennsylvania liable to be declared bankrupts. Hitherto we had imagined that the General Government could not meddle with the title to lands.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., vi, 149. (Pa., 1792.)

679. ——. The bankrupt bill is brought on with some very threatening features to landed and farming men, who are in danger of being drawn into its vortex. It assumes the right of seizing and selling lands, and so cuts the knotty question of the Constitution, whether the General Government may direct the transmission of land by descent or otherwise.—To JOHN FRANCIS MERCER. iii, 495. FORD ED., vi, 148. (Pa., 1792.)

680. BANKRUPTCY, English Law of.—The British statute excepts expressly farmers, graziers, drovers, as such though they buy to sell again. This bill has no such exception. The British adjudications exempt the buyers and sellers of bank stock, government paper, &c. What feelings guided the draughtsman [of this bill] in adhering to his original in this case and then departing from it in the other? The British courts adjudge that any artists may be bankrupts if the materials of their art are bought, such as shoemakers, blacksmiths, carpenters, &c. Will the body of our artists desire to be brought within the vortex of this law? It will follow as a consequence that the master who has an artist of this kind in his family, whether hired, indentured, or a slave, to serve the purposes of his farm or family, but who may at leisure time do something for his neighbors also, may be a bankrupt. The British law makes a departure from the realm, i. e. out of the mediation of British law, an act of bankruptcy. This bill makes a departure from the State wherein he resides (though into a neighboring one where the laws of the United States run equally), an act of bankruptcy. The commissioners may enter houses, break open doors, chests &c. Are we really ripe for this? Is that spirit of independence and sovereignty, which a man feels in his own house, and which Englishmen felt when they denominated their houses their castles, to be absolutely subdued, and is it expedient that it should be subdued? The lands of the bankrupt are to be taken, sold. Is not this a predominant question between the General and State legislatures? Is commerce so much the basis of the existence of the United States as to call for a bankrupt law? On the contrary, are we not almost agricultural? Should not all laws be made with a view essentially to the poor husbandman? When laws are wanting for particular descriptions of other callings, should not the husbandman be carefully excused from their operation, and preserved under that of the general system only, which general system is fitted to the condition of the husbandman? *—NOTES ON THE BANKRUPT BILL. ix, 431. FORD ED., vi, 145. (Dec. 1792.)

* This paper is without date. Jefferson gave it this caption: "Extempore thoughts and doubts on very superficially running over the bankrupt bill." A bankrupt bill, introduced in the House in December, 1792, by W. L. Smith, is probably the one referred to.—EDITOR.

661. BANKS, Abuses of.—The crisis of the abuses of banking is arrived. The banks have pronounced their own sentence of death. Between two and three hundred millions of dollars of their promissory notes are in the hands of the people, for solid produce and property sold, and they formally declare they will not pay them. This is an act of bankruptcy, of course, and will be so pronounced by any court before which it shall be brought. But cui bono? The laws can only uncover their insolvency, by opening to its suitors their empty vaults. Thus by the dupery of our citizens, and tame acquiescence of our legislators, the nation is plundered of two or three hundred millions of dollars, treble the amount of debt contracted in the Revolutionary war, and which, instead of redeeming our liberty, has been expended on sumptuous houses, carriages, and dinners. A fearful tax! if equalized on all; but overwhelming and convulsive by its partial fall.—To THOMAS COOPER vi, 381. (M., Sep. 1814.)

662. — — — Everything predicted by the enemies of banks, in the beginning, is now coming to pass. We are to be ruined now by the deluge of bank paper, as we were formerly by the old Continental paper. It is cruel that such revolutions in private fortunes should be at the mercy of avaricious adventurers, who, instead of employing their capital, if any they have, in manufactures, commerce, and other useful pursuits, make it an instrument to burthen all the interchanges of property with their swindling profits, profits which are the price of no useful industry of theirs. Prudent men must be on their guard in this game of Robin's alive, and take care that the spark does not extinguish in their hands. I am an enemy to all banks discounting bills or notes for anything but coin. But our whole country is so fascinated by this Jack-lantern wealth, that they will not stop short of its total and fatal explosion.*—To DR. THOMAS COOPER vi, 295. (M., Jan. 1814.)

663. — — — The enormous abuses of the banking system are not only prostrating our commerce, but producing revolution of property, which without more wisdom than we possess, will be much greater than were produced by the Revolutionary paper. That, too, had the merit of purchasing our liberties, while the present trash has only furnished aliment to usurers and swindlers.—To RICHARD RUSH. FORD ED., x, 133. (M., June 1819.)

664. BANKS, Aristocracy.—I hope we shall * * * crush in its birth the aristocracy of our moneyed corporations, which dare already to challenge our government to a trial of strength, and bid defiance to the laws of our country.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., x, 69. (P.F., Nov. 1816.)

665. — — — The bank mania * * * is raising up a moneyed aristocracy in our country which has already set the government at defiance, and although forced at length to yield a little on this first essay of their strength, their principles are unyielded and unyielding. These have taken deep root in the hearts of that class from which our legislators are drawn, and the sop to Cerberus from fable has become history. Their principles lay hold of the good, their pelf of the bad, and thus those whom the Constitution had placed as guards to its portals, are sophisticated or suborned from their duties.—To DR. J. B. STUART. vii, 64. (M., 1817.)

666. BANKS, Capital and.—At the time we were funding our national debt, we heard much about "a public debt being a public blessing"; that the stock representing it was a creation of active capital for the aliment of commerce, manufactures and agriculture. This paradox was well adapted to the minds of believers in dreams, and the gulls of that size entered bonâ fide into it. But the art and mystery of banks is a wonderful improvement on that. It is established on the principle that "private debts are a public blessing." That the evidences of those private debts, called bank notes, become active capital, and aliment the whole commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of the United States. Here are a set of people, for instance, who have bestowed on us the great blessing of running in our debt about two hundred millions of dollars, without our knowing who they are, where they are, or what property they have to pay this debt when called on; nay, who have made us so sensible of the blessings of letting them run in our debt, that we have exempted them by law from the repayment of these debts beyond a given proportion (generally estimated at one-third). And to fill up the measure of blessing, instead of paying, they receive an interest on what they owe from those to whom they owe; for all the notes, or evidences of what they owe, which we see in circulation, have been lent to somebody on an interest which is levied again on us through the medium of commerce. And they are so ready still to deal out their liberalities to us, that they are now willing to let themselves run in our debt ninety millions more, on our paying them the same premium of six or eight per cent. interest, and on the same legal exemption from the repayment of more than thirty millions of the debt, when it shall be called for. But let us look at this principle in its original form, and its copy will then be equally understood. "A public debt is a public blessing." That our debt was juggled from forty-three up to eighty millions, and funded at that amount, according to this opinion was a great public blessing, because the evidences of it could be vested in commerce, and thus converted into active capital, and then the more the debt was made to be, the more active capital was created. That is to say, the creditors could now employ in commerce the money due them from the public, and make from it an annual profit of five per cent., or four millions of dollars. But observe, that the public were at the same time paying on it an interest of exactly the same amount of four millions of dollars. Where, then, is the gain to either party, which makes it a public blessing? There is no change in the state of things, but of persons only. A has a debt due to him from the public, of which he holds their certificate as evidence, and on which he is receiving an annual interest. He wishes, however, to have the money itself, and to go into business with it. B has an equal sum of money in business, but wishes now to retire, and live on the interest. He therefore gives it to A in exchange for A's certificates of public stock. Now, then, A has the money to employ in business, which B so employed before. B has the money on interest to live on, which A lived on before; and the public pays the interest to B which they paid to A before. Here is no new creation of capital, no additional money employed, nor even a change in the employment of a single dollar. The only change is of place between A and B in which we discover no creation of capital, nor public blessing. Suppose, again, the public to owe nothing. Then A not having lent his money to the public, would be in possession of it himself, and would go into business without the previous operation of selling stock. Here again, the same quantity of capital is employed as in the former case, though no public debt exists. In neither case is there any creation of active capital, nor other difference than that there is a public debt in the first case, and none in the last; and we safely ask which of the two situations is most truly a public blessing? If, then, a public debt be no public blessing, we may pronounce, a fortiori, that a private one cannot be so. If the debt which the banking companies owe be a blessing to anybody, it is to themselves alone, who are realizing a solid interest of eight or ten per cent. on it. As to the public, these companies have banished all our gold and silver medium, which, before their institution, we had without interest, which never could have perished in our hands, and would have been our salvation now in the hour of war; instead of which they have given us two hundred millions of froth and bubble, on which we are to pay them heavy interest, until it shall vanish into air, as Morris's notes did. We are warranted, then, in affirming that this parody on the principle of "a public debt being a public blessing," and its mutation into the blessing of private instead of public debts, is as ridiculous as the original principle itself.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 239. FORD ED., ix, 411. (M., Nov. 1813.)

* This accordingly took place four years later.—NOTE, WASHINGTON EDITION.

887. ——. Capital may be produced by industry, and accumulated by economy; but jugglers only will propose to create it by legerdemain tricks with paper.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 241. FORD ED., ix, 413. (M., Nov. 1813.)

888. BANKS, Criticism of.—I am too desirous of tranquillity to bring such a nest of hornets on me as the fraternity of banking companies.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vi, 300. (M., 1814.)

889. BANKS, Dangerous.—Banking establishments are more dangerous than standing armies.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vi, 608. FORD ED., x, 31. (M., 1816.)

890. BANKS, Deposit.—Banks of deposit, where cash should be lodged, and a paper acknowledgment taken out as its representative, entitled to a return of the cash on demand, would be convenient for remittances, traveling persons, &c. But, liable as its cash would be to be pilfered and robbed, and its paper to be fraudulently reissued, or issued without deposit, it would require skilful and strict regulation. This would differ from the bank of Amsterdam, in the circumstance that the cash could be redeemed on returning the note.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 247. FORD ED., ix, 417. (M., Nov. 1813.)

891. BANKS, Depreciated Paper of.—Everything predicted by the enemies of banks, in the beginning, is now coming to pass. We are to be ruined now by the deluge of bank paper, as we were formerly by the old Continental paper. It is cruel that such revolutions in private fortunes should be at the mercy of avaricious adventurers, who, instead of employing their capital, if they have any, in manufactures, commerce, and other useful pursuits, make it an instrument to burden all the interchanges of property with their swindling profits, profits which are the price of no useful industry of theirs. Prudent men must be on their guard in this game of Robin's alive, and take care that the spark does not extinguish in their hands. I am an enemy to all banks discounting bills or notes for anything but coin. But our whole country is so fascinated by this Jack-lantern wealth, that they will not stop short of its total and fatal explosion.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 295. (M., Jan. 1814.)

892. ——. Already there is so much of their trash afloat that the great holders of it show vast anxiety to get rid of it. They perceive that now, as in the Revolutionary war, we are engaged in the old game of Robin's alive. They are ravenous after lands and stick at no price. In the neighborhood of Richmond, the seat of that sort of sensibility, they offer twice as much now as they would give a year ago.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 453. (M., Feb. 1814.)

893. ——. The depreciation of bank paper swells nominal prices, without furnishing any stable index of value. I will endeavor briefly to give you an idea of this state of things by an outline of its history.

In 1781 we had 1 bank, its capital $1,000,000.

In 1791 we had 6 banks, their capital $13,135,000.

In 1794 we had 17 banks, their capital $18,642,000.

In 1796 we had 24 banks, their capital $20,472,000.

In 1803 we had 34 banks, their capital $29,112,000.

In 1804 we had 66 banks, their amount of capital not known.

And at this time we have probably one hundred banks, with capital amounting to one hundred millions of dollars, on which they are authorized by law to issue notes to three times that amount, so that our circulating medium may now be estimated at from two to three hundred millions of dollars, on a population of eight and a half millions. The banks were able for awhile, to keep this trash at par with metallic money, or rather to depreciate the metals to a par with their paper, by keeping deposits of cash sufficient to exchange for such of their notes as they were called on to pay in cash. But the circumstances of the war draining away all our specie, all these banks have stopped payment, but with a promise to resume specie exchanges whenever circumstances shall produce a return of the metals. Some of the most prudent and honest will possibly do this; but the mass of them never will nor can. Yet, having no other medium, we take their paper, of necessity, for purposes of the instant, but never to lay by us. The government is now issuing treasury notes for circulation, bottomed on solid funds, and bearing interest. The banking confederacy (and the merchants bound to them by their debts) will endeavor to crush the credit of these notes; but the country is eager for them, as something they can trust to, and so soon as a convenient quantity of them can get into circulation, the bank notes die.—To JEAN BAPTISTE SAY. vi, 434. (M., March 1815.)

694. BANKS, Difficulties caused by.—For the emolument of a small proportion of our society, who prefer those demoralizing pursuits [banking and commerce] to labors useful to the whole, the peace of the whole is endangered, and all our present difficulties produced.—To ABBE SALIMANKIS. v, 516. (M., 1810.)

695. ——. The fatal possession of the whole circulating medium by our banks, the excess of those institutions, and their present discredit, cause all our difficulties.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 419. FORD ED., ix, 503. (M., Feb. 1815.)

696. BANKS, Dominion of.—The dominion of the banks must be broken, or it will break us.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 409. FORD ED., ix, 498. (M., Jan. 1815.)

697. BANKS, Dropsical.—I wish I could see Congress get into a better train of finance. Their banking projects are like dosing dropsy with more water. * * * Their new bank, if not abortive at its birth, will not last through one campaign; and the taxes proposed cannot be paid.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 400. (M., Nov. 1814.)

698. BANKS, Evils of.—The evils they [the banks] have engendered are now upon us, and the question is how we are to get out of them? Shall we build an altar to the old paper money of the Revolution, which ruined individuals but saved the republic, and burn on that all the bank charters, present and future, and their notes with them? For these are to ruin both republic and individuals. This cannot be done. The mania is too strong. It has seized by its delusions and corruptions, all the members of our governments, general, special and individual.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 305. (M., Jan. 1814.)

699. ——. I think it impossible but that the whole system must blow up before the year is out; and thus a tax of three or four hundred millions will be levied on our citizens who had found it a work of so much time and labor to pay off a debt of eighty millions which had redeemed them from bondage.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 453. (M., Feb. 1814.)

700. ——. I see that this infatuation of banks must take its course, until actual ruin shall awaken us from its delusions. Until the gigantic banking propositions of this winter had made their appearance in the different Legislatures, I had hoped that the evil might still be checked; but I see now that it is desperate, and that we must fold our arms and go to the bottom with the ship.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vi, 300. (M., Jan. 1814.)

701. ——. The evils of this deluge of paper money are not to be removed until our citizens are generally and radically instructed in their cause and consequences, and silence by their authority the interested clamors and sophistry of speculating, shaving, and banking institutions. Till then we must be content to return, quoad hoc, to the savage state, to recur to barter in the exchange of our property, for want of a stable, common measure of value, that now in use being less fixed than the beads and wampum of the Indian, and to deliver up our citizens, their property and their labor, passive victims to the swindling tricks of bankers and mountebankers.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 115. (M., 1819.)

702. BANKS, Excess of.—That we are overdone with banking institutions, which have banished the precious metals, and substituted a more fluctuating and unsafe medium, that these have withdrawn capital from useful improvements and employments to nourish idleness * * * are evils more easily to be deplored than remedied.—To ABBE SALIMANKIS. v, 516. (M., 1810.)

703. ——. A parcel of mushroom banks have set up in every State, have filled the country with their notes, and have thereby banished all our specie. A twelvemonth ago they all declared they could not pay cash for their own notes, and notwithstanding this act of bankruptcy, this trash has of necessity been passing among us, because we have no other medium of exchange, and is still taken and passed from hand to hand, as you remember the old Continental money to have been in the Revolutionary war; every one getting rid of it as quickly as he can, by laying it out in property of any sort at double, treble and manifold higher prices. * * * A general crush is daily expected when this trash will be lost in the hands of the holders. This will take place the moment some specie returns among us, or so soon as the government will issue bills of circulation. The little they have issued is greatly sought after, and a premium given for them which is rising fast.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., ix, 524. (M., Aug. 1815.)

704. BANKS, Failures of.—The failure of our banks will occasion embarrassment for awhile, although it restores to us a fund which ought never to have been surrendered by the nation, and which now, prudently used, will carry us through all the fiscal difficulties of the war.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 386. (M., Sep. 1814.)

705. ——. The banks have discontinued themselves. We are now without any medium; and necessity, as well as patriotism, and confidence, will make us all eager to receive treasury notes, if founded on specific taxes. Congress may now borrow of the public, and without interest, all the money they may want, to the amount of a competent circulation, by merely issuing their own promissory notes, of proper denominations for the larger purposes of circulation, but not for the small. Leave that door open for the entrance of metallic money.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 382. (M., Sep. 1814.)

706. ——. Providence seems, indeed, by a special dispensation, to have put down for us, without a struggle, that very paper enemy which the interest of our citizens long since required ourselves to put down, at whatever risk. The work is done. The moment is pregnant with futurity, and if not seized at once by Congress, I know not on what shoal our bark is next to be stranded.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 382. (M., Sep. 1814.)

707. ——. The crush will be tremendous; very different from that brought on by our paper money. That rose and fell so gradually that it kept all on their guard, and affected severely only early or long-winded contracts. Here the contract of yesterday crushes in an instant the one or the other party. The banks stopping payment suddenly, all their mercantile and city debtors do the same; and all, in short, except those in the country, who, possessing property, will be good in the end. But this resource will not enable them to pay a cent on the dollar.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 381. (M., Sep. 1814.)

708. ——. The paper interest is now defunct. Their gossamer castles are dissolved, and they can no longer impede and overawe the salutary measures of the government. Their paper was received on a belief that it was cash on demand. Themselves have declared it was nothing, and such scenes are now to take place as will open the eyes of credulity and of insanity itself to the dangers of a paper medium, abandoned to the discretion of avarice and of swindlers. It is impossible not to deplore our past follies, and their present consequences, but let them at least be warnings against like follies in future.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 382. (M., Sep. 1814.)

709. BANKS, Fictitious Capital.—The banks themselves were doing business on capitals, three-fourths of which were fictitious; and to extend their profit they furnished fictitious capital to every man, who having nothing and disliking the labors of the plow, chose rather to call himself a merchant, to set up a house of $5,000 a year expense, to dash into every species of mercantile gambling, and if that ended as gambling generally does, a fraudulent bankruptcy was an ultimate resource of retirement and competence. This fictitious capital, probably of one hundred millions of dollars, is now to be lost, and to fall on somebody; it must take on those who have property to meet it, and probably on the less cautious part, who, not aware of the impending catastrophe have suffered themselves to contract, or to be in debt, and must now sacrifice their property of a value many times the amount of their debt. We have been truly sowing the wind, and are now reaping the whirlwind. If the present crisis should end in the annihilation of these pennyless and ephemeral interlopers only, and reduce our commerce to the measure of our own wants and surplus productions, it will be a benefit in the end. But how to effect this, and give time to real capital, and the holders of real property, to back out of their entanglements by degrees requires more knowledge of political economy than we possess. I believe it might be done, but I despair of its being done. The eyes of our citizens are not sufficiently open to the true cause of our distress. They ascribe them to everything but their true cause, the banking system; a system, which, if it could do good in any form, is yet so certain of leading to abuse, as to be utterly incompatible with the public safety and prosperity. At present, all is confusion, uncertainty and panic.—To RICHARD RUSH. FORD ED., x, 133. (M., June 1819.)

710. BANKS, Government Deposits and.—The application of the Bank of Baltimore is of great importance. The consideration is very weighty that it is held by citizens, while the stock of the United States bank is held in so great a proportion by foreigners. Were the Bank of the United States to swallow up the others and monopolize the whole banking business of the United States, which the demands we furnish them with tend shortly to favor, we might, on a misunderstanding with a foreign power, be immensely embarrassed by any disaffection in that bank. It is certainly for the public good to keep all the banks competitors for our favors by a judicious distribution of them, and thus to engage the individuals who belong to them in the support of the reformed order of things, or at least in an acquiescence under it. I suppose that, on the condition of participating in the deposits, the banks would be willing to make such communications of their operations and the state of their affairs as might satisfy the Secretary of the Treasury of their stability. It is recommended to Mr. Gallatin to leave such an opening in his answer to this letter, as to leave us free to do hereafter what shall be advisable on a broad view of all the banks in the different parts of the Union.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 172. (Oct. 1802.)

711. ——. As to the patronage of the Republican Bank at Providence, I am decidedly in favor of making all the banks republican, by sharing deposits with them in proportion to the dispositions they show. If the law now forbids it, we should not permit another session of Congress to pass without amending it. It is material to the safety of republicanism to detach the mercantile interest from its enemies and incorporate them into the body of its friends.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 252. (July 1803.)

712. BANKS, Jefferson's disapprobation of Paper.—My original disapprobation of banks circulating paper is not unknown, nor have I since observed any effects either on the morals or fortunes of our citizens, which are any counter balance for the public evils produced.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 203. FORD ED., ix, 402. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

713. ——. The toleration of banks of paper-discount costs the United States one half their war taxes; or, in other words, doubles the expense of every war.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 201. FORD ED., ix, 400. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

714. ——. From the establishment of the United States Bank to this day, I have preached against this system, and have been sensible no cure could be hoped, but in the catastrophe now happening.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 381. (M., 1814.)

715. ——. I have ever been the enemy of banks, not of those discounting for cash, but of those foisting their own paper into circulation, and thus banishing our cash. My zeal against those institutions was so warm and open at the establishment of the Bank of the United States, that I was derided as a maniac by the tribe of bank-mongers, who were seeking to filch from the public their swindling and barren gains.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 305. (M., Jan. 1814.)

716. ——. I am an enemy to all banks discounting bills or notes for anything but coin.—To DR. THOMAS COOPER. vi, 295. (M., Jan. 1814.)

717. ——. The system of banking we have both equally and ever reprobated. I contemplate it as a blot left in all our constitutions, which, if not covered, will end in their destruction, which is already hit by the gamblers in corruption, and is sweeping away in its progress the fortunes and morals of our citizens.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vi, 605. FORD ED., x, 28. (M., May 1816.)

718. ——. I do not know whether you may recollect how loudly my voice was raised against the establishment of banks in the beginning; but like that of Cassandra it was not listened to. I was set down as a madman by those who have since been victims to them. I little thought then how much

I was to suffer by them myself; for I, too, am taken in by endorsements for a friend to the amount of $20,000, for the payment of which I shall have to make sale of that much of my property. And yet the general revolution of fortunes, which these instruments have produced, seems not at all to have cured our country of this mania.—To THOMAS LEIFER. FORD ED., x, 254. (May 1823.)

719. BANKS, Mania for.—We are undone if this banking mania be not suppressed. Aut Carthago, aut Roma delenda est.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vi, 498. (M., Oct. 1815.)

720. ——. The mania * * * has seized, by its delusions and corruptions, all the members of our governments, general, special, and individual.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 306. (M., Jan. 1814.)

721. ——. Knowing well that the Bank mania still possessed the great body of our countrymen, it was not expected that any radical cure of that could be at once effected. We must go further wrong, probably to a ne plus ultra before we shall be forced into what is right. Something will be obtained however, if we can excite, in those who think, doubt first, reflection next, and conviction at last.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. FORD ED., ix, 499. (M., 1815.)

722. ——. Like a dropsical man calling out for water, water, our deluded citizens are clamoring for more banks, more banks. The American mind is now in that state of fever which the world has so often seen in the history of other nations. We are under the bank bubble, as England was under the South Sea bubble, France under the Mississippi bubble, and as every nation is liable to be, under whatever bubble, design or delusion may puff up in moments when off their guard.—To CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 515. FORD ED., x, 2. (M., Jan. 1816.)

723. ——. This infatuation of banks is a torrent which it would be a folly for me to get in the way of. I see that it must take its course, until actual ruin shall awaken us from its delusions.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vi, 300. (M., Jan. 1814.)

724. BANKS, Monopoly.—The monopoly of a single bank is certainly an evil. The multiplication of them was intended to cure it; but it multiplied an influence of the same character with the first, and completed the supplanting of the precious metals by a paper circulation. Between such parties the less we meddle the better.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 446. FORD ED., viii, 158. (W., 1802.)

725. BANKS, Paper.—Interdict forever, to both the State and National governments the power of establishing any paper bank; for without this interdiction we shall have the same ebbs and flows of medium, and the same revolutions of property to go through every twenty or thirty years.—To W. C. RIVES. vii, 147. FORD ED., x, 151. (M., 1819.)

726. BANKS, Power to establish.—The States should be applied to, to transfer the right of issuing circulating paper to Congress exclusively, in perpetuum, if possible, but during the war at least, with a saving of charter rights.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 140. FORD ED., ix, 393. (M., June 1813.)

727. ——. The States should be urged to concede to the General Government, with a saving of chartered rights, the exclusive power of establishing banks of discount for paper.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 427. FORD ED., ix, 417. (M., Nov. 1813.)

728. ——. I still believe that on proper representations of the subject, a great proportion of the Legislatures would cede to Congress their power of establishing banks, saving the charter rights already granted. And this should be asked, not by way of amendment to the Constitution, because until three-fourths should consent, nothing could be done; but accepted from them one by one, singly, as their consent might be obtained. Any single State, even if no other should come into the measure, would find its interest in arresting foreign bank paper immediately, and its own by degrees. Specie would flow in on them as paper disappeared. Their own banks would call in and pay off their notes gradually, and their constituents would thus be saved from the general wreck. Should the greater part of the States concede, as is expected, their power over banks to Congress, besides insuring their own safety, the paper of the non-conceding States might be so checked and circumscribed, by prohibiting its receipt in any of the conceding States, and even in the non-conceding as to duties, taxes, judgments, or other demands of the United States, or of the citizens of other States, that it would soon die of itself, and the medium of gold and silver be universally restored. This is what ought to be done. But it will not be done. Carthago non delibitur. The overbearing clamor of merchants, speculators, and projectors, will drive us before them with our eyes open, until, as in France, under the Mississippi bubble, our citizens will be overtaken by the crash of this baseless fabric, without other satisfaction than that of execrations on the heads of those functionaries, who, from ignorance, pusillanimity or corruption, have betrayed the fruits of their industry into the hands of projectors and swindlers.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 245. FORD ED., ix, 415. (M., Nov. 1813.)

729. ——. The State Legislature should be immediately urged to relinquish the right of establishing banks of discount. Most of them will comply, on patriotic principles, under the convictions of the moment and the non-complying may be crowded into concurrence by legitimate devices.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 382. (M., Sep. 1814.)

730. ——. I do not remember the conversation between us which you mention * * * on your proposition to vest in Congress the exclusive power of establishing banks. My opposition to it must have been grounded, not on taking the power from the States, but on leaving any vestige of it in existence, even in the hands of Congress, because it would only have been a change of the organ of abuse.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 305. (M., Jan. 1814.)

731. BANKS, Precautions against.—In order to be able to meet a general combination of the banks against us, in a critical emergency, could we not make a beginning towards an independent use of our own money, towards holding our own bank in all the deposits where it is received, and letting the treasurer give his draft or note, for payment at any particular place, which, in a well-conducted government, ought to have as much credit as any private draft, or bank note, or bill, and would give us the same facilities which we derive from the banks.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 520. FORD ED., viii, 285. (W., Dec. 1803.)

732. BANKS, Private Fortunes and.—Private fortunes, in the present state of our circulation, are at the mercy of those self-created money-lenders, and are prostrated by the floods of nominal money with which their avarice deluges us. He who lent his money to the public or to an individual, before the institution of the United States Bank, twenty years ago, when wheat was well sold at a dollar the bushel, and receives now his nominal sum when it sells at two dollars, is cheated of half his fortune; and by whom? By the banks, which, since that, have thrown into circulation ten dollars of their nominal money where there was one at that time.—To JOHN W. EPPES. vi, 142. FORD ED., ix, 394. (M., June 1813.)

733. ——. It is cruel that such revolutions in private fortunes should be at the mercy of avaricious adventurers, who instead of employing their capital, if any they have, in manufactures, commerce, and other useful pursuits, make it an instrument to burden all the interchanges of property with their swindling profits, profits which are the price of no useful industry of theirs.—To DR. THOMAS COOPER. vi, 295. (M., 1814.)

734. ——. The flood of paper money had produced an exaggeration of nominal prices, and at the same time a facility of obtaining money, which not only encouraged speculations on fictitious capital, but seduced those of real capital, even in private life, to contract debts too freely. Had things continued in the same course, these might have been manageable; but the operations of the United States bank for the demolition of the State banks obliged these suddenly to call in more than half their paper, crushed all fictitious and doubtful capital, and reduced the prices of property and produce suddenly to one-third of what they had been.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., x, 176. (M., Dec. 1820.)

735. BANKS, Scarcity of Medium and.—Instead of yielding to the cries of scarcity of medium set up by speculators, projectors and commercial gamblers, no endeavors should be spared to begin the work of reducing it by such gradual means as may give time to private fortunes to preserve their poise, and settle down with the subsiding medium.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 246. FORD ED., ix, 417. (M., Nov. 1813.)

736. ———. We are called on to add ninety millions more to the circulation. Proceeding in this career, it is infallible, that we must end where the Revolutionary paper ended. Two hundred millions was the whole amount of all the emissions of the old Congress, at which point their bills ceased to circulate. We are now at that sum, but with treble the population, and of course a longer tether. Our depreciation is, as yet, but about two for one. Owing to the support its credit receives from the small reservoirs of specie in the vaults of the banks, it is impossible to say at what point their notes will stop. Nothing is necessary to effect it but a general alarm; and that may take place whenever the public shall begin to reflect on, and perceive the impossibility that the banks should repay this sum. At present, caution is inspired no farther than to keep prudent men from selling property on long payments. Let us suppose the panic to arise at three hundred millions, a point to which every session of the Legislature hastens us by long strides. Nobody dreams that they would have three hundred millions of specie to satisfy the holders of their notes. Were they even to stop now, no one supposes they have two hundred millions in cash, or even the sixty-six and two-third millions, to which amount alone the law compels them to repay. One hundred and thirty-three and one-third millions of loss, then, is thrown on the public by law; and as to the sixty-six and two-thirds, which they are legally bound to pay, and ought to have in their vaults, every one knows there is no such amount of cash in the United States, and what would be the course with what they really have there? Their notes are refused. Cash is called for. The inhabitants of the banking towns will get what is in the vaults, until a few banks declare their insolvency; when, the general crush becoming evident, the others will withdraw even the cash they have, declare their bankruptcy at once, and have an empty house and empty coffers for the holders of their notes. In this scramble of creditors, the country gets nothing, the towns but little. What are they to do? Bring suits? A million of creditors bring a million of suits against John Nokes and Robert Styles, whosoever to be found? All nonsense. The loss is total. And a sum is thus swindled from our citizens, of seven times the amount of the real debt, and four times that of the fictitious one of the United States, at the close of the war. All this they will justly charge on their Legislatures; but this will be poor satisfaction for the two or three hundred millions they will have lost. It is time, then, for the public functionaries to look to this. Perhaps it may not be too late. Perhaps, by giving time to the banks, they may call in and pay off their paper by degrees. But no remedy is ever to be expected while it rests with the State Legislatures. Personal motive can be excited through so many avenues to their will, that, in their hands, it will continue to go on from bad to worse, until the catastrophe overwhelms us.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 243. FORD ED., ix, 414. (M., Nov. 1813.)

737. ———. Our circulating paper of the last year was estimated at two hundred millions of dollars. The new banks now petitioned for, to the several Legislatures, are for about sixty millions additional capital, and of course one hundred and eighty millions of additional circulation, nearly doubling that of the last year, and raising the whole mass to near four hundred millions, or forty for one, of the wholesome amount of circulation for a population of eight millions circumscribed as we are, and you remember how rapidly our money went down after our forty for one establishment in the Revolution. I doubt if the present trash can hold as long. I think the three hundred and eighty millions must blow all up in the course of the present year, or certainly it will be consumed by the reduplication to take place of course at the legislative meetings of the next winter. Should not prudent men, who possess stock in any moneyed institution, either draw and hoard the cash now while they can, or exchange it for canal stock, or such other as being bottomed on immovable property will remain unharmed by the crush?—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 306. (M., Jan. 1814.)

738. ———. Two hundred millions in actual circulation and two hundred millions more likely to be legitimated by the legislative sessions of this winter, will give us about forty times the wholesome circulation for eight millions of people. When the new emissions get out, our legislatures will see, what they otherwise cannot believe, that it is possible to have too much money.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 453. (M., Feb. 1814.)

739. ———. The evils of this deluge of paper money are not to be removed, until our citizens are generally and radically instructed in their course and consequences, and silence by their authority the interested clamors and sophistry of speculating, shaving, and banking institutions. Till then we must be content to return, quoad hoc, to the savage state, to recur to barter in the exchange of our property, for the want of a stable, common measure of value, that now in use being less fixed than the beads and wampum of the Indian, and to deliver up our citizens, their property and their labor, passive victims to the swindling tricks of bankers and mountebankers.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 115. (M., 1819.)

740. BANKS, Sound Money.—But, it will be asked, are we to have no banks? Are merchants and others to be deprived of the resource of short accommodations, found so convenient? I answer, let us have banks; but let them be such as are alone to be found in any country on earth, except Great Britain. There is not a bank of discount on the con-continent of Europe (at least there was not one when I was there), which offers anything but cash in exchange for discounted bills. No one has a natural right to the trade of a money lender, but he who has the money to lend. Let those then among us, who have a moneyed capital, and who prefer employing it in loans rather than otherwise, set up banks, and give cash or national bills for the notes they discount. Perhaps, to encourage them, a larger interest than is legal in the other cases might be allowed them, on the condition of their lending for short periods only. It is from Great Britain we copy the idea of giving paper in exchange for discounted bills; and while we have derived from that country some good principles of government and legislation, we unfortunately run into the most servile imitations of all her practices, ruinous as they prove to her, and with the gulf yawning before us into which these very practices are precipitating her.—To JOHN W. EPPES, vi, 141. FORD ED., ix, 394. (M., June 1813.)

741. ——. Let banks continue if they please, but let them discount for cash alone or for treasury notes. They discount for cash alone in every other country on earth except Great Britain, and her too often unfortunate copyist, the United States. If taken in time they may be rectified by degrees, but if let alone till the alternative forces itself on us, of submitting to the enemy for want of funds, or the suppression of bank paper, either by law or by convulsion, we cannot foresee how it will end.—To J. W. EPPES, vi, 199. FORD ED., ix, 399. (P. F., Sept. 1813.)

742. ——. To the existence of banks of discount for cash, as on the continent of Europe, there can be no objection, because there can be no danger of abuse, and they are a convenience both to merchants and individuals. I think they should even be encouraged, by allowing them a larger than legal interest on short discounts, and tapering thence in proportion as the term of discount is lengthened, down to legal interest on those of a year or more.—To J. W. EPPES, vi, 247. FORD ED., ix, 417. (M., Nov. 1813.)

743. BANKS, Suspend Specie Payments.—The paper bubble is burst. This is what you and I, and every reasoning man, seduced by no obliquity of mind or interest, have long foreseen. We were laboring under a dropsical fullness of circulating medium. Nearly all of it is now called in by the banks, who have the regulation of the safety-valves of our fortunes, and who condense and explode them at their will. Lands in this State [Virginia] cannot now be sold for a year's rent; and unless our Legislature have wisdom enough to effect a remedy by a gradual diminution only of the medium, there will be a general revolution of property in this State. Over our own paper and that of other States coming among us, they have competent powers: over that of the Bank of the United States there is doubt, not here, but elsewhere.

That bank will probably conform voluntarily to such regulations as the Legislature may prescribe for the others. If they do not, we must shut their doors, and join the other States which deny the right of Congress to establish banks, and solicit them to agree to some mode of settling this constitutional question. They have themselves twice decided against their right, and twice for it. Many of the States have been uniform in denying it, and between such parties the Constitution has provided no umpire.—To JOHN ADAMS, vii, 142. FORD ED., x, 147. (M., Nov. 1819.) See MONEY and PAPER MONEY.

744. BANNEKER (Benjamin), Talents of.—We have now in the United States a negro, the son of a black man born in Africa, and a black woman born in the United States, who is a very respectable mathematician. I procured him to be employed under one of our chief directors in laying out the new Federal city on the Potomac, and in the intervals of his leisure, while on that work, he made an almanac for the next year, which he sent me in his own handwriting, and which I enclose to you. I have seen very elegant solutions of geometrical problems by him. Add to this that he is a very worthy and respectable member of society. He is a free man. I shall be delighted to see these instances of moral eminence so multiplied as to prove that the want of talents, observed in them, is merely the effect of their degraded condition, and not proceeding from any difference in the structure of the parts on which intellect depends.—To MARQUIS DE CONDORCET. FORD ED., v, 379. (Pa., 1791.)

745. BARBARISM, America and.—We are destined to be a barrier against the return of ignorance and barbarism.—To JOHN ADAMS, vii, 27. (M., 1816.)

746. BARBARISM, End to.—Barbarism * * * will in time, I trust, disappear from the earth.—To WILLIAM LUDLOW, vii, 377. (M., 1824.)

— BARBARY STATES, Algerine Captives.—See CAPTIVES.

747. BARBARY STATES, A Confederation against.—I was very unwilling that we should acquiesce in the European humiliation of paying a tribute to those * * * pirates, and endeavored to form an association of the powers subject to habitual depredations from them. I accordingly prepared, and proposed to their ministers at Paris, for consultation with their governments, articles of a special confederation.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY, i, 65. FORD ED., i, 91. (1821.)

748. BARBARY STATES, Confederation Articles.—Proposals for concerted operation among the powers at war with the piratical States of Barbary: 1. It is proposed, that the several powers at war with the piratical States of Barbary, or any two or more of them who shall be willing, shall enter into a convention to carry on their operations against those States, in concert, beginning with the Algerines. 2. This convention shall remain open to any other power who shall at any future time wish to accede to it: the parties reserving the right to prescribe the conditions of such accession, according to the circumstances existing at the time it shall be proposed. 3.

The object of the convention shall be to compel the piratical States to perpetual peace, without price, and to guarantee that peace to each other. 4. The operations for obtaining this peace shall be constant cruisers on their coast, with a naval force now to be agreed on. It is not proposed that this force shall be so considerable as to be inconvenient to any party. It is believed that half a dozen frigates, with as many tenders or Xebecs, one half of which shall be in cruise, while the other half is at rest, will suffice. 5. The force agreed to be necessary shall be furnished by the parties in certain quotas now to be fixed; it being expected that each will be willing to contribute in such proportion as circumstances may render reasonable. 6. The miscarriages often proceed from the want of harmony among officers of different nations, the parties shall now consider and decide whether it will not be better to contribute their quotas in money to be employed in fitting out, and keeping on duty, a single fleet of the force agreed on. 7. The difficulties and delays too which will attend the management of these operations, if conducted by the parties themselves separately, distant as their Courts may be from one another, and incapable of meeting in consultation, suggest a question whether it will not be better for them to give full powers for that purpose to their Ambassadors or other Ministers Resident at some one Court of Europe, who shall form a Committee or Council for carrying this convention into effect; wherein the vote of each member shall be computed in proportion to the quota of his sovereign, and the majority so computed shall prevail in all questions within the view of this convention. The Court of Versailles is proposed, on account of its neighborhood to the Mediterranean, and because all those powers are represented there, who are likely to become parties to this convention. 8. To save to that council the embarrassment of personal solicitations for office, and to assure the parties that their contributions will be applied solely to the object for which they are destined, there shall be no establishment of officers for the said Council, such as Commissioners, Secretaries, or any other kind, with either salaries or perquisites, nor any other lucrative appointments but such whose functions are to be exercised on board the said vessels. 9. Should war arise between any two of the parties to this convention it shall not extend to this enterprise, nor interrupt it; but as to this they shall be reputed at peace. 10. When Algiers shall be reduced to peace, the other piratical States, if they refuse to discontinue their piracies, shall become the objects of this convention, either successively or together, as shall seem best. 11. Where this convention would interfere with treaties actually existing between any two of the parties and the said States of Barbary, the treaty shall prevail, and such party shall be allowed to withdraw from the operations against that State.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 65. FORD ED., i, 91.

749. BARBARY STATES, Congress and.—Nothing was now wanting to bring it into direct and formal consideration but the assent of our government, and their authority to make the formal proposition. I communicated to them the favorable prospect of protecting our commerce from the Barbary depredations, and for such a continuance of time as, by an exclusion of them from the sea, to change their habits and characters from a predatory to an agricultural people: towards which however it was expected they would contribute a frigate, and its expenses to be in constant cruise. But they were in no condition to make any such engagement. Their recommendatory powers for obtaining contributions were so openly neglected by the several States that they declined an engagement which they were conscious they could not fulfil with punctuality; and so it fell through.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 67. FORD ED., i, 93. (1821.)

750. BARBARY STATES, Europe and.

—Spain had just concluded a treaty with Algiers, at the expense of three millions of dollars, and did not like to relinquish the benefit of that until the other party should fail in their observance of it. Portugal, Naples, the two Sicilies, Venice, Malta, Denmark and Sweden were favorably disposed to such an association; but their representatives at Paris expressed apprehensions that France would interfere, and, either openly or secretly support the Barbary powers; and they required that I should ascertain the dispositions of the Count de Vergennes on the subject. I had before taken occasion to inform him of what we were proposing, and therefore did not think it proper to insinuate any doubt of the fair conduct of his government; but stating our propositions, I mentioned the apprehensions entertained by us that England would interfere in behalf of those piratical governments. "She dares not do it," said he. I pressed it no further. The other Agents were satisfied with this indication of his sentiments.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 67. FORD ED., i, 93. (1821.)

751. BARBARY STATES, Great Britain and.—I hinted to the Count de Vergennes that I thought the English capable of administering aid to the Algerines. He seemed to think it impossible on account of the scandal it would bring on them.—TO JOHN JAY. i, 575. FORD ED., iv, 228. (P., 1786.)

752. BARBARY STATES, Jefferson's Views on.—Our instructions relative to the Barbary States having required us to proceed by way of negotiation to obtain their peace, it became our duty to do this to the best of our power. Whatever might be our private opinions, they were to be suppressed, and the line marked out to us was to be followed. It has been so, honestly and zealously. It was, therefore, never material for us to consult together, on the best plan of conduct toward these States. I acknowledge, I very early thought it would be best to effect a peace through the medium of war. Though it is a question with which we have nothing to do, yet as you propose some discussion of it, I shall trouble you with my reasons. Of the four positions laid down by you, I agree to the three first, which are, in substance, that the good offices of our friends cannot procure us a peace without paying its price; that they cannot materially lessen that price; and that paying it, we can have the peace in spite of the intrigues of our enemies. As to the fourth, that the longer the negotiation is delayed, the larger will be the demand; this will depend on the intermediate captures: if they are many and rich, the price may be raised; if few and poor, it will be lessened. However, if it is decided that we shall buy a peace, I know no reason for delaying the operation, but should rather think it ought to be hastened; but I should prefer the obtaining it by war. 1. Justice is in favor of this opinion. 2. Honor favors it. 3. It will procure us respect in Europe; and respect is a safeguard to interest. 4. It will arm the Federal head with the safest of all the instruments of coercion over its delinquent members, and prevent it from using what would be less safe. I think that so far, you go with me. But in the next steps, we shall differ. 5. I think it least expensive. I ask a fleet of one hundred and fifty guns, the one-half of which shall be in constant cruise. This fleet, built, manned and victualled for six months will cost four hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling. Its annual expense will be three hundred pounds sterling a gun, including everything; this will be forty-five thousand pounds sterling a year. I take the British experience for the basis of my calculation; though we know, from our own experience, that we can do it in this way, for pounds lawful, what costs them pounds sterling. Were we to charge all this to the Algerine war, it would amount to little more than we must pay, if we buy peace. But as it is proper and necessary that we should establish a small marine force (even were we to buy a peace from the Algerines), and as that force, laid up in our dockyards, would cost us half as much annually, as if kept in order for service, we have a right to say that only twenty-two thousand and five hundred pounds sterling, per annum, should be charged to the Algerine war. 6. It will be as effectual. To all the mismanagements of Spain and Portugal, urged to show that war against these people is ineffectual, I urge a single fact to prove the contrary, where there is any management. About forty years ago, the Algerines having broken their treaty with France, that court sent Monsieur de Massiac, with one large and two small frigates; he blockaded the harbor of Algiers three months, and they subscribed to the terms he proposed. If it be admitted, however, that war, on the fairest prospects, is still exposed to uncertainties, I weigh against this the greater uncertainty of the duration of a peace bought with money, from such a people, from a Dey eighty years old, and by a nation who, on the hypothesis of buying peace, is to have no power on the sea to enforce an observance of it. So far, I have gone on the supposition that the whole weight of this war would rest on us. But, 1. Naples will join us. The character of their naval minister (Acton), his known sentiments with respect to the peace Spain is officiously trying to make for them, and his dispositions against the Algerines, give the best grounds to believe it. 2. Every principle of reason assures us that Portugal will join us. I state this as taking for granted, what all seem to believe, that they will not be at peace with Algiers. I suppose, then, that a convention might be formed between Portugal, Naples and the United States, by which the burthen of the war might be quoaded on them, according to their respective wealth; and the term of it should be, when Algiers should subscribe to a peace with all three, on equal terms. This might be left open for other nations to accede to, and many, if not most, of the powers of Europe (except France, England, Holland, and Spain, if her peace be made), would sooner or later enter into the confederacy, for the sake of having their peace with the piratical States guaranteed by the whole. I suppose, that, in this case, our proportion of force would not be the half of what I first calculated on.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 591. (P., July 1786.)

753. — — — Were the honor and advantage of establishing such a confederacy [against the piratical powers] out of the question, yet the necessity that the United States should have some marine force, and the happiness of this, as the ostensible cause for beginning it, would decide on its propriety. It will be said, there is no money in the treasury. There never will be money in the treasury, till the confederacy shows its teeth. The States must see the rod; perhaps it must be felt by some one of them. I am persuaded, all of them would rejoice to see every one obliged to furnish its contributions. It is not the difficulty of furnishing them, which beggars the treasury, but the fear that others will not furnish as much. Every rational citizen must wish to see an effective instrument of coercion, and should fear to see it on any other element than the water.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 606. FORD ED., iv, 264. (P., 1786.)

754. BARBARY STATES, The Mediterranean and.—Algiers, Tunis and Tripoli, remaining hostile, will shut up the Mediterranean to us.—To GOVERNOR HENRY. i, 601. (P., 1786.)

755. — — — The Algerines form an obstacle; but the object of our commerce in the Mediterranean is so immense that we ought to surmount that obstacle, and I believe it can be done by means in our power, and which, instead of fouling us with the dishonorable and criminal baseness of France and England, will place us in the road to respect with all the world.—To E. RUTLEDGE. iii, 110. (P., 1789.)

— BARBARY STATES, Morocco.—See MOROCCO.

756. BARBARY STATES, Purchasing Peace with.—What will you do with the piratical States? Buy a peace at their enormous price; force one; or abandon the carriage into the Mediterranean to other powers? All these measures are disagreeable.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. i, 557. (P., 1786.)

757. — — — The States of Algiers, Tunis and Tripoli hold their peace at a price which would be felt by every man in his settlement with the taxgatherer.—To PATRICK HENRY. i, 601. (P., 1786.)

758. — — — It is not in the choice of the States, whether they will pay money to cover their trade against the Algerines. If they obtain a peace by negotiation, they must pay a great sum of money for it; if they do nothing, they must pay a great sum of money in the form of insurance; and in either way, as great a one as in the way of force, and probably less effectual.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 607. FORD ED., iv, 265. (P., 1786.)

759. — — — Congress must begin by getting money. When they have this, it is a matter of calculation whether they will buy a peace, or force one, or do nothing.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 585. (P., 1786.)

760. — — — The continuance of [a purchased] peace with the Barbary States will depend on their idea of our power to enforce it, and on the life of the particular Dey, or other head of the government, with whom it is contracted. Congress will, no doubt, weigh these circumstances against the expense and probable success of compelling a peace by arms.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 565. FORD ED., iv, 221. (P., 1786.)

761. — — — In London Mr. Adams and I had conferences with a Tripoline ambassador, named Abdrahaman. He asked us thirty thousand guineas for a peace with his court, and as much for Tunis, for which he said he could answer. What we were authorized to offer, being to this but as a drop to a bucket, our conferences were repeated only for the purpose of obtaining information. If the demands of Algiers and Morocco should be in proportion to this, according to their superior power, it is easy to foresee that the United States will not buy a peace with money.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. i, 551. (P., 1786.)

762. ——. The Tripoline ambassador offered peace for 30,000 guineas for Tripoli, and as many for Tunis. Calculating on this scale, Morocco should ask 60,000, and Algiers 120,000.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. i, 559. (P., 1786.)

763. ——. A second plan might be to obtain peace by purchasing it. For this we have the example of rich and powerful nations, in this instance counting their interest more than their honor.—REPORT ON MEDITERRANEAN TRADE. vii, 522. (1790.)

764. ——. As the duration of this peace cannot be counted on with certainty, and we look forward to the necessity of coercion by cruises on their coast, to be kept up during the whole of their cruising season, you will be pleased to inform yourself * * * of every circumstance which may influence or guide us in undertaking and conducting such an operation.—To JOHN PAUL JONES. iii, 438. (Pa., 1792.)

765. BARBARY STATES, Suppression of.—The attempts heretofore made to suppress the [Barbary] powers have been to exterminate them at one blow. They are too numerous and powerful by land for that. A small effort, but long continued, seems to be the only method. By suppressing their marine and trade totally, and continuing this till the present race of seamen should be pretty well out of the way, and the younger people betake themselves to husbandry for which their soil and climate are well fitted, these nests of banditti might be reformed.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 33. (P., 1785.)

766. BARBARY STATES, Tribute to.—It is impossible I fear to find out what [tribute] is given by other countries [to the piratical States]. Either shame or jealousy makes them wish to keep it secret.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 31. (P., 1785.)

767. ——. The Algerines, I fear, will ask such a tribute for the forbearance of their piracies as the United States would be unwilling to pay. When this idea comes across my mind my faculties are absolutely suspended between indignation and impotence. I think whatever sums we are obliged to pay for freedom of navigation in the European seas, should be levied on European commerce with us, by a separate impost; that these powers may see that they protect these enormities for their own loss. To NATHANIEL GREENE. FORD ED., iv, 25. (P., 1785.)

768. ——. Such [European] powers as should refuse [to join a confederation to suppress the Barbary piracies] would give us a just right to turn pirates also on their West India trade, and to require an annual tribute which might reimburse what we may be obliged to pay to obtain a safe navigation in their seas.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 33. (P., 1785.)

769. BARBARY STATES, War with.—From what I learn from the temper of my countrymen and their tenaciousness of money, it will be more easy to raise ships to fight these pirates into reason than money to bribe them.—To EZRA STILES. ii, 78. (P., 1786.)

770. ——. The motives pleading for war rather than tribute [to the piratical States] are numerous and honorable; those opposing them are mean and short-sighted.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 32. (P., 1785.)

— BARBARY STATES, War with Tripoli.—See TRIPOLI.

771. BARBARY STATES, Weakness of.—These pirates are contemptibly weak. Morocco, who has just dared to commit an outrage on us, owns only four or five frigates of 18 or 20 guns. There is not a port in their country which has more than 13 feet of water. Tunis is not quite so strong (having three or four frigates only, small and worthless); is more mercantile than predatory, and would easily be led to treat either by money or fear. Tripoli has one frigate only. Algiers alone possesses any power, and they are brave. As far as I have been able to discover, she possesses about sixteen vessels, from 22 up to 52 guns; but the vessels of all these powers are wretched in the last degree, being mostly built of the discordant pieces of other vessels which they take and pull asunder; their cordage and sails are of the same kind, taken from vessels of different sizes and powers, seldom any two guns of the same bore and all of them light.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 31. (P., 1785.) See MOROCCO, TRIPOLI and TUNIS.

772. BARCLAY (Thomas), Missions to Morocco.—Though we are not authorized to delegate to Mr. Barclay the power of ultimately signing the treaty, yet such is our reliance on his wisdom, his integrity, and his attention to the instructions with which he is charged, that we assure his Majesty, the conditions which he shall arrange and send to us, shall be returned with our signature.*—To THE EMPEROR OF MOROCCO. i, 419. (P., 1785.)

773. ——. Mr. Barclay's mission has been attended with complete success. For this we are indebted, unquestionably, to the influence and good offices of the court of Madrid.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 85. (P., 1786.)

774. ——. You have my full and hearty approbation of the treaty you obtained from Morocco, which is better and on better terms than I expected.—To THOMAS BARCLAY. ii, 125. (P., 1787.)

775. ——. You are appointed by the President * * * to go to the court of Morocco, for the purpose of obtaining from the new Emperor, a recognition of our treaty with his father. As it is thought best that you should go in some definite character, that of consul has been adopted.—To THOMAS BARCLAY. iii, 261. (P., 1791.)

776. ——. As you have acted since my arrival in France, in the characters of Consul General for that country, and Minister to the Court of Morocco, and also as agent in some particular transactions for the State of Virginia, I think it is a duty to yourself, to truth, and to justice, on your departure for America, to declare that in all these characters, as far as has come within my notice, you have acted with judgment, with attention, with integrity and honor.*—To THOMAS BARCLAY. ii, 211. (P., 1787.)

777. BARLOW (Joel), Proposed History by.—Mr. Madison and myself have cut out a piece of work for you, which is to write the history of the United States, from the close of the war downwards. We are rich ourselves in materials, and can open all the public archives to you; but your residence here [Washington] is essential, because a great deal of the knowledge of things is not on paper, but only within ourselves, for verbal communication. John Marshall is writing the life of General Washington from his papers. It is intended to come out just in time to influence the next Presidential election. It is written, therefore, principally with a view to electioneering purposes. But it will consequently be out in time to aid you with information, as well as to point out the perversions of truth necessary to be rectified.—To JOEL BARLOW. iv, 438. FORD ED., viii, 151. (W., May 1802.)

778. — — — You owe to republicanism, and indeed to the future hopes of man, a faithful record of the march of this government, which may encourage the oppressed to go and do likewise. Your talents, your principles, and your means of access to public and private sources of information, with the leisure which is at your command, point you out as the person who is to do this act of justice to those who believe in the improbability of the condition of man, and who have acted on that behalf, in opposition to those who consider man as a beast of burthen made to be ridden by him who has genius enough to get a bridle into his mouth.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 496. FORD ED., ix, 269. (M., 1810.)

779. — — — I felicitate you on your destination to Paris [as minister]. * * * Yet it is not unmixed with regret. What is to become of our post-revolutionary history? Of the antidotes of truth to the misrepresentations of Marshall? This example proves the wisdom of the maxim, never put off till to-morrow what can be done to-day.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 587. FORD ED., ix, 322. (M., April 1811.)

780. BARLOW (Joel), Works of.—I thank you for your "Conspiracy of Kings" and advice to the privileged orders. Be assured that your endeavors to bring the trans-Atlantic world into the road of reason, are not without their effect in America. Some here are disposed to move retrograde, and to take their stand in the rear of Europe, now advancing to the high ground of natural right.—To JOEL BARLOW. iii, 451. FORD ED., vi, 88. (P., 1792.)

781. — — — Thomas Jefferson returns thanks to Mr. Barlow for the copy of the "Columbiad" he has been so kind as to send him; the eye discovers at once the excellence of the mechanical execution of the work, and he is persuaded that the mental part will be found to have merited it. He will not do it the injustice of giving it such a reading as his situation here [Washington] would admit,

* Mr. Barclay, while acting for the United States in Europe, was engaged in commercial transactions on his own account. His arrest for debt by credit, led to some discussion with the French government, which is embodied in Jefferson's Writings. TOR.

of a few minutes at a time, and at intervals of many days. He will reserve it for that retirement after which he is panting, and not now very distant, where he may enjoy it in full concert with its kindred scenes, amidst those rural delights which join in chorus with the poet, and give to his song all its magic effect.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 238. (W., 1808.)

782. BASTILE, Fall of the.—The mob, now openly joined by the French guards, forced the prison of St. Lazare, released all the prisoners, and took a great store of corn, which they carried to the corn market. Here they got some arms, and the French guards began to form and train them. The committee determined to raise forty-eight thousand Bourgeois, or rather to restrain their numbers to forty-eight thousand. On the 14th [July], they sent one of their members (Monsieur de Corny, whom we knew in America) to the Hotel des Invalides, to ask arms for their Garde Bourgeoise. He was followed by, or he found there, a great mob. The Governor of the Invalides came out, and represented the impossibility of delivering his arms, without the orders of those from whom he received them. De Corny advised the people then to retire, and retired himself; and the people took possession of the arms. It was remarkable, that not only the Invalides themselves made no opposition, but that a body of five thousand foreign troops, encamped within four hundred yards, never stirred. Monsieur de Corny and five others were then sent to ask arms of Monsieur de Launey, Governor of the Bastille. They found a great collection of people already before the place, and they immediately planted a flag of truce, which was answered by a like flag hoisted on the parapet. The deputation prevailed on the people to fall back a little, advanced themselves to make their demand of the Governor, and in that instant a discharge from the Bastille killed four of those nearest to the deputies. The deputies retired; the people rushed against the place, and almost in an instant were in possession of a fortification, defended by one hundred men, of infinite strength, which in other times had stood several regular sieges, and had never been taken. How they got in, has, as yet, been impossible to discover. Those who pretend to have been of the party tell so many different stories, as to destroy the credit of them all. They took all the arms, discharged the prisoners, and such of the garrison as were not killed in the first moment of fury; carried the Governor and Lieutenant Governor to the Grève (the place of public execution), cut off their heads, and sent them through the city in triumph to the Palais Royal.—To JOHN JAY. iii, 76. (P., July 1789.)

783. BASTROP'S CASE, Account of.—I find Bastrop's case less difficult than I had expected. My view of it is this: The Governor of Louisiana being desirous of introducing the culture of wheat into that province, engages Bastrop as an agent for carrying that object into effect. He agrees to lay off twelve leagues square on the Washita and Bayou liard as a settlement for the culture of wheat, to which Bastrop is to bring five hundred families, each of which families is to have four hundred arpens of the land; the residue of the twelve leagues square, we may understand, was to be Bastrop's premium. The government was to bear the expense of bringing these emigrants from New Madrid, and was to allow them rations for six months,—Bastrop undertaking to provide the rations, and the government paying a seal and a half for each. Bastrop binds himself to settle the five hundred families in three years, and the Governor especially declares that if within that time the major part of the establishment shall not have been made good, the twelve leagues square, destined for Bastrop's settlers, shall be occupied by the families first presenting themselves for that purpose. Bastrop brings on some settlers,—how many does not appear, and the intendant, from a want of funds, suspends further proceeding in the settlement until the King's decision. (His decision of what? Doubtless whether the settlement shall proceed on these terms, and the funds be furnished by the King? or shall be abandoned?) He promises Bastrop, at the same time, that the former limitation of three years shall be extended to two years, after the course of the contract shall have again commenced to be executed, and the determination of the King shall be made known to Bastrop. Here, then, is a complete suspension of the undertaking until the King's decision, and his silence from that time till, and when, he ceded the province, must be considered as an abandonment of the project. There are several circumstances in this case offering ground for question, whether Bastrop is entitled to any surplus of the lands. But this will be an investigation for the Attorney General. But the uttermost he can claim is a surplus proportioned to the number of families to be settled, that is to say, a quota of land bearing such a proportion to the number of families he settled (deducting four hundred arpens for each of them) as one hundred and forty-four square leagues bear to the whole number of five hundred families. The important fact, therefore, to be settled, is the number of families he established there before the suspension.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 231. (Jan. 1808.)

784. BATTURE, Authority over.—Mr. Livingston, * * * finding that we considered the Batture as now resting with Congress,* and that it is our duty to keep it clear of all adversary possession till their decision is obtained [has written] a letter to the Secretary of State, which, if we understand it, amounts to a declaration that he will * * * bring the authority of the court into array against that of the Executive, and endeavor to obtain a forcible possession. But I presume that the court knows too well that the title of the United States to land is subject to the jurisdiction of no court, it having never been deemed safe to submit the major interests of the nation to an ordinary tribunal, or to any one but such as the Legislature establishes for the special occasion; and the marshal will find his duty too plainly marked out in the act of March 3, 1807, to be at a loss to determine what authority he is to obey.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 319. (W., July 1808.)

785. BATTURE, Jefferson's action in.—The interposition noticed by the Legislature of Orleans was an act of duty of the office I then occupied. Charged with the care of the general interests of the nation, and among these with the preservation of their lands from intrusion, I exercised, on their behalf, a right given by nature to all men, individual or associated, that of rescuing their own property wrongfully taken. In cases of forcible entry on individual possessions, special provisions, both of the common and civil law, have restrained the right of rescue by private force, and substituted the aid of the civil power. But no law has restrained the right of the nation itself from removing by its own arm, intruders on its possessions. On the contrary, a statute recently passed, had required that such removals should be diligently made. The Batture of New Orleans, being a part of the bed contained between the two banks of the river, a naked shoal indeed at low water, but covered through the whole season of its regular full tides, and then forming the ground of the port and harbor for the upper navigation, over which vessels ride of necessity when moored to the bank, I deemed it public property, in which all had a common use. The removal, too, of the force which had possessed itself of it, was the more urgent from the interruption it might give to the commerce, and other lawful uses, of the inhabitants of the city and of the Western waters generally.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 518. (M., 1810.)

786. BATTURE, Livingston's suit.—Livingston has served a writ on me, stating damages at $100,000.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 275. (M., 1810.)

787. BATTURE, Marshall's bias and.—In speaking of Livingston's suit, I omitted to observe that it is a little doubted that his knowledge of Marshall's character has induced him to bring this action. His twistifications in the case of Marbury, in that of Burr, and the Yazoo case show how dexterously he can reconcile law to his own personal biases; and nobody seems to doubt that he is ready prepared to decide that Livingston's right to the batture is unquestionable, and that I am bound to pay for it with my private fortune.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 276. (M., 1810.)

788. — — — What the issue of the case ought to be, no unbiased man can doubt. What it will be, no one can tell. The judge's [Marshall's] inveteracy is profound, and his mind of that gloomy malignity which will never let him forego the opportunity of satiating it on a victim. His decisions, his instructions to a jury, his allowances and disallowances and garblings of evidence, must all be subjects of appeal. I consider that as my only chance of saving my fortune from entire wreck. And to whom is my appeal? From the judge in Burr's case to himself and his associate judges in the case of Marbury v. Madison. Not exactly, however. I observe old Cushing is dead. At length, then, we have a chance of getting a republican majority in the Supreme judiciary.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., ix, 284. (M., Sep. 1810.)

789. BATTURE, Title to.—I have no concern at all in maintaining the title to the batture. It would be totally unnecessary for me to employ counsel to go into the question at all for my own defence. That is solidly built on the simple fact, that if I were in error, it was honest, and not imputable to that gross and palpable corruption or injustice which makes a public magistrate responsible to a private party.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 537. (M., 1810.)

labyrinth without a clew, no error has been committed [in the Batture case].—BATTURE CASE. viii, 604. (1812.)

791. BAYARD (James A.), Aaron Burr and.—Edward Livingston tells me that Bayard applied to-day or last night to General Samuel Smith, and represented to him the expediency of his coming over to the States who vote for Burr [for President], that there was nothing in the way of appointment which he might not command, and particularly mentioned the Secretaryship of the Navy. Smith asked him if he was authorized to make the offer. He said he was authorized. Smith told this to Livingston, and to W. C. Nicholas who confirms it to me. Bayard, in like manner, tempted Livingston, not by offering any particular office, but by representing to him his (Livingston's) intimacy and connection with Burr; that from him he had everything to expect, if he would come over to him. To Doctor Linn of New Jersey, they have offered the government of New Jersey.—THE ANAS. ix, 202. FORD ED., i, 291. (Feb. 1808.) See ELECTIONS, PRESIDENTIAL, 1800.

792. BEAUMARCHAIS (M.), Claim of.—I hear that Mr. Beaumarchais means to make himself heard, if the memorial which he sends by an agent in the present packet is not attended to as he thinks it ought to be. He called on me with it and desired me to recommend his case to a decision, and to note in my dispatch that it was the first time he had spoken to me on the subject. This is true, it being the first time I ever saw him; but my recommendations would be as displaced as unnecessary. I assured him Congress would do in that business what justice should require, and their means enabled them.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 232. (P., 1787.)

793. ———. A final decision of some sort should be made on Beaumarchais's affairs.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 209. FORD ED., iv, 423. (P., 1787.)

794. BEE, The Honey.—The honey-bee is not a native of our continent. Marcgrove, indeed, mentions a species of honey-bee in Brazil. But this has no sting, and is therefore different from the one we have, which resembles perfectly that of Europe. The Indians concur with us in the tradition that it was brought from Europe; but when, and by whom, we know not. The bees have generally extended themselves into the country, a little in advance of the white settlers. The Indians, therefore, call them the white man's fly, and consider their approach as indicating the approach of the settlements of the whites.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 319. FORD ED., iii, 175. (1782.)

795. ———. How far northwardly have these insects been found? That they are unknown in Lapland. I infer from Schaffer's information, that the Laplanders eat the pine bark, prepared in a certain way, instead of those things sweetened with sugar. * * * Certainly if they had honey, it would be a better substitute for sugar than any preparation of the pine bark. Kalm tells us the honey-bee cannot live through the winter in Canada. They furnish then an additional remarkable fact, first observed by the Count de Buffon, and which has thrown such a blaze of light on the field of natural history, that no animals are found in both continents, but those which are able to bear the cold of those regions where they probably join.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 320. FORD ED., iii, 176. (1782.)

796. BEER vs. WHISKY.—There is before the Assembly [of Virginia] a petition of a Captain Miller, which I have at heart, because I have great esteem for the petitioner as an honest and useful man. He is about to settle in our country, and to establish a brewery, in which art I think him as skilful a man as has ever come to America. I wish to see this beverage become common instead of the whisky which kills one-third of our citizens, and ruins their families. He is staying with me until he can fix himself, and I should be thankful for information from time to time of the progress of his petition.—To CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 515. FORD ED., x, 2. (M., 1815.)

797. BELLIGERENTS, Code of Rules for.—First. The original arming and equipping of vessels in the ports of the United States by any of the belligerent powers for military service, offensive or defensive, is deemed unlawful. Second. Equipment of merchant vessels by either of the belligerent parties in the ports of the United States, purely for the accommodation of them as such, is deemed lawful. Third. Equipments in the ports of the United States of vessels of war in the immediate service of the government of any of the belligerent parties, which, if done to other vessels, would be of a doubtful nature, as being applicable either to commerce or war, are deemed lawful, except those which shall have made prize of the subjects, people or property of France, coming with their prizes into the ports of the United States, pursuant to the seventeenth article of our treaty of amity and commerce with France. Fourth. Equipments in the ports of the United States by any of the parties at war with France, of vessels fitted for merchandise and war, whether with or without commissions, which are doubtful in their nature, as being applicable either to commerce or war, are deemed lawful, except those which shall have made prize, &c. Fifth. Equipments of any of the vessels of France in the ports of the United States, which are doubtful in their nature, as being applicable to commerce or war, are deemed lawful. Sixth. Equipments of every kind in the ports of the United States of privateers of the powers at war with France, are deemed unlawful. Seventh. Equipments of vessels in the ports of the United States which are of a nature solely adapted to war, are deemed unlawful; except those stranded or wrecked, as mentioned in the eighteenth article of our treaty with France, the sixteenth of our treaty with the United Netherlands, the ninth of our treaty with Prussia, and except those mentioned in the nineteenth article of our treaty with France, the seventeenth of our treaty with the United Netherlands, the eighteenth of our treaty with Prussia. Eighth. Vessels of either of the parties not armed, or armed previous to their coming into the ports of the United States, which shall not have infringed any of the foregoing rules may lawfully engage or enlist therein their own subjects, or aliens not being inhabitants of the United States, except privateers of the powers at war with France, and except those vessels which shall have made prize, &c. The foregoing rules, having been considered by us [the Cabinet] at several meetings, and being now unanimously approved, they are submitted to the President of the United States.—CABINET DECISION. ix, 440. FORD ED., vi, 358. (Aug. 3, 1793.)

798. BELLIGERENTS, History of Rules.—At a cabinet meeting on account of the British letter-of-marque ship Jane, said to have put up waste boards, to have pierced two port-holes, and mounted two cannon (which she brought in) on new carriages which she did not bring in, and consequently having sixteen, instead of fourteen, guns mounted, it was agreed that a letter-of-marque, or vessel armé en guerre, and en marchandise, is not a privateer, and, therefore, not to be ordered out of our ports. It was agreed by Hamilton, Knox, and myself, that the case of such a vessel does not depend on the treaties, but on the law of nations. Edmund Randolph thought, as she had a mixed character of merchant vessel and privateer, she might be considered under the treaty; but this being overruled, the following paper was written: Rules proposed by Attorney General: 1. That all equipments purely for the accommodation of vessels, as merchantmen, be admitted. (Agreed.) 2d. That all equipments, doubtful in their nature, and applicable equally to commerce or war, be admitted, as producing too many minutiae. (Agreed.) 3. That all equipments, solely adapted to military objects, be prohibited. (Agreed.) Rules proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury: 1st. That the original arming and equipping of vessels for military service, offensive or defensive, in the ports of the United States, be considered as prohibited to all. (Agreed.) 2d. That vessels which were armed before their coming into our ports, shall not be permitted to augment these equipments in the ports of the United States, but may repair or replace any military equipments which they had when they began their voyage for the United States; that this, however, shall be with the exception of privateers of the parties opposed to France, who shall not fit or repair (Negatived, the Secretary of the Treasury only holding this opinion). 3d. That for convenience, vessels armed and commissioned before they come into our ports, may engage their own citizens, not being inhabitants of the United States. (Agreed.) I subjoined the following: I concur in the rules proposed by the Attorney-General, as far as respects materials or means of annoyance furnished by us; and I should be for an additional rule, that as to means or materials brought into this country, and belonging to themselves, they are free to use them.—THE ANAS. ix, 161. FORD ED., i, 250. (July 1793.)

799. BELLIGERENTS, Policy toward.—Far from a disposition to avail ourselves of the peculiar situation of any belligerent nation to ask concessions incompatible with their rights, with justice, or reciprocity, we have never proposed to any the sacrifice of a single right: and in consideration of existing circumstances, we have ever been willing, where our duty to other nations permitted us, to relax for a time, and in some cases, that strictness of right which the laws of nature, the acknowledgments of the civilized world, and the equality and independence of nations entitle us to.—R. To A. ORLEANS LEGISLATURE. viii, 129. (June 1808.)

800. BELLIGERENTS, Recruiting by.—May an armed vessel, arriving here, be prohibited to employ their own citizens found here, as seamen or mariners? They cannot be prohibited to recruit their own citizens.—THE ANAS. ix, 158. FORD ED., i, 242. (1793.)

801. BELLIGERENTS, Sale of Arms to.—Our citizens have been always free to make, vend and export arms. It is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings, the only means perhaps of their subsistence, because a war exists in foreign and distant countries, in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle, and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace, does not require from them such an internal derangement in their occupations. It is satisfied with the external penalty pronounced in the President's proclamation, that of confiscation of such portion of these arms as shall fall into the hands of any of the belligerent powers on their way to the ports of their enemies. To this penalty our citizens are warned that they will be abandoned; and that even private contraventions may work no inequality between the parties at war, the benefits of them will be left equally free and open to all.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 558. FORD ED., vi, 253. (May 1793.)

802. BELLIGERENTS, Sale of Ships to.—The United States, being a ship-building nation, may they sell ships, prepared for war, to both parties? They may sell such ships in their ports to both parties, or carry them for sale to the dominions of both parties.—ANAS. ix, 158. FORD ED., i, 242. (1793.)

803. BELLIGERENTS, Transit Privileges.—It is well enough agreed, in the law of nations, that for a neutral power to give or refuse permission to the troops of either belligerent party to pass through their territory, is no breach of neutrality, provided the same refusal or permission be extended to the other party.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 500. (Aug. 1790.) See NEUTRALITY.

804. BENEFICENCE, Humanity and.—I believe * * * that every human mind feels pleasure in doing good to another.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 39. (M., 1816.)

805. BERLIN DECREES, Piratical Meaning of.—These decrees and orders [of council], taken together, want little of amounting to a declaration that every neutral vessel found on the high seas, whatsoever be her cargo, and whatsoever foreign port be that of her departure or destination, shall be deemed lawful prize; and they prove, more and more, the expediency of retaining our vessels, our seamen, and property, within our own harbors, until the dangers to which they are exposed can be removed or lessened.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 100. FORD ED., ix, 185. (March 17 1808.) See EMBARGO.

806. BIBLE, Circulation of the.—I had not supposed there was a family in this State [Virginia] not possessing a Bible, and wishing without having the means to procure one. When, in earlier life, I was intimate with every class, I think I never was in a house where that was the case. However, circumstances may have changed, and the [Bible] Society, I presume, have evidence of the fact. I, therefore, enclose you cheerfully, an order * * * for fifty dollars, for the purposes of the Society.—To SAMUEL GREENHOW. vi, 308. (M., 1814.)

807. BIBLE, Morality in the.—There never was a more pure and sublime system of morality delivered to man than is to be found in the four Evangelists.—To SAMUEL GREENHOW. vi, 309. (M., 1814.)

808. BIBLE, Protestants and the.—As to tradition, if we are Protestants we reject all tradition, and rely on the Scripture alone, for that is the essence and common principle of all the Protestant churches.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED., ii, 96. (1776?)

809. BIBLE, Translation of the.—I propose [after retirement], among my first employments, to give to the Septuagint an attentive perusal.*—To CHARLES THOMSON. v, 403. FORD ED., ii, 234. (W., 1808.)

810. BIGOTRY, A Disease.—Bigotry is the disease of ignorance, of morbid minds; enthusiasm of the free and buoyant. Education and free discussion are the antidotes of both.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 27. (M., 1816.)

811. BIGOTRY, Political and Religious.—What an effort of bigotry in politics and religion have we gone through! The barbarians really flattered themselves they should be able to bring back the times of Vandalism, when ignorance put everything into the hands of power and priestcraft. All advances in science were proscribed as innovations. They pretended to praise and encourage education, but it was to be the education of our ancestors. We were to look backwards, not forwards for improvement; the President himself [John Adams] declaring * * * that we were never to expect to go beyond them in real science.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 373. FORD ED., viii, 21. (W., March 1801.)

812. BIGOTRY, Self-government and.—Ignorance and bigotry, like other insanities, are incapable of self-government.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 67. FORD ED., x, 84. (M., 1817.)

813. BIGOTRIES, Union of.—All bigotries hang to one another.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 305. (M., 1814.)

814. BILL OF RIGHTS, An American Idea.—The enlightened part of Europe have given us the greatest credit for inventing this instrument of security for the rights of the people, and have been not a little surprised to see us so soon give it up [not having incorporated one in the new Constitution].—To F. HOPKINSON. ii, 586. FORD ED., v, 77. (P., March 1789.)

815. BILL OF RIGHTS, The Constitution and.—I do not like [in the Federal Constitution] first, the omission of a bill of rights, providing clearly and without the aid of sophisms for freedom of religion, freedom of the press, protection against standing armies, restriction against monopolies, the eternal and unremitting force of the habeas corpus laws, and trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land, and not by the law of nations. To say, as Mr. Wilson does, that a bill of rights was not necessary, because all is reserved in the case of the General Government which is not given, while in the particular ones, all is given which is not reserved, might do for the audience to whom it was addressed; but it is surely a gratis dictum, opposed by strong inferences from the body of the instrument, as well as from the omission of the clause of our present confederation, which had declared that in express terms. It was a hard conclusion to say, because there has been no uniformity among the States as to the cases triable by jury, because some have been so incautious as to abandon this mode of trial, therefore the more prudent States shall be reduced to the same level of calamity. It would have been much more just and wise to have concluded the other way, that as most of the States had judiciously preserved this palladium, those who had wandered should be brought back to it, and to have established general right instead of general wrong.* Let me add that a bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular; and what no just government should refuse or rest on inferences.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 329. FORD ED., iv, 476. (P., Dec. 1787.)

816. ———. I am in hopes that the annexation of a bill of rights to the Constitution will alone draw over so great a proportion of the minorities, as to leave little danger in the opposition of the residue; and that this annexation may be made by Congress and the Assemblies, without calling a convention which might endanger the most valuable parts of the system.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 56. (P., Dec. 1788.)

* The Congress edition contains the following passage: "For I consider all the ill as established, which may be established. I have a right to nothing, which another has a right to take away; and Congress will have a right to take away trials by jury in all civil cases."—EDITOR.

817. BILL OF RIGHTS, Demand for.—

I sincerely rejoice at the acceptance of our new Constitution by nine States. It is a good canvas on which some strokes only want retouching. What these are, I think are sufficiently manifested by the general voice from north to south, which calls for a bill of rights. It seems pretty generally understood that this should go to juries, habeas corpus, standing armies, printing, religion, and monopolies. I conceive there may be difficulty in finding general modifications of these, suited to the habits of all the States. But if such cannot be found, then it is better to establish trials by jury, the right of habeas corpus, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion, in all cases, and to abolish standing armies in time of peace, and monopolies in all cases, than not to do it in any. The few cases wherein these things may do evil, cannot be weighed against the multitude wherein the want of them will do evil. In disputes between a foreigner and a native, a trial by jury may be improper. But if this exception cannot be agreed to, the remedy will be to model the jury by giving the mediatas lingua in civil as well as criminal cases. Why suspend the habeas corpus in insurrections and rebellions? The parties who may be arrested, may be charged instantly with a well-defined crime; of course, the judge will remand them. If the public safety requires that the government should have a man imprisoned on less probable testimony in this than in other emergencies, let him be taken and tried, and retaken and retried, while the necessity continues, only giving them redress against the government, for damages. Examine the history of England. See how few of the cases of the suspension of the habeas corpus law have been worthy of that suspension. They have been either real treason, wherein the parties might as well have been charged at once, or sham plots, where it was shameful they should ever have been suspected. Yet for the few cases wherein the suspension of the habeas corpus has done real good, that operation is now become habitual, and the mass of the nation almost prepared to live under its constant suspension. A declaration, that the Federal government will never restrain the presses from printing anything they please, will not take away the liability of the printers for false facts printed. The declaration, that religious faith shall be unpunished, does not give impunity to criminal acts, dictated by religious error. The saying there shall be no monopolies, lessens the incitements to ingenuity, which is spurred on by the hope of a monopoly for a limited time, as of fourteen years; but the benefit of even limited monopolies is too doubtful to be opposed to that of their general suppression. If no check can be found to keep the number of standing troops within safe bounds, while they are tolerated as far as necessary, abandon them altogether: discipline well the militia, and guard the magazines with them. More than magazine guards will be useless if few, and dangerous if many. No European nation can ever send against us such a regular army as we need fear; and it is hard if our militia are not equal to those of Canada or Florida. My idea then, is that though proper exceptions to these general rules are desirable, and probably practicable, yet if the exceptions cannot be agreed on, the establishment of the rules in all cases will do ill in very few. I hope, therefore, a bill of rights will be formed, to guard the people against the Federal Government, as they are already guarded against their State governments in most instances.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 445. FORD ED., v, 45. (P., July 1788.)

818. BILL OF RIGHTS, Fetters against Evil.—By a declaration of rights I mean one which shall stipulate freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of commerce against monopolies, trial by juries in all cases, no suspensions of the habeas corpus, no standing armies. These are fetters against doing evil which no honest government should decline.—To A. DONALD. ii, 355. (P., Feb. 1788.)

819. BILL OF RIGHTS, A Guard to Liberty.—I disapproved from the first moment [in the new Constitution] the want of a bill of rights, to guard liberty against the legislative as well as the executive branches of the government; that is to say, to secure freedom in religion, freedom of the press, freedom from monopolies, freedom from unlawful imprisonment, freedom from a permanent military, and a trial by jury, in all cases determinable by the laws of the land.—To F. HOPKINSON. ii, 586. FORD ED., v, 76. (P., March 1789.)

820. BILL OF RIGHTS, An Insufficient.—I like the declaration of rights as far as it goes, but I should have been for going further. For instance, the following alterations and additions would have pleased me. "Article IV. The people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, to write, or otherwise to publish anything but false facts affecting injuriously the life, liberty, or reputation of others, or affecting the peace of the Confederacy with foreign nations. Article VII. All facts put in issue before any judicature shall be tried by jury except, 1, in cases of admiralty jurisdiction wherein a foreigner shall be interested; 2, in cases cognizable before a court martial, concerning only the regular officers and soldiers of the United States, or members of the militia in actual service in time of war or insurrection; and, 3, in impeachments allowed by the Constitution. Article VIII. No person shall be held in confinement more than — days after he shall have demanded and been refused a writ of habeas corpus by the judge appointed by law, nor more than — days after such a writ shall have been served on the person holding him in confinement, and no order given on due examination for his remandment or discharge, nor more than — hours in any place of a greater distance than — miles from the usual residence of some judge authorized to issue the writ of habeas corpus: nor shall that writ be suspended for any term exceeding one year, nor in any place more than — miles distant from the station or encampment of enemies, or of insurgents. Article IX. Monopolies may be allowed to persons for their own productions in literature, and their own inventions in the arts, for a term not exceeding — years, but for no longer term, and for no other purpose. Article X. All troops of the United States shall stand ipso facto disbanded, at the expiration of the term for which their pay and subsistence shall have been last voted by Congress, and all officers and soldiers, not natives of the United States, shall be incapable of serving in their armies by land, except during a foreign war." These restrictions, I think, are so guarded as to hinder evil only. However, if we do not have them now, I have so much confidence in my countrymen, as to be satisfied that we shall have them as soon as the degeneracy of our government shall render them necessary.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 100. FORD ED., v, 112. (P., Aug. 1789.)

821. BILL OF RIGHTS, The Judiciary and.—In the arguments in favor of the declaration of rights, you omit one which has great weight with me: the legal check which it puts into the hands of the judiciary. This is a body which, if rendered independent and kept strictly to their own department, merits great confidence for their learning and integrity. In fact, what degree of confidence would be too much for a body composed of such men as Wythe, Blair and Pendleton? On characters like these, the "civium ardor prava jubentium" would make no impression. I am happy to find that, on the whole, you are a friend to this amendment. The declaration of rights is, like all other human blessings, alloyed with some inconveniences, and not accomplishing fully its object. But the good in this instance vastly outweighs the evil.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 3. FORD ED., v, 80. (P., March 1789.)

822. BILL OF RIGHTS, The People and.—A bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular; and what no just government should refuse, or rest on inferences.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 330. FORD ED., iv, 477. (P., Dec. 1787.)

823. BILL OF RIGHTS, Security in.—A general concurrence of opinion seems to authorize us to say the Constitution has some defects. I am one of those who think it a defect that the important rights, not placed in security by the frame of the Constitution itself, were not explicitly secured by a supplementary declaration. There are rights which it is useless to surrender to the government, and which governments have yet always been found to invade. These are the rights of thinking, and publishing our thoughts by speaking or writing; the right of free commerce; the right of personal freedom. There are instruments for administering the government so particularly trustworthy, that we should never leave the legislature at liberty to change them. The new Constitution has secured these in the Executive and Legislative departments: but not in the Judiciary. It should have established trials by the people themselves, that is to say, by jury. There are instruments so dangerous to the rights of the nation, and which place them so totally at the mercy of their governors, that those governors, whether legislative or executive, should be restrained from keeping such instruments on foot, but in well defined cases. Such an instrument is a standing army. We are now allowed to say such a declaration of rights, as a supplement to the Constitution where that is silent, is wanting, to secure us in these points. The general voice has legitimated this objection.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 12. FORD ED., v, 89. (P., March 1789.)

824. — I am one of those who think it a defect [in the new Constitution], that the important rights, not placed in security by the frame of the Constitution itself, were not explicitly secured by a supplementary declaration [of rights].—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 12. FORD ED., v, 89. (P., March 1789.)

825. BILL OF RIGHTS, Where Necessary.—I cannot refrain from making short answers to the objections which your letter states to have been raised. 1. That the rights in question are reserved by the manner in which the Federal powers are granted. Answer. A constitutive act may, certainly, be so formed as to need no declaration of rights. The act itself has the force of a declaration as far as it goes; and if it goes to all material points, nothing more is wanting. In the draft of a Constitution which I had once a thought of proposing in Virginia, I endeavored to reach all the great objects of public liberty, and did not mean to add a declaration of rights. Probably the object was imperfectly executed; but the deficiencies would have been supplied by others, in the course of discussion. But in a constitutive act which leaves some precious articles unnoticed, and raises implications against others, a declaration of rights becomes necessary by way of supplement. This is the case of our new Federal Constitution. This instrument forms us into one State, as to certain objects, and gives us a legislative and executive body for these objects. It should, therefore, guard against their abuses of power within the field submitted to them. 2. A positive declaration of some essential rights could not be obtained in the requisite latitude. Answer. Half a loaf is better than no bread. If we cannot secure all our rights, let us secure what we can. 3. The limited powers of the Federal Government, and jealousy of the subordinate governments, afford a security which exists in no other instance. Answer. The first member of this seems resolvable into the first objection before stated. The jealousy of the subordinate governments is a precious reliance. But observe that these governments are only agents. They must have principles furnished them whereon to found their opposition. The declaration of rights will be the text, whereby they will try all the acts of the Federal Government. In this view, it is necessary to the Federal Government also, as by the same text, they may try the opposition of the subordinate governments. 4. Experience proves the inefficacy of a Bill of Rights. Answer. True. But though it is not absolutely efficacious under all circumstances, it is of great potency always and rarely inefficacious. A brace the more will often keep up the building which would have fallen with that brace the less. There is a remarkable difference between the characters of the inconveniences which attend a declaration of rights, and those which attend the want of it. The inconveniences of the declaration are that it may cramp government in its useful exertions. But the evil of this is short-lived, moderate and reparable. The inconveniences of the want of a declaration are permanent, afflicting and irreparable. They are in constant progression from bad to worse. The executive, in our governments, is not the sole, it is scarcely the principal, object of my jealousy. The tyranny of the legislatures is the most formidable dread at present, and will be for many years. That of the executive will come in its turn; but it will be at a remote period. I know there are some among us who would now establish a monarchy. But they are inconsiderable in number and weight of character. The rising race are all republicans. We were educated in royalism; no wonder if some of us retain that idolatry still. Our young people are educated in republicanism; an apostasy from that to royalism is unprecedented and impossible. I am much pleased with the prospect that a declaration of rights will be added; and I hope it will be done in that way which will not endanger the whole frame of government, or any essential part of it.—To JAMES MADISON. iii. 4. FORD ED., v. 81. (P., March 1789.)

826. BILL OF RIGHTS (French), Draft of.—1. The States General shall assemble, uncalled, on the first day of November. annually, and shall remain together so long as they shall see cause. They shall regulate their own elections and proceedings, and until they shall ordain otherwise, their elections shall be in the forms observed in the present year, and shall be triennial. 2. The States General alone shall levy money on the nation, and shall appropriate it. 3. Laws shall be made by the States General only, with the consent of the King. 4. No person shall be restrained of his liberty, but by regular process from a court of justice, authorized by a general law. (Except that a Noble may be imprisoned by order of a court of justice, on the prayer of twelve of his nearest relations.) On complaint of an unlawful imprisonment, to any judge whatever, he shall have the prisoner immediately brought before him, and shall discharge him, if his imprisonment be unlawful. The officer in whose custody the prisoner is, shall obey the orders of the judge; and both judge and officer shall be responsible, civilly and criminally, for a failure of duty herein. 5. The military shall be subordinate to the civil authority. 6. Printers shall be liable to legal prosecution for printing and publishing false facts, injurious to the party prosecuting; but they shall be under no other restraint. 7. All pecuniary privileges and exemptions, enjoyed by any description of persons, are abolished. 8. All debts already contracted by the King, are hereby made the debts of the nation; and the faith thereof is pledged for their payment in due time. 9. Eighty million of livres are now granted to the King, to be raised by loan, and reimbursed by the nation; and the taxes heretofore paid, shall continue to be paid to the end of the present year, and no longer. 10. The States General shall now separate, and meet again on the 1st day of November next. Done, on behalf of the whole nation, by the King and their representatives in the States General, at Versailles, this — day of June, 1789. Signed by the King, and by every member individually, and in his presence.*—FRENCH CHARTER OF RIGHTS. iii. 47. FORD ED., v. 101. (P., June 1789.)

827. BILL OF RIGHTS (French), History of.—After you [M. de St. Etienne] quitted us yesterday evening, we continued our conversation (Mons^r de Lafayette, Mr. Short and myself) on the subject of the difficulties which environ you. The desirable object being to secure the good which the King has offered and to avoid the ill which seems to threaten, an idea was suggested, which appearing to make an impression on Mons de Lafayette, I was encouraged to pursue it on my return to Paris, to put it into form, and now to send it to you and him. It is this, that the King, in a seance royale should come forward with a Charter of Rights in his hand, to be signed by himself, and by every member of the three orders. This Charter to contain the five great points which the Resultat of December offered on the part of the King, the abolition of pecuniary privileges offered by the privileged orders, and the adoption of the national debt, and a grant of the sum of money asked from the nation. This last will be a cheap price for the preceding articles, and let the same act declare your immediate separation till the next anniversary meeting. You will carry back to your constituents more good than ever was effected before without violence, and you will stop exactly at the point where violence would otherwise begin. Time will be gained, the public mind will continue to ripen and to be informed, a basis of support may be prepared with the people themselves, and expedients occur for gaining still something further at your next meeting, and for stopping again at the point of force. I have ventured to send to yourself and Monsieur de Lafayette a sketch of my ideas of what this act might contain without endangering any dispute. But it is offered merely as a canvas for you to work on, if it be fit to work on at all. I know too little of the subject, and you know too much of it to justify me in offering anything but a hint. I have done it too in a hurry; insomuch that since committing it to writing it occurs to me that the 5th article may give alarm, that it is in a good degree included in the 4th, and is, therefore, useless. But, after all, what excuse can I make, Sir, for this presumption? I have none but an unmeasurable love for your nation, and a painful anxiety lest despotism, after an unaccepted offer to bind its own hands, should seize you again with tenfold fury.—To M. DE ST. ETIENNE. FORD ED., v, 99. (P., June 1789) See RIGHTS.

— BIMETALISM.—See DOLLAR and MONEY.

828. BINGHAM (William), Character of.—Though Bingham is not in diplomatic office, yet as he wishes to be so, I will mention such circumstances of him, as you might otherwise be deceived in. He will make you believe he was on the most intimate footing with the first characters in Europe, and versed in the secrets of every cabinet. Not a word of this is true. He had a rage for being presented to great men, and had no modesty in the methods by which he could if he attained acquaintance.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 108. FORD ED., iv, 366. (P., 1787.)

829. BIRDS, Mocking-bird.—Teach all the children to venerate the mocking-bird as a superior being in the form of a bird, or as a being which will haunt them if any harm is done to itself or its eggs. I shall hope that the multiplication of the cedar in the neighborhood, and of the trees and shrubs round the house [Monticello] will attract more of them; for they like to be in the neighborhood of our habitations if they furnish cover.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. D. L. J., 221. (Pa., 1793.)

830. BIRDS, Nightingale.—I have heard the nightingale in all its perfection, and I do not hesitate to pronounce that in America it would be deemed a bird of the third rank only, our mocking-bird, and fox-colored thrush being unquestionably superior to it.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., iv, 63. (P., 1785.)

831. ———. I have been for a week past sailing on the canal of Languedoc, cloudless skies above, limpid waters below, and on each hand a row of nightingales in full chorus. This delightful bird had given me a rich treat before, at the fountain of Vaucluse. After visiting the tomb of Laura at Avignon, I went to see this fountain—a noble one of itself, and rendered famous forever by the songs of Petrarch, who lived near it. I arrived there somewhat fatigued, and sat down by the fountain to repose myself. It gushes, of the size of a river, from a secluded valley of the mountains, the ruins of Petrarch's chateau being perched on a rock two hundred feet perpendicular above. To add to the enchantment of the scene, every tree and bush was filled with nightingales in full song. I think you told me that you had not yet noticed this bird. As you have trees in the garden of the convent, there might be nightingales in them, and this is the season of their song. Endeavor to make yourself acquainted with the music of this bird, that when you return to your own country, you may be able to estimate its merit in comparison with that of the mocking-bird. The latter has the advantage of singing through a great part of the year, whereas the nightingale sings about five or six weeks in the spring, and a still shorter term, and with a more feeble voice, in the fall.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 388. (1787.)

832. BIRDS, Skylark.—There are two or three objects which you should endeavor to enrich our country with,—the skylark, the red-legged partridge. I despair too much of the nightingale to add that.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 21. (M., 1795.)

833. BIRDS, Turkey.—I suppose the opinion to be universal that the turkey is a native of America. Nobody, as far as I know, has ever contradicted it but Daines Barrington; and the arguments he produces are such as none but a head, entangled and kinked as his is, would ever have urged. Before the discovery of America, no such bird is mentioned in a single author, all those quoted by Barrington, by description referring to the crane, hen, pheasant, or peacock; but the book of every traveller, who came to America soon after its discovery, is full of accounts of the turkey and its abundance; and immediately after that discovery we find the turkey served up at the feasts of Europe, as their most extraordinary rarity.—To DR. HUGH WILLIAMSON. iv, 346. FORD ED., vii, 480. (W., Jan. 1801.)

834. BIRDS, The Crested Turkey.—I have taken measures to obtain the crested turkey, and will endeavor to perpetuate that beautiful and singular characteristic, and shall be not less earnest in endeavors to raise the Moronnier.—To M. CORREA. vii, 95. (P. F., 1817.)

835. BIRDS, The Turkey in Heraldry.—Mr. William Strickland, the eldest son of St. George Strickland, of York, in England, told me this anecdote: Some ancestor of his commanded a vessel in the navigations of Cabot. Having occasion to consult the Herald's office concerning his family, he found a petition from that ancestor to the Crown, stating that Cabot's circumstances being slender, he had been rewarded by the bounties, he needed from the Crown; that as to himself, he asked nothing in that way, but that as a consideration for his services in the same way, he might be permitted to assume for the crest of his family arms, the turkey, an American bird; and Mr. Strickland observed that their crest is actually a turkey.—To DR. HUGH WILLIAMSON. iv, 346. FORD ED., vii, 480. (W., Jan. 1801.)

836. BIRTH, Public Office and.—For promoting the public happiness, those persons, whom nature has endowed with genius and virtue, should be rendered by liberal education worthy to receive, and able to guard the sacred deposit of the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens; and they should be called to that charge without regard to * * * birth, or other accidental condition or circumstance.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. (1779.)

837. BIRTHDAY, Jefferson's.—Disapproving myself of transferring the honors and veneration for the great birthday of our Republic to any individual, or of dividing them with individuals, I have declined letting my own birthday be known, and have engaged my family not to communicate it. This has been the uniform answer to every application of the kind.—To LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 504. FORD ED., viii, 246. (M., Aug. 1803.)

838. ——. The only birthday which I recognize is that of my country's liberties.* —RAYNER'S LIFE OF JEFFERSON, p. 18.

839. BIRTHDAY, Celebration of Washington's.—A great ball is to be given here [Philadelphia] on the 22d, and in other great towns of the Union. This is, at least, very indelicate, and probably excites uneasy sensations in some. I see in it, however, this useful deduction, that the birthdays, which have been kept, have been, not those of the President, but of the General.—To JAMES MADISON, iv, 212. FORD ED., vii, 203. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

840. ——. The late birth-night has certainly sown tares among the exclusive federalists. It has winnowed the grain from the chaff. The sincerely Adamites did not go. The Washingtonians went religiously, and took the secession of the others in high dudgeon. The one sect threaten to desert the levees, the other the parties. The whigs went in number, to encourage the idea that the birth-nights hitherto kept had been for the General and not the President, and of course that time would bring an end to them.—To JAMES MADISON, iv, 218. FORD ED., vii, 211. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

841. BISHOP (Samuel), Appointment as Collector.—I have received the remonstrance you were pleased to address to me, on the appointment of Samuel Bishop to the office of Collector of New Haven, lately vacated by the death of Daniel Austin. The right of our fellow citizens to represent to the public functionaries their opinion on proceedings interesting to them, is unquestionably a constitutional right, often useful, sometimes necessary, and will always be respectfully acknowledged by me. Of the various executive duties, no one excites more anxious concern than that of placing the interests of our fellow citizens in the hands of honest men, with understandings sufficient for their stations. No duty, at the same time, is more difficult to fulfil. The knowledge of characters possessed by a single individual is, of necessity, limited. To seek out the best through the whole Union, we must resort to other information, which, from the best of men, acting disinterestedly and with the purest motives, is sometimes incorrect. In the case of Samuel Bishop, however, the subject of your remonstrance, time was taken, information was sought, and such obtained as could leave no room for doubt of his fitness. From private sources it was learned that his understanding was sound, his integrity pure, his character unstained. And the offices confided to him within his own State, are public evidences of the estimation in which he is held by the State in general, and the city and township particularly in which he lives. He is said to be the town clerk, a justice of the peace, mayor of the city of New Haven, an office held at the will of the legislature, chief judge of the court of common pleas for New Haven County, a court of high criminal and civil jurisdiction wherein most causes are decided without the right of appeal or review, and sole judge of the court of Probates, wherein he singly decides all questions of wills, settlement of estates, testate and intestate, appoints guardians, settles their accounts, and in fact has under his jurisdiction and care all the property, real and personal, of persons dying. The two last offices, in the annual gift of the legislature, were given to him in May last. Is it possible that the man to whom the legislature of Connecticut has so recently committed trusts of such difficulty and magnitude, is "unfit to be the collector of the district of New Haven," though acknowledged in the same writing, to have obtained all this confidence "by a long life of usefulness"? It is objected, indeed, in the remonstrance, that he is seventy-seven years of age; but at a much more advanced age, our Franklin was the ornament of human nature. He may not be able to perform in person all the details of his office; but if he gives us the benefit of his understanding, his integrity, his watchfulness and takes care that all the details are well performed by himself or his necessary assistants, all public purposes will be answered. The remonstrance, indeed, does not allege that the office has been illy conducted, but only apprehends that it will be so. Should this happen in event, be assured I will do in it what shall be just and necessary for the public service. In the meantime, he should be tried without being prejudged.—To THE NEW HAVEN COMMITTEE, iv, 402. FORD ED., viii, 67. (W., July 1801.)

842. BISHOP (Samuel), Goodrich's removal and.—The removal, as it is called, of Mr. [Elizur] Goodrich, promises another subject of complaint. Declarations by myself in favor of political tolerance, exhortations to harmony and affection in social intercourse, and to respect for the equal rights of the minority, have, on certain occasions, been quoted and misconstrued into assurances that the tenure of offices was to be undisturbed. But could candor apply such a construction? It is not, indeed, in the remonstrance that we find it; but it leads to the explanations which that calls for. When it is considered, that during the late administration, those who were not of a particular sect of politics were excluded from all office: when, by a steady pursuit of this measure, nearly the whole officers of the United States were monopolized by that sect; when the public sentiment at length declared itself, and burst open the doors of honor and confidence to those whose opinions they more approved, was it to be imagined that this monopoly of office was still to be continued in the hands of the minority? Does it violate their equal rights, to assert some rights in the majority also? Is it political intolerance to claim a proportionate share in the direction of the public affairs? Can they not harmonize in society unless they have everything in their own hands? If the of the nation, manifested by their var elections, calls for an administration of government according with the opinions of those elected; if, for the fulfilment of that will, displacements are necessary, with whom can they so justly begin as with persons appointed in the last moments of an administration, not for its own aid, but to begin a career at the same time with their successors, by whom they had never been approved, and who could scarcely expect from them a cordial coöperation? Mr. Goodrich was one of these. Was it proper for him to place himself in office, without knowing whether those whose agent he was to be would have confidence in his agency? Can the preference of another, as the successor to Mr. Austin, be candidly called a removal of Mr. Goodrich? If a due participation of office is a matter of right, how are vacancies to be obtained? Those by death are few; by resignation, none. Can any other mode than that of removal be proposed? This is a painful office; but it is made my duty, and I meet it as such. I proceed in the operation with deliberation and inquiry, that it may injure the best men least, and effect the purposes of justice and public utility with the least private distress; that it may be thrown, as much as possible, on delinquency, on oppression, on intolerance, on incompetence, on anterevolutionary adherence to our enemies. The remonstrance laments "that a change in the administration must produce a change in the subordinate officers," in other words, that it should be deemed necessary for all officers to think with their principal? But on whom does this imputation bear? On those who have excluded from office every shade of opinion which was not theirs? Or on those who have been so excluded? I lament sincerely that unessential differences of political opinion should ever have been deemed sufficient to interdict half the society from the rights and blessings of self-government, to proscribe them as characters unworthy of every trust. It would have been to me a circumstance of great relief, had I found a moderate participation of office in the hands of the majority. I would gladly have left to time and accident to raise them to their just share. But their total exclusion calls for prompter correctives. I shall correct the procedure; but that done, disdain to follow it, shall return with joy to that state of things, when the only questions concerning a candidate shall be: Is he honest? Is he capable? Is he faithful to the Constitution?—TO THE NEW HAVEN COMMITTEE. iv, 403. FORD ED., viii, 69. (W., July 1801.)

843. BISHOP (Samuel), New Haven Remonstrance and.—Mr. Goodrich's removal has produced a bitter remonstrance, with much personality against the two Bishops. I am sincerely sorry to see the inflexibility of the federal spirit there, for I cannot believe they are all monarchists.—TO LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 399. FORD ED., viii, 67. (W., July 1801.)

844. ——. Some occasion of public explanation was eagerly desired, when the

New Haven remonstrance offered us that occasion. The answer was meant as an explanation to our friends. It has had on them, everywhere, the most wholesome effect. Appearances of schismatizing from us have been entirely done away. I own I expected it would check the current with which the republican federalists were returning to their brethren, the republicans. I extremely lamented this effect; for the moment which should convince me that a healing of the nation into one is impracticable, would be the last moment of my wishing to remain where I am.—TO LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 406. FORD ED., viii, 84. (M., Aug. 1801.) See GOODRICH.

845. BLACKSTONE (Sir William), Commentaries.—The exclusion from the courts of the malign influence of all authorities after the Georgium Sidus became ascendant, would uncanonize Blackstone, whose book, although the most elegant and best digested of our law catalogue, has been perverted, more than all others, to the degeneracy of legal science. A student finds there a smattering of everything, and his indolence easily persuades him that if he understands that book, he is master of the whole body of the law. The distinction between these, and those who have drawn their stores from the deep and rich mines of Coke on Littleton, seems well understood even by the unlettered common people, who apply the appellation of Blackstone lawyers to these ephemeral insects of the law.—TO JUDGE TYLER. vi, 66. (M., 1812.)

846. BLACKSTONE (Sir William), Toryism of.—Blackstone and Hume have made tories of all England, and are making tories of those young Americans whose native feelings of independence do not place them above the wily sopistries of a Hume or a Blackstone. These two books, but especially the former, have done more towards the suppression of the liberties of man, than all the million of men in arms of Bonaparte, and the millions of human lives with the sacrifice of which he will stand loaded before the judgment seat of his Maker.—TO HORATIO G. SPAFFORD. vi, 335. (M., 1814.)

847. BLAND (Richard), Character of.—Colonel Richard Bland was the most learned and logical man of those who took prominent lead in public affairs, profound in constitutional lore, a most ungraceful speaker (as were Peyton Randolph and Robinson, in a remarkable degree.) He wrote the first pamphlet on the nature of the connection with Great Britain which had any pretension to accuracy of view on that subject, but it was a singular one. He would set out on sound principles, pursue them logically till he found them leading to the precipice which he had to leap, start back alarmed, then resume his ground, go over it in another direction, be led again by the correctness of his reasoning to the same place, and again back out, and try other processes to reconcile right and wrong, but finally left his reader and himself bewildered between the steady index of the compass in their hand, and the phantasm to which it seemed to point. Still there was more sound matter in his pamphlet than in the celebrated "Farmer's Letters," which were really but an ignis fatuus, misleading us from true principles.—To WILLIAM WIRT. vi, 485. FORD ED., ix, 474. (M., 1815.)

848. BLOCKADES, Law of.—When the fleet of any nation actually beleaguers the port of its enemy, no other has a right to enter their line any more than their line of battle in the open sea, or their lines of circumvallation, or of encampment, or of battle array on land. The space included within their lines in any of those cases, is either the property of their enemy, or it is common property, assumed and possessed for a moment, which cannot be intruded on, even by a neutral, without committing the very trespass we are now considering, that of intruding into the lawful possession of a friend.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 410. FORD ED., viii, 91. (M., 1801.)

849. BLOCKADES, Neutrals and.—When two nations go to war, it does not abridge the rights of neutral nations but in the two articles of blockade and contraband of war.—To BENJAMIN STODDERT. v, 425. FORD ED., ix, 245. (W., 1809.)

850. BLOCKADES, Seizure of Ships.—The instruction [to commanders of British war ships] which allows the armed vessels of Great Britain to seize, for condemnation, all vessels, on their first attempt to enter a blockaded port, except those of Denmark and Sweden, which are to be prevented only, but not seized, on their first attempt. Of the nations inhabiting the shores of the Atlantic ocean, and practising its navigation, Denmark, Sweden and the United States, alone are neutral. To declare, then, all neutral vessels (for as to the vessels of the belligerent powers no order was necessary) to be legal prize, which shall attempt to enter a blockaded port, except those of Denmark and Sweden, is exactly to declare that the vessels of the United States shall be lawful prize, and those of Denmark and Sweden shall not. It is of little consequence that the article has avoided naming the United States, since it has used a description applicable to them, and to them alone, while it exempts the others from its operation, by name. You will be pleased to ask an explanation of this distinction; and you will be able to say in discussing its justice, that in every circumstance, we treat Great Britain on the footing of the most favored nation, where our treaties do not preclude us, and that even these are just as favorable to her as hers are to us. Possibly she may be bound by treaty to admit this exception in favor of Denmark and Sweden, but she cannot be bound by treaty to withhold it from us; and if it be withheld merely because not established with us by treaty, what might not we, on the same ground, have withheld from Great Britain, during the short course of the present war, as well as the peace which has preceded it?—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 62. FORD ED., vi, 416. (Pa., Sept. 1793.)

851. ———. You express your apprehension that some of the belligerent powers may stop our vessels going with grain to the ports of their enemies, and ask instructions which may meet the question in various points of view, intending, however, in the meantime to contend for the amplest freedom of neutral nations. Your intention in this is perfectly proper, and coincides with the ideas of our own government in the particular case you put, as in general cases. Such a stoppage to an unblockaded port would be so unequivocal an infringement of the neutral rights, that we cannot conceive it will be attempted.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 551. FORD ED., vi, 242. (Pa., May 1793.)

852. BLOUNT (William), Impeachment of.—It is most evident, that the anti-republicans wish to get rid of Blount's impeachment. Many metaphysical niceties are handing about in conversation, to show that it cannot be sustained. To show the contrary, it is evident must be the task of the republicans, or of nobody.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 206. FORD ED., vii, 190. (Pa., Jan. 1798.) See IMPEACHMENT.

853. BOLINGBROKE, Writings of Lord.—Lord Bolingbroke and Thomas Paine were alike in making bitter enemies of the priests and pharisees of their day. Both were honest men; both advocates for human liberty. Paine wrote for a country which permitted him to push his reasoning to whatever length it would go. Lord Bolingbroke in one restrained by a constitution, and by public opinion. He was called indeed a tory; but his writings prove him a stronger advocate for liberty than any of his countrymen, the whigs of the present day. Irritated by his exile, he committed one act unworthy of him, in connecting himself momentarily with a prince rejected by his country. But he redeemed that single act by his establishment of the principles which proved it to be wrong. These two persons differed remarkably in the style of their writing, each leaving a model of what is most perfect in both extremes of the simple and sublime. No writer has exceeded Paine in ease and familiarity of style, in perspicuity of expression, happiness of elucidation, and in simple and unassuming language. In this he may be compared with Dr. Franklin; and indeed his Common Sense was, for awhile, believed to have been written by Dr. Franklin, and published under the borrowed name of Paine, who had come over with him from England. Lord Bolingbroke's, on the other hand, is a style of the highest order. The lofty, rhythmical, full-flowing eloquence of Cicero; periods of just measure, their members proportioned, their close full and round. His conceptions, too, are bold and strong, his diction copious, polished and commanding as his subject. His writings are certainly the finest samples in the English language of the eloquence proper for the senate. His political tracts are safe reading for the most timid religionist, his philosophical, for those who are not afraid to trust their reason with discussions of right and wrong.—To FRANCIS EPPES. vii, 197. FORD ED., x, 183. (M., 1821.)

854. BOLLMAN (Eric), Burr and.—I am sorry to tell you that Bollman was Burr's right hand man in all his guilty schemes. On being brought to prison here [Washington], he communicated to Mr. Madison and myself the whole of the plans, always, however, apologetically for Burr, as far as they would bear. But his subsequent tergiversations have proved him conspicuously base. I gave him a pardon, however, which covers him from everything but infamy. I was the more astonished at his engaging in this business, from the peculiar motives he should have felt for fidelity. When I came into the government, I sought him out on account of the services he had rendered you, cherished him, offered him two different appointments of value, which, after keeping them long under consideration, he declined for commercial views, and would have given him anything for which he was fit. Be assured he is unworthy of ever occupying again the care of any honest man.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. v, 130. FORD ED., ix, 114. (W., July 1807.)

855. BOLLMAN (Eric), Pardon of.—Dr. Bollman, on his arrival in Washington in custody in January, voluntarily offered to make communications to me, which he accordingly did, Mr. Madison also being present. I previously and subsequently assured him (without, however, his having requested it), that they should never be used against himself. Mr. Madison on the same evening committed to writing, by memory, what he had said; and I moreover asked of Bollman to do it himself, which he did, and I now enclose it to you. The object is, as he is to be a witness, that you may know how to examine him, and draw everything from him. I wish the paper to be seen and known only to yourself and the gentlemen who aid you, and to be returned to me. If he should prevaricate, I should be willing you should go so far as to ask him whether he did not say so and so to Mr. Madison and myself, in order to let him see that his prevarications will be marked. Mr. Madison will forward you a pardon for him, which we mean should be delivered previously. It is suspected by some he does not intend to appear. If he does not, I hope you will take effectual measures to have him immediately taken into custody. Some other blank pardons are sent on to be filled up at your discretion, if you should find a defect of evidence, and believe that this would supply it, * * * avoiding to give them to the gross offenders, unless it be visible that the principal will otherwise escape.—To GEORGE HAY. FORD ED., ix, 52. (W., May 1807.)

856. BONAPARTE (Jerome), Marriage of.—A report reaches us from Baltimore, * * * that Mr. Jerome Bonaparte, brother of the First Consul, is married to Miss Patterson, of that city. The effect of this measure on the mind of the First Consul, is not for me to suppose; but as it might occur to him, prima facie, that the Executive of the United States ought to have prevented it, I have thought it advisable to mention the subject to you, that, if necessary, you may by explanation set that idea to rights. You know that by our laws, all persons are free to enter into marriage, if of twenty-one years of age, no one having a power to restrain it, not even their parents; and that under that age, no one can prevent it but the parent or guardian. The lady is under age, and the parents, placed between her affections, which were strongly fixed, and the considerations opposing the measure, yielded with pain and anxiety to the former. Mr. Patterson is the President of the Bank of Baltimore, the wealthiest man in Maryland, perhaps in the United States, except Mr. Carroll; a man of great virtue and respectability; the mother is the sister of the lady of General Samuel Smith; and, consequently, the station the family in society is with the first of United States. These circumstances fix rank in a country where there are no hereditary titles.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 510. FORD ED., viii, 277. (W., Nov. 1803.)

857. BONAPARTE (N.), Brutuses for.—If Bonaparte declares for royalty, either in his own person, or for Louis XVIII., he has but a few days to live. In a nation of so much enthusiasm, there must be a million of Brutuses who will devote themselves to destroy him.—To HENRY INNES. iv, 315. FORD ED., vii, 412. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

858. — — — Had the consuls been put to death in the first tumult, and before the nation had time to take sides, the Directory and Councils might have reestablished themselves on the spot. But that not being done, perhaps it is now to be wished that Bonaparte may be spared, as, according to his protestations, he is for liberty, equality and representative government, and he is more able to keep the nation together, and to ride out the storm than any other. Perhaps it may end in their establishing a single representative, and that in his person. I hope it will not be for life, for fear of the influence of the example on our countrymen. It is very material for the latter to be made sensible that their own character and situation are materially different from the French; and that whatever may be the fate of republicanism there, we are able to preserve it inviolate here.—To JOHN BRECKENRIDGE. FORD ED., vii, 418. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

859. BONAPARTE (N.), Cromwell, Washington and.—My confidence has been placed in the head, not in the heart of Bonaparte. I hoped he would calculate truly the difference between the fame of a Washington and a Cromwell.—To SAMUEL ADAMS. iv, 321. FORD ED., vii, 425. (Pa., Feb. 1800.)

860. BONAPARTE (N.), Detested.—No man on earth has stronger detestation than myself of the unprincipled tyrant who is deluging the continent of Europe with blood. No one was more gratified by his disasters of the last campaign.*—To DR. GEORGE LOGAN. vi, 216. FORD ED., ix, 423. (M., Oct. 1813.)

861. BONAPARTE (N.), Embargo and.—The explanation of his principles given you by the French Emperor, in conversation, is correct as far as it goes. He does not wish us to go to war with England, knowing we have no ships to carry on that war. To submit to pay to England the tribute on our commerce which she demands by her orders of council, would be to aid her in the war against him, and would give him just ground to declare war with us. He, concludes, there-

* This extract got into the newspapers contrary to Jefferson's wishes, and led to a long interruption of the correspondence between him and Dr. Logan. At length, in 1816, he wrote to Logan, complaining of the publication, and said: "this [extract] produced to me more complaints from my best friends and called for more explanations than any transaction of my life had ever done. They inferred from this partial extract an approbation of the conduct of England, which yet the same letter censured with equal rigor. It produced, too, from the minister of Bonaparte a complaint, not indeed formal, for I was but a private citizen, but serious, of my volunteering with England in the abuse of his sovereign."—EDITOR.

fore, as every rational man must, that the Embargo, the only remaining alternative, was a wise measure. These are acknowledged principles, and should circumstances arise which may offer advantage to our country in making them public, we shall avail ourselves of them. But as it is not usual nor agreeable to governments to bring their conversations before the public, I think it would be well to consider this on your part as confidential, leaving to the government to retain or make it public, as the general good may require. Had the Emperor gone further, and said that he condemned our vessels going voluntarily into his ports in breach of his municipal laws, we might have admitted it rigorously legal, though not friendly. But his condemnation of vessels taken on high seas, by his privateers and carried involuntarily into his ports, is justifiable by no law; is piracy, and this is the wrong we complain of against him.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. v, 370. FORD ED., ix, 209. (W., Oct. 1808.)

862. BONAPARTE (N.), England and.—To complete and universalize the desolation of the globe, it has been the will of Providence to raise up, at the same time, a tyrant as unprincipled and as overwhelming, for the ocean. Not in the poor maniac George, but in his government and nation. Bonaparte will die, and his tyrannies with him. But a nation never dies. The English government, and its piratical principles and practices, have no fixed term of duration. Europe feels, and is writhing under the scorpion whips of Bonaparte. We are assailed by those of England. The one continent thus placed under the gripe of England, and the other of Bonaparte, each has to grapple with the enemy immediately pressing on itself. We must extinguish the fire kindled in our own house, and leave to our friends beyond the water that which is consuming theirs.—To MADAME DE STAEL. vi, 115. (M., May 1813.)

863. BONAPARTE (N.), Execrated.—I know nothing which can so severely try the heart and spirit of man, and especially of the man of science, as the necessity of a passive acquiescence under the abominations of an unprincipled tyrant who is deluging the earth with blood to acquire for himself the reputation of a Cartouche or a Robin Hood. The petty larcenies of the Blackbeards and Buccaneers of the ocean, the more immediately exercised on us, are dirty and grovelling things addressed to our contempt, while the horrors excited by the Scelerat of France are beyond all human execrations.—To Dr. MORRELL. vi, 100. (M., Feb. 1813.)

864. BONAPARTE (N.), A Great Scoundrel.—Bonaparte was a lion in the field only. In civil life, a cold-blooded, calculating, unprincipled usurper, without a virtue; no statesman, knowing nothing of commerce, political economy, or civil government, and supplying ignorance by bold presumption. I had supposed him a great man until his entrance into the Assembly des cinq cens, eighteen Brumaire (an. 8.) From that date, however, I set him down as a great scoundrel only.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 352. FORD ED., ix, 461. (M., July 1814.)

865. BONAPARTE (N.), Hatred of United States.—Bonaparte hates our government because it is a living libel on his.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 553. FORD ED., ix, 287. (M., 1810.)

866.—Bonaparte's hatred of us is only a little less than that he bears to England, and England to us. Our form of government is odious to him, as a standing contrast between republican and despotic rule; and as much from that hatred, as from ignorance in political economy, he had excluded intercourse between us and his people, by prohibiting the only articles they wanted from us, cotton and tobacco.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 464. FORD ED., ix, 520. (M., June 1815.)

867.—It is not possible Bonaparte should love us; and of that our commerce had sufficient proof during his power. Our military achievements, indeed, which he is capable of estimating, may in some degree, moderate the effect of his aversions; and he may, perhaps, fancy that we are to become the natural enemies of England, as England herself has so steadily endeavored to make us, and as some of our own over-zealous patriots would be willing to proclaim; and in this view, he may admit a cold toleration of some intercourse and commerce between the two nations. He has certainly had time to see the folly of turning the industry of France from the cultures for which nature has so highly endowed her, to those of sugar, cotton, tobacco, and others, which the same creative power has given to other climates; and, on the whole, if he can conquer the passions of his tyrannical soul, if he has understanding enough to pursue from motives of interest, what no moral motives lead him to, the tranquil happiness and prosperity of his country, rather than a ravenous thirst for human blood, his return may become of more advantage than injury to us.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 458 (M., June 1815.)

868. BONAPARTE (N.), Havoc by.—A conqueror roaming over the earth with havoc and destruction.—To Dr. WALTER JONES. v, 511. FORD ED., ix, 274. (M., 1810.)

869. BONAPARTE (N.), His Ideas on Government.—Should it be really true that Bonaparte has usurped the government with an intention of making it a free one, whatever his talents may be for war, we have no proofs that he is skilled in forming governments friendly to the people. Wherever he has meddled, we have seen nothing but fragments of the old Roman government stuck into materials with which they can form no cohesion. We see the bigotry of an Italian to the ancient splendor of his country, but nothing which bespeaks a luminous view of the organization of rational government. Perhaps, however, this may end better than we augur; and it certainly will, if his head is equal to true and solid calculations of glory.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iv, 319. FORD ED., vii, 422. (Pa., Feb. 1800.)

870. BONAPARTE (N.), Human Misery and.—Bonaparte has been the author of more misery and suffering to the world, than any being who ever lived before him. After destroying the liberties of his country, he has exhausted all its resources, physical and moral, to indulge his own maniac ambition, his own tyrannical and overbearing spirit. His sufferings cannot be too great.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vi, 499. (M., Oct. 1815.)

871. BONAPARTE (N.), Ignorance of Commerce.—Of the principles and advantages of commerce, Bonaparte appears to be ignorant.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 601. (M., 1812.)

872. BONAPARTE (N.), Imprisonment of.—The Attila of the age dethroned, the ruthless destroyer of ten millions of the human race, whose thirst for blood appeared unquenchable, the great oppressor of the rights and liberties of the world, shut up within the circle of a little island of the Mediterranean, and dwindled to the condition of an humble and degraded pensioner on the bounty of those he had most injured. How miserable, how meanly, has he closed his inflated career! What a sample of the bathos will his history present! He should have perished on the swords of his enemies, under the walls of Paris.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 352. FORD ED., ix, 461. (M., July 1814.)

873. BONAPARTE (N.), Invasion of U. S. by.—The fear that Bonaparte will come over and conquer us also, is too chimerical to be genuine. Supposing him to have finished Spain and Portugal, he has yet England and Russia to subdue. The maxim of war was never sounder than in this case, not to leave an enemy in the rear; and especially where an insurrectionary flame is known to be under the embers, merely smothered, and ready to burst at every point. These two subdued (and surely the Anglomans will not think the conquest of England alone a short work), ancient Greece and Macedonia, the cradle of Alexander, his prototype, and Constantinople, the seat of empire for the world, would glitter more in his eye than our bleak mountains and rugged forests. Egypt, too, and the golden apples of Mauritania, have for more than half a century fixed the longing eyes of France; and with Syria, you know, he has an old affront to wipe out. Then come "Pontus and Galatia, Cappadocia, Aeolia and Bithynia," the fine countries on the Euphrates and Tigris, the Oxus and Indus, and all beyond the Hypasis, which bounded the glories of his Macedonian rival; with the invitations of his new British subjects on the banks of the Ganges, whom, after receiving under his protection the mother country, he cannot refuse to visit. When all this is done and settled, and nothing of the old world remains unsubdued, he may turn to the new one. But will he attack us first, from whom he will get but hard knocks and no money?

Or will he first lay hold of the gold and silver of Mexico and Peru, and the diamonds of Brazil? A republican emperor, from his affection to republics, independent of motives of expediency, must grant to ourselves the Cyclop's boon of being the last devoured. While all this is doing, are we to suppose the chapter of accidents read out, and that nothing can happen to cut short or disturb his enterprises?—To JOHN LANGDON. v, 512. (M., March 1810.)

874. BONAPARTE (N.), Louisiana and.—I assured M. Pichon [French Minister] that I had more confidence in the word of the First Consul than in all the parchment we could sign.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 511. FORD ED., viii, 278. (W., Nov. 1803.)

875. ———. Your emperor has done more splendid things, but he has never done one which will give happiness to so great a number of human beings as the ceding of Louisiana to the United States.*—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. FORD ED., ix, 67. (W., May 1807.) See LOUISIANA.

876. BONAPARTE (N.), No Moral Sense.—O'Meara's book proves that nature had denied Bonaparte the moral sense, the first excellence of well organized man. If he could seriously and repeatedly affirm that he had raised himself to power without ever having committed a crime, it proves that he wanted totally the sense of right and wrong. If he could consider the millions of human lives which he had destroyed, or caused to be destroyed, the desolations of countries by plunderings, burnings and famine, the destitutions of lawful rulers of the world without the consent of their constituents, to place his brothers and sisters on their thrones, the cutting up of established societies of men and jumbling them discordantly together again at his caprice, the demolition of the fairest hopes of mankind for the recovery of their rights and amelioration of their condition, and all the numberless train of his other enormities; the man I say, who could consider all these as no crimes, must have been a moral monster, against whom every hand should have been lifted to slay him.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 275. (M., 1823.)

877. BONAPARTE (N.), Peace and.—Bonaparte's restless spirit leaves no hope of peace to the world.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 464. FORD ED., ix, 520. (M., 1815.)

878. BONAPARTE (N.), Policy toward United States.—As to Bonaparte, I should not doubt the revocation of his edicts, were he governed by reason. But his policy is so crooked that it eludes conjecture. I fear his first object now is to dry up the sources of British prosperity by excluding her manufactures from the continent. He may fear that opening the ports of Europe to our vessels will open them to an inundation of British wares. He ought to be satisfied with having forced her to revoke the orders [in council] on which he pretended to retaliate, and to be particularly satisfied with us, by whose unyielding adherence to principle she has been forced into the revocation. He ought the more to conciliate our good will, as we can be such an obstacle to the new career opening on him in the Spanish Colonies. That he would give us the Floridas to withhold intercourse with the residue of those colonies, cannot be doubted. But that is no price; because they are ours in the first moment of the first war; and until a war they are of no particular necessity to us. But, although with difficulty, he will consent to our receiving Cuba into our Union, to prevent our aid to Mexico and the other provinces. That would be a price, and I would immediately erect a column on the southernmost limit of Cuba, and inscribe on it a ne plus ultra as to us in that direction. We should then only have to include the North in our Confederacy, which would be of course in the first war, and we should have such an empire for liberty as she has never surveyed since the creation; and I am persuaded no Constitution was ever before so well calculated as ours for extensive empire and self-government.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 444. (M., April 1809.)

* This accession of territory strengthens forever the power of the United States, and I have just given to England a maritime rival that will sooner or later humble her pride.—NAPOLEON.

879. BONAPARTE (N.), Political Wickedness of.—I view Bonaparte as a political engine only, and a very wicked one; you, I believe, as both political and religious, and obeying, as an instrument, an Unseen Hand. I still deprecate his becoming sole lord of the continent of Europe, which he would have been, had he reached in triumph the gates of St. Petersburg. The establishment in our day of another Roman Empire, spreading vassalage and depravity over the face of the globe, is not, I hope, within the purposes of Heaven.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 463. FORD ED., ix, 519. (M., June 1815.)

880. BONAPARTE (N.), Promises of.—Promises cost him nothing when they could serve his purpose. On his return from Elba, what did he not promise? But those who had credited them a little, soon saw their total insignificance, and, satisfied that they could not fall under worse hands, refused every effort after the defeat of Waterloo.—To BENJAMIN AUSTIN. vi, 554. FORD ED., x, 11. (M., 1816.)

881. BONAPARTE (N.), Republicans and.—Here you will find rejoicings on the [restoration] of Bonaparte, and by a strange quid pro quo, not by the party hostile to liberty, but by its zealous friends. In this they see nothing but the scourge reproduced for the back of England. They do not permit themselves to see in it the blast of all the hopes of mankind, and that however it may jeopardize England, it gives to her self-defence the lying countenance again of being the sole champion of the rights of man, to which in all other nations she is most adverse.—To M. DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 457. (M., May 1815.)

882. — — — I have grieved to see even good republicans so infatuated as to this man, as to consider his downfall as calamitous to the cause of liberty. In their indignation against England which is just, they seem to consider all her enemies as our friends, when it is well known there was not a being on earth who bore us so deadly a hatred. * * * To whine after this exorcised demon is a disgrace to republicans, and must have arisen either from want of reflection, or the indulgence of passion against principle.—To BENJAMIN AUSTIN. vi, 553. FORD ED., x, 11. (M., Feb. 1816.)

883. BONAPARTE (N.), Restoration of.—You despair of your country, and so do I. A military despotism is now fixed upon it permanently, especially if the son of the tyrant should have virtues and talents. What a treat it would be to me, to be with you, and to learn from you all the intrigues, apostacies and treacheries which have produced this last death's blow to the hopes of France. For, although not in the will, there was in the imbecility of the Bourbons a foundation of hope that the patriots of France might obtain a moderate representative government.—To M. DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 457. (M., May 1815.)

884. BONAPARTE (N.), Rights of Nations and.—The new treaty of the allied powers declares that the French nation shall not have Bonaparte, and shall have Louis XVIII. for their ruler. They are all then as great rascals as Bonaparte himself. While he was in the wrong, I wished him exactly as much success as would answer our purposes, and no more. Now that they are in the wrong and he in the right, he shall have all my prayers for success, and that he may dethrone every man of them.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 467. FORD ED., ix, 522. (M., June 1815.)

885. — — — As far as we can judge from appearances, Bonaparte, from being a mere military usurper, seems to have become the choice of his nation; and the allies in their turn, the usurpers and spoliators of the European world. The rights of nations to self-government being my polar star, my partialities are steered by it, without asking whether it is a Bonaparte or an Alexander towards whom the helm is directed.—To M. CORREA. vi, 480. (M., June 1815.)

886. — — — No man more severely condemned Bonaparte than myself during his former career, for his unprincipled enterprises on the liberty of his own country, and the independence of others. But the allies having now taken up his pursuits, and he arrayed himself on the legitimate side, I also am changed as to him. He is now fighting for the independence of nations, of which his whole life hitherto had been a continued violation, and he has now my prayers as sincerely for success as he had before for his overthrow. He has promised a free government to his own country, and to respect the rights of others; and although his former conduct does not inspire entire faith in his promises; yet we had better take the chance of his word for doing right than the certainty of the wrong which his adversaries avow.—To PHILLIP MAZZEL. FORD ED., ix, 525. (M., Aug. 1815.)

887. ——. At length Bonaparte has got on the right side of a question. From the time of his entering the legislative hall to his retreat to Elba, no man has execrated him more than myself. I will not except even the members of the Essex Junto; although for very different reasons; I, because he was warring against the liberty of his own country, and independence of others; they, because he was the enemy of England, the Pope and the Inquisition. But at length, and as far as we can judge, he seems to have become the choice of his nation. At least, he is defending the cause of his nation, and that of all mankind, the rights of every people to independence and self-government. He and the allies have now changed sides. They are parcelling out among themselves, Poland, Belgium, Saxony, Italy, dictating a ruler and government to France, and looking askance at our republic, the splendid libel on their governments, and he is fighting for the principles of national independence of which his whole life hitherto has been a continued violation. He has promised a free government to his own country, and to respect the rights of others; and although his former conduct inspires little confidence in his promises, yet we had better take the chance of his word for doing right, than the certainty of the wrong which his adversaries are doing and avowing. If they succeed ours is only the boon of the Cyclops to Ulysses, of being the last devoured.*—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 490. FORD ED., ix, 529. (M., Aug. 1815.)

888. BONAPARTE (N.), Robespierre and.—Robespierre met the fate, and his memory the execration, he so justly merited. The rich were his victims, and perished by thousands. It is by millions that Bonaparte destroys the poor, and he is eulogized and deified by the sycophants even of science. These merit more than the mere oblivion to which they will be consigned: and the day will come when a just posterity will give to their hero the only preeminence he has earned, that of having been the greatest of the destroyers of the human race. What year of his military life has not consigned a million of human beings to death, to poverty and wretchedness! What field in Europe may not raise a monument of the murders, the burnings, the desolations, the famines, and miseries it has witnessed from him? And all

* To the letter from which this extract is taken Jefferson appended a postscript as follows: "I had finished my letter yesterday and this morning (Aug. 11), received the news of Bonaparte's second abdication. Very well. For him, personally, I have no feeling but reprobation. The representatives of the nations have deposed him. They have taken the allies at their word, that they had no object in the war but his removal. The nation is now free to give itself a good government, either with or without a Bourbon; and France, unsubdued, will still be a bribe on the enterprises of the combined powers, and a mark to others."—EDITOR.

this to acquire a reputation, which Cartouche attained with less injury to mankind, of being fearless of God or man.—To MADAME DE STAEL. vi, 114. (M., May 1813.)

889. BONAPARTE (N.), Self-government and.—I see in Bonaparte's expulsion of the Bourbons, a valuable lesson to the world, as showing that its ancient dynasties may be changed for their misrule. Should the allied powers presume to dictate a ruler and government to France, and follow the example he had set of parcelling and usurping to themselves their neighbor nations, I hope he will give them another lesson in vindication of the rights of independence and self-government, which himself had hitherto so much abused, and that in this contest he will wear down the maritime power of England to limitable and safe dimensions. So far, good. It cannot be denied, on the other hand, that his successful perversion of the force (committed to him for vindicating the rights and liberties of his country) to usurp its government, and to enchain it under an hereditary despotism, is of baneful effect in encouraging future usurpations, and deterring those under oppression from rising to redress themselves.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 464. FORD ED., ix, 519. (M., 1815.)

890. ——. If adversity should have taught him wisdom, of which I have little expectation, he may yet render some service to mankind, by teaching the ancient dynasties that they can be changed for misrule, and by wearing down the maritime power of England to limitable and safe dimensions.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 458. (M., June 1815.)

891. BONAPARTE (N.), Selfishness of.—Bonaparte saw nothing in this world but himself, and looked on the people under him as his cattle, beasts for burthen and slaughter.—To BENJAMIN AUSTIN. vi, 553. FORD ED., x, 11. (M., 1816.)

892. BONAPARTE (N.), Statesmanship of.—I have just finished reading O'Meara's Bonaparte. It places him in a higher scale of understanding than I had allotted him. I had thought him the greatest of all military captains, but an indifferent statesman, and misled by unworthy passions. The flashes, however, which escaped from him in these conversations with O'Meara, prove a mind of great expansion, although not of distinct development and reasoning. He seizes results with rapidity and penetration, but never explains logically the processes of reasoning by which he arrives at them.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 275. (M., 1823.)

893. BONAPARTE (N.), Sufferings of.—O'Meara's Bonaparte makes us forget his atrocities for a moment, in commiseration of his sufferings. I will not say that the authorities of the world, charged with the care of their country and people, had not a right to confine him for life, as a lion or a tiger, on the principle of self-preservation. There was no safety to nations while he was permitted to roam at large. But the putting him to death in cold blood, by lingering tortures of mind, by vexations, insults, and deprivations, was a degree of inhumanity to which the poisonings and assassinations of the school of Borgia and the den of Marat never attained.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 275. (M., 1823.)

894. BONAPARTE (N.), Temper of.—Bonaparte's domineering temper deafens him to the dictates of interest, of honor, and of morality.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 601. (M., 1811.)

895. BONAPARTE (N.), Tyranny of.—A ruthless tyrant, drenching Europe in blood to obtain through future time the character of the destroyer of mankind.—To HENRY MIDDLETON. vi, 91. (M., Jan. 1813.)

896. — — — That Bonaparte is an unprincipled tyrant, who is deluging the continent of Europe with blood, there is not a human being, not even the wife of his bosom who does not see.—To THOMAS LEIFER. vi, 283. FORD ED., ix, 445. (M., Jan. 1814.)

897. BONAPARTE (N.), United States and.—Considering the character of Bonaparte, I think it material at once to let him see that we are not of the powers who will receive his orders.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 585. FORD ED., viii, 377. (M., Aug. 1805.)

898. — — — I never expected to be under the necessity of wishing success to Bonaparte. But the English being equally tyrannical at sea as he is on land, and that tyranny bearing on us in every point of either honor or interest, I say, "down with England," and as for what Bonaparte is then to do to us, let us trust to the chapter of accidents. I cannot, with the Anglomens, prefer a certain present evil to a future hypothetical one.—To THOMAS LEIFER. FORD ED., ix, 130. (M., Aug. 1807.)

899. — — — Although we neither expected, nor wished any act of friendship from Bonaparte, and always detested him as a tyrant, yet he gave employment to much of the force of the nation who was our common enemy. So far, his downfall was illy timed for us; it gave to England an opportunity to turn full-handed on us, when we were unprepared. No matter, we can beat her on our own soil, leaving the laws of the ocean to be settled by the maritime powers of Europe, who are equally oppressed and insulted by the usurpations of England on that element.—To W. H. CRAWFORD. vi, 418. FORD ED., ix, 502. (M., Feb. 1815.)

900. BONAPARTE (N.), United States, Russia and.—There cannot, I think, be a doubt as to the line we wish drawn between Bonaparte's successes and those of Alexander. Surely none of us wish to see Bonaparte conquer Russia, and lay thus at his feet the whole continent of Europe. This done, England would be but a breakfast; and although I am free from the visionary fears which the votaries of England have affected to entertain, because I believe he cannot effect the conquest of Europe; yet put all Europe into his hands, and he might spare such a force, to be sent in British ships, as I would as lief not have to encounter, when I see how much trouble a handful of soldiers in Canada has given us. No. It cannot be to our interest that all Europe should be reduced to a single monarchy. The true line of interest for us, is, that Bonaparte should be able to effect the complete exclusion of England from the whole continent of Europe, in order, by this peaceable engine of constraint to make her renounce her views of dominion over the ocean, of permitting no other nation to navigate it but with her license, and on tribute to her, and her aggressions on the persons of our citizens who may choose to exercise their right of passing over that element. And this would be effected by Bonaparte succeeding so far as to close the Baltic against her. This success I wished him the last year, this I wish him this year; but were he again advanced to Moscow, I should again wish him such disasters as would prevent his reaching St. Petersburg. And were the consequences even to be the longer continuance of our war, I would rather meet them than see the whole force of Europe wielded by a single hand.—To THOMAS LEIFER. vi, 283. FORD ED., ix, 445. (M., Jan. 1814.)

901. — — — I have gone into this explanation * * * because I am willing to trust to your discretion the explaining me to our honest fellow laborers, and the bringing them to pause and reflect, if any of them have not sufficiently reflected on the extent of the success we ought to wish to Bonaparte, with a view to our own interests only; and even were we not men, to whom nothing human should be indifferent. But is our particular interest to make us insensible to all sentiments of morality? Is it then become criminal, the moral wish that the torrents of blood this man is shedding in Europe, the sufferings of so many human beings, good as ourselves, on whose necks he is trampling, the burnings of ancient cities, devastations of great countries, the destruction of law and order, and demoralization of the world, should be arrested, even if it should place our peace a little further distant? No. You and I cannot differ in wishing that Russia, and Sweden, and Denmark, and Germany, and Spain, and Portugal, and Italy, and even England, may retain their independence.—To THOMAS LEIFER. vi, 283. FORD ED., ix, 446. (M., Jan. 1814.)

902. — — — It is cruel that we should have been forced to wish any success to such a destroyer of the human race. Yet while it was our interest and that of humanity that he should not subdue Russia, and thus lay all Europe at his feet, it was desirable to us that he should so far succeed as to close the Baltic to our enemy, and force him, by the pressure of internal distress, into a disposition to return to the paths of justice towards us.—To JOHN CLARKE. vi, 308. (M., Jan. 1814.)

903. BONAPARTE (N.), Vanquished.—The unprincipled tyrant of the land is fallen, his power reduced to its original nothingness, his person only not yet in the madhouse, where it ought always to have been.—To CÉSAR A. RODNEY. vi, 448. (M., 1815.)

904. ——. On the general scale of nations, the greatest wonder is Napoleon at St. Helena; and yet it would have been well for the lives and happiness of millions and millions, had he been deposited there twenty years ago. France would now have a free government, unstained by the enormities she has enabled him to commit on the rest of the world, and unprostrated by the vindictive hand, human or divine, now so heavily bearing upon her.—To MRS. TRIST. D. L. J. 363. (P. F., April 1816.)

905. ——. What is infinitely interesting [in the letters you enclosed to me], is the scene of the exchange of Louis XVIII. for Bonaparte. What lessons of wisdom Mr. [John Quincy] Adams must have read in that short space of time! More than fall to the lot of others in the course of a long life. Man, and the man of Paris, under those circumstances, must have been a subject of profound speculation! It would be a singular addition to that spectacle to see the same beast in the cage at St. Helena, like a lion in the tower. That is probably the closing verse of the chapter of his crimes.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. vii, 52. FORD ED., x, 69. (M., 1817.)

906. ——. Had Bonaparte reflected that such is the moral construction of the world, that no national crime passes unpunished in the long run, he would not now be in the cage of St. Helena.—M. DE MARBOIS. vii, 76. (M., 1817.) See FRANCE.

907. BOOKS AS CAPITAL.—Some few years ago when the tariff was before Congress. I engaged some of our members of Congress to endeavor to get the duty repealed, and wrote on the subject to some other acquaintances in Congress, and pressing to the Secretary of the Treasury. The effort * * * failed. * * * There is a consideration going to the injustice of the tax * * *. Books constitute capital. A library book lasts as long as a house, for hundreds of years. It is not, then, an article of mere consumption but fairly of capital, and often in the case of professional men. setting out in life, it is their only capital. Now there is no other form of capital which is first taxed 18 per cent. on the gross, and the proprietor then left to pay the same taxes in detail with others whose capital has paid no tax on the gross. Nor is there a description of men less proper to be singled out for extra taxation.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., x, 194. (M., Sep. 1821.)

908. BOOKS, Censorship of.—I am mortified to be told that, in the United States of America, the sale of a book * can become a subject of inquiry, and of criminal inquiry too, as an offence against religion; that a question like this can be carried before the civil magistrate. Is this then our freedom of religion? And are we to have a censor whose imprimatur shall say what books may be sold, and what we may buy? And who is thus to dogmatize religious opinions for our citizens? Whose foot is to be the measure to which ours are all to be cut or stretched? Is a priest to be our inquisitor, or shall a layman, simple as ourselves, set up his reason as the rule for what we are to read, and what we must believe? It is an insult to our citizens to question whether they are rational beings or not, and blasphemy against religion to suppose it cannot stand the test of truth and reason. If M. de Becourt's book be false in its facts, disprove them; if false in its reasoning, refute it. But, for God's sake, let us freely hear both sides, if we choose. I know little of its contents, having barely glanced over here and there a passage, and over the table of contents. From this, the Newtonian philosophy seemed the chief object of attack, the issue of which might be trusted to the strength of the two combatants; Newton certainly not needing the auxiliary arm of the government, and still less the Holy Author of our religion, as to what in it concerns Him. I thought the work would be very innocent, and one which might be confided to the reason of any man; not likely to be much read if let alone, but, if persecuted, it will be generally read. Every man in the United States will think it a duty to buy a copy, in vindication of his right to buy, and to read what he pleases.—To M. DUFIEF. vi, 340. (M., 1814.)

909. ——. I have been just reading the new constitution of Spain. One of its fundamental bases is expressed in these words: "The Roman Catholic religion, the only true one, is, and always shall be, that of the Spanish nation. The government protects it by wise and just laws, and prohibits the exercise of any other whatever." Now I wish this presented to those who question what you may sell,* or we may buy with a request to strike out the words, "Roman Catholic," and to insert the denomination of their own religion. This would ascertain the code of dogmas which each wishes should domineer over the opinions of all others, and be taken, like the Spanish religion, under the "protection of wise and just laws." It would show to what they wish to reduce the liberty for which one generation has sacrificed life and happiness. It would present our boasted freedom of religion as a thing of theory only, and not of practice, as what would be a poor exchange for the theoretic thralldom, but practical freedom of Europe.—To M. DUFIEF. vi, 340. (M., 1814.)

910. BOOKS, Duty on.—To prohibit us from the benefit of foreign light, is to consign us to a long darkness.—To ——. vii, 221. (M., 1821.)

911. ——. I hope a crusade will be kept up against the duty on books until those in power shall become sensible of this stain on our legislation, and shall wipe it from their code, and from the remembrance of man, if possible.—To JARED SPARKS. vii, 335. FORD ED., x, 293. (M., 1824.)

912. ——. I hear nothing definitive of the three thousand dollars duty [on books for the University of Virginia] of which we are asking the remission from Congress.—To JAMES MADISON. vii, 433. FORD ED., x, 376. (M., 1826.)

913. ——. The government of the United States, at a very early period, when establishing its tariff on foreign importations, were very much guided in their selection of objects by a desire to encourage manufactures within ourselves. Among other articles then selected were books, on the importation of which a duty of fifteen per cent. was imposed, which, by ordinary custom house charges, amounts to about eighteen per cent., and adding the importing booksellers' profit on this, becomes about twenty-seven per cent. This was useful at first, perhaps, towards exciting our printers to make a beginning in that business here. But it is found in experience that the home demand is not sufficient to justify the reprinting any but the most popular English works, and cheap editions of a few of the classics for schools. For the editions of value, enriched by notes, commentaries, &c., and for books in foreign living languages, the demand here is too small and sparse to re-imburse the expense of reprinting them. None of these, therefore, are printed here, and the duty on them becomes consequently not a protecting, but really a prohibitory one. It makes a very serious addition to the price of the book and falls chiefly on a description of persons little able to meet it. Students who are destined for professional callings, as most of our scholars are, are barely able for the most part to meet the expenses of tuition. The addition of eighteen or twenty-seven per cent. on the books necessary for their instruction, amounts often to a prohibition as to them. For want of these aids, which are open to the students of all other nations but our own, they enter on their course on a very unequal footing with those of the same professions in foreign countries, and our citizens at large, too, who employ them, do not derive from that employment all the benefit which higher qualifications would give them. It is true that no duty is required on books imported for seminaries of learning, but these, locked up in libraries, can be of no avail to the practical man when he wishes a recurrence to them for the uses of life. Of many important books of reference there is not perhaps a single copy in the United States; of others but a few, and these too distant often to be accessible to scholars generally. It is believed, therefore, that if the attention of Congress could be drawn to this article, they would, in their wisdom, see its impolicy. Science is more important in a republican than in any other government. And in an infant country like ours, we must much depend for improvement on the science of other countries, longer established, possessing better means, and more advanced than we are. To prohibit us from the benefit of foreign light, is to consign us to long darkness. The northern seminaries following with parental solicitude the interest of their élèves in the course for which they have prepared them, propose to petition Congress on this subject, and wish for the cooperation of those of the south and west, and I have been requested, as more convenient in position than they are, to solicit that cooperation. Having no personal acquaintance with those who are charged with the direction of the college of ———, I do not know how more effectually to communicate these views to them, than by availing myself of the knowledge I have of your zeal for the happiness and improvement of our country. I take the liberty, therefore, of requesting you to place the subject before the proper authorities of that institution, and if they approve the measure, to solicit a concurrent proceeding on their part to carry it into effect. Besides petitioning Congress, I would propose that they address, in their corporate capacity, a letter to their delegates and senators in Congress, soliciting their best endeavors to obtain the repeal of the duty on imported books. I cannot but suppose that such an application will be respected by them, and will engage their votes and endeavors to effect an object so reasonable. A conviction that science is important to the preservation of our republican government, and that it is also essential to its protection against foreign power, induces me, on this occasion, to step beyond the limits of that retirement to which age and inclination equally dispose me.—To ——— vii, 220. (M., 1821.)

914. BOOKS, Lending.—The losses I have sustained by lending my books will be my apology to you for asking your particular attention to the replacing them in the presses as fast as you finish them, and not to lend them to anybody else, nor suffer anybody to have a book out of the study under cover of your name.—To JOHN GARLAND JEFFERSON. FORD ED., v, 182. (N. Y., 1790.)

915. BOOKS, Love of.—I cannot live without books.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 460. (M., 1815.)

916. BOOKS, Prices of.—French books are to be bought here [Paris] for two-thirds of what they can in England. English and Greek and Latin authors cost from twenty-five to fifty per cent. more here than in England.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. i, 434. (P., 1785.)

917. ——. Greek and Roman authors are dearer here [France] than I believe anywhere in the world. Nobody here reads them, wherefore they are not printed.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 414. (P., 1785.)

918. BOOKS, Recommending.—It is with extreme reluctance that I permit myself to usurp the office of an adviser of the public, what books they should read, and what not. I yield, however, on this occasion to your wish and that of Colonel Taylor, and do what (with a single exception only) I never did before, on the many similar applications made to me.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 212. FORD ED., x, 189. (M., 1821.)

919. ——. This book ["Constructions Construed"] is the most effectual retraction of our government to its original principles which has ever yet been sent by heaven to our aid. Every State in the Union should give a copy to every member they elect, as a standing instruction, and ours should set the example.—To ARCHIBALD THWEAT. vii, 199. FORD ED., x, 184. (M., 1821.)

920. ——. You ask for my opinion of the work you send me, and to let it go out to the public. This I have ever made a point of declining (one or two instances only excepted). Complimentary thanks to writers who have sent me their works, have betrayed me sometimes before the public, without my consent having been asked. But I am far from presuming to direct the reading of my fellow citizens, who are good enough judges themselves of what is worthy their reading.—To THOMAS RITCHIE. vii, 192. FORD ED., xvi, 171. (M., 1820.)

921. BOOKS, Time and.—The [French] literati are half a dozen years before us. Books, really good, acquire just reputation in that time, and so become known to us, and communicate to us all their advances in knowledge. Is not this delay compensated, by our being placed out of the reach of that swarm of nonsensical publications which issues daily from a thousand presses, and perishes almost in issuing?—To MR. BELLINI. i, 445. (P., 1785.)

922. BOOKS, Translations of.—I make it a rule never to read translations when I can read the original.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. iv, 101. (M., 1794.)

923. BOOKS, Warfare by.—After the severe chastisement given by Mr. Walsh in his American Register to English scribblers, which they well deserved, and I was delighted to see, I hoped there would be an end of this intercrimination, and that both parties would prefer the course of courtesy and conciliation, and I think their considerate writers have since shown that disposition, and that it would prevail if equally cultivated by us. Europe is doing us full justice; why then detract from her?—To CHARLES JARED INGERSOLL. FORD ED., x, 325. (M., 1824.)

924. BOSTON PORT BILL, Denounced.—All such assumptions of unlawful power [as the Boston Port act] are dangerous to the right of the British empire in general, and should be considered as its common cause; and we will ever be ready to join with our fellow-subjects in every part of the same, in executing all those rightful powers which God has given us, for the reestablishment and guaranteeing * * * their constitutional rights, when, where, and by whomsoever invaded.*—RESOLUTION OF ALBEMARLE COUNTY. FORD ED., i, 419. (July 26, 1774.)

925. BOSTON PORT BILL, A Fast Proclaimed.—The Legislature of Virginia happened to be in session, in Williamsburg, when news was received of the passage by the British Parliament of the Boston Port

Bill, which was to take effect on the first day of June [1774] then ensuing. The House of Burgesses thereupon passed a resolution, recommending to their fellow citizens, that that day should be set apart for fasting and prayer to the Supreme Being, imploring Him to avert the calamities then threatening us, and to give us one heart and one mind to oppose every invasion of our liberties. The next day, May 20, 1774, the Governor dissolved us.—JEFFERSON PAPERS. i, 122. (1821.) See FAST DAYS.

926. BOSTON PORT BILL, Ruin by.—By an act (7. G. 3) to discontinue in such manner, and for such time as they are therein mentioned, the landing and discharging, lading or shipping of goods, wares and merchandise, at the town and within the harbor of Boston, * * * a large and populous town, whose trade was their sole subsistence, was deprived of that trade, and involved in utter ruin. Let us for a while, suppose the question of right suspended, in order to examine this act on principles of justice: An act of Parliament had been passed imposing duties on teas, to be paid in America, against which act the Americans had protested as inauthentic. The East India Company, who till that time had never sent a pound of tea to America on their own account, step forth on that occasion the asserters of Parliamentary right, and send hither many ship loads of that obnoxious commodity. The masters of their several vessels, however, on their arrival in America, wisely attended to admonition, and returned with their cargoes. In the province of Massachusetts alone, the remonstrances of the people were disregarded, and a compliance, after being many days waited for, was flatly refused. Whether in this the master of the vessel was governed by his obstinacy, or his instructions, let those who know say. There are extraordinary situations which require extraordinary interposition. An exasperated people, who feel that they possess power, are not easily restrained within limits strictly regular. A number of them assembled in the town of Boston, threw the tea into the ocean, and dispersed without doing any other act of violence. If in this they did wrong, they were known and were amenable to the laws of the land, against which it could not be objected that they had ever, in any instance, been obstructed or diverted from their regular course in favor of popular offenders. They should, therefore, not have been distrusted on this occasion. But that ill-fated colony had formerly been bold in their enmities against the house of Stuart, and were now devoted to ruin by that unseen hand which governs the momentous affairs of this great empire. On the partial representations of a few worthless ministerial dependents, whose constant office it has been to keep that government embroiled, and who, by their treacheries, hope to obtain the dignity of British Knighthood,* without calling for the party accused, without asking a proof, without attempting a distinction between the guilty and the innocent, the whole of that ancient and wealthy town, is in a moment reduced from opulence to beggary. Men who had spent their lives in extending the British commerce, who had invested in that place the wealth their honest endeavors had merited, found themselves and their families thrown at once on the world for subsistence by its charities. Not the hundredth part of the inhabitants of that town had been concerned in the act complained of; many of them were in Great Britain and in other parts beyond the sea; yet all were involved in one indiscriminate ruin by a new executive power, unheard of till then, that of a British Parliament. A property of the value of many millions of money was sacrificed to revenge, not repay, the loss of a few thousands. This is administering justice with a heavy hand indeed! And when is this tempest to be arrested in its course? Two wharves are to be opened again when his Majesty shall think proper. The residue, which lined the extensive shores of the Bay of Boston, are forever interdicted the exercise of commerce. This little exception seems to have been thrown in for no other purpose than that of setting a precedent for investing his Majesty with legislative powers. If the pulse of his people shall beat calmly under this experiment, another and another shall be tried, till the measure of despotism be filled up. It would be an insult on common sense to pretend that this exception was made in order to restore its commerce to that great town. The trade which cannot be received at two wharves alone must of necessity be transferred to some other place; to which it will soon be followed by that of the two wharves. Considered in this light, it would be insolent and cruel mockery at the annihilation of the town of Boston.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 131. FORD ED., i, 436. (1734.) See DEPORTATION. TEA.

927. BOTANY, Attractiveness of.—You will find botany offering its charms to you, at every step during summer.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, JR. FORD ED., iv, 290. (P., 1786.)

928. BOTANY, New York.—We were * * * pleased with the botanical objects which continually presented themselves. Those either unknown or rare in Virginia were the sugar maple in vast abundance, the silver fir, white pine, pitch pine, spruce pine, a shrub with decumbent stems which they call juniper, an azalea, very different from the nudiflora, with very large clusters of flowers, more thickly set on the branches, of a deeper red, and high pink-fragrance. It is the richest shrub I have seen. The honeysuckle of the gardens growing wild on the banks of Lake George, the paper birch, an aspen with a velvet leaf, a shrub willow with downy catkins, a wild gooseberry, the wild cherry with single fruit (not the bunch cherry), strawberries in abundance.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 340. (June 1791.)

929. BOTANY, School of.—It is time to think of the introduction of the school of Botany into our institution. (University of Virginia). * * * 1. Our first operation must be the selection of a piece of ground of proper soil and site, suppose of about six acres, as M. Correa proposes. In choosing this we are to regard the circumstances of soil, water, and distance. I have diligently examined all our grounds with this view, and think that on the public road, at the upper corner of our possessions, where the stream issues from them, has more of the requisite qualities than any other spot we possess. One hundred and seventy yards square, taken at that angle, would make the six acres we want. * * * 2. Enclose the ground with a serpentine brick wall seven feet high. This would take about 80,000 bricks and cost $800, and it must depend on our finances whether they will afford that immediately, or allow us, for awhile, but enclosure of posts and rails. 3. Form all the hill sides into level terraces of convenient breadth, curving with the hill, and the level ground into beds and alleys. 4. Make out a list of the plants thought necessary and sufficient for botanical purposes, and of the trees we propose to introduce, and take measures in time for procuring them. As to the seeds of plants, much may be obtained from the gardeners of our own country. I have, moreover, a special resource. For three and twenty years of the last twenty-five, my good old friend Thonin, superintendent of the Jardin des Plantes at Paris, has regularly sent me a box of seeds of such exotics, as to us, as would suit our climate, and containing nothing indigenous to our country. These I regularly sent to the public and private gardens of the other States, having as yet no employment for them here. * * * The trees I should propose would be exotics of distinguished usefulness, and accommodated to our climate; such as the Larch, Cedar of Libanus, Cork, Oak, the Maronnier, Mahogany? the Catachu or Indian rubber tree of Napul (30°), Teak tree, or Indian oak of Burmah (23°), the various woods of Brazil, &c. The seed of the Larch can be obtained from a tree at Monticello. Cones of the Cedar of Libanus are in most of our seed shops, but may be had fresh from the trees in the English gardens. The Maronnier and Cork tree I can obtain from France. There is a Maronnier at Mount Vernon, but it is a seedling, and not, therefore, select. The others may be got through the means of our ministers and consuls in the countries where they grow, or from the seed shops of England, where they may very possibly be found. Lastly, a gardener of sufficient skill must be found.—To Dr. EMMETT. vii, 438. (M., 1826.)

930. BOTANY, Value of.—Botany I rank with the most valuable sciences, whether we consider its subjects as furnishing the principal subsistence of life to man and beast, delicious varieties for our tables, refreshments from our orchards, the adornments of our flower borders, shade and perfume of our groves, materials for our buildings, or medicaments for our bodies. To the gentleman it is certainly more interesting than mineralogy (which I by no means, however, undervalue), and is more at hand for his amusement; and to a country family it constitutes a great portion of their social entertainment. No country gentleman should be without what amuses every step he takes into his fields.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 390. (M., 1814.)

—BOTTA'S (C.), History.—See HISTORY.

931. BOTTETOURT (Lord), Character of.—Lord Bottetourt was an honourable man.

* Dr. Emmett was Professor of Natural History in the University of Virginia.—EDITOR.

His government had authorized him to make certain assurances to the people here [Virginia], which he made accordingly. He wrote to the minister that he had made these assurances, and that, unless he should be enabled to fulfil them, he must retire from his situation. This letter he sent unsealed to Peyton Randolph for his inspection. Lord Bottetourt's great respectability, his character for integrity, and his general popularity, would have enabled him to embarrass the measures of the patriots exceedingly. His death was, therefore, a fortunate event for the cause of the Revolution. He was the first governor in chief that had ever come over to Virginia. Before his time, we had received only deputies, the governor residing in England, with a salary of five thousand pounds, and paying his deputy one thousand pounds.—CONVERSATION WITH DANIEL WEBSTER. FORD ED., x, 330. (1824.)

932. BOUNDARIES, Louisiana.—The boundaries of Louisiana, which I deem not admitting question, are the highlands on the western side of the Mississippi enclosing all its waters, the Missouri of course, and terminating in the line drawn from the northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods to the nearest source of the Mississippi, as lately settled between Great Britain and the United States. We have some claims, to extend on the seacoast westwardly to the Rio Norte or Bravo, and better, to go eastwardly to the Rio Perdido, between Mobile and Pensacola, the ancient boundary of Louisiana. Those claims will be a subject of negotiation with Spain, and if, as soon as she is at war, we push them strongly with one hand, holding out a price in the other, we shall certainly obtain the Floridas, and, all in good time. In the meanwhile, without waiting for permission, we shall enter into the exercise of the natural right we have always insisted on with Spain, to wit, that of a nation holding the upper part of streams, having a right of innocent passage through them to the ocean. We shall prepare her to see us practice on this, and she will not oppose it by force.—To JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 498. FORD ED., viii, 242. (M., Aug. 1803.)

933. — — — We are attached to the retaining of the Bay of St. Bernard, because it was the first establishment of the unfortunate La Salle, was the cradle of Louisiana, and more incontestably covered and conveyed to us by France, under that name, than any other spot in the country.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 19. (W., 1806.)

934. — — — You know the French considered themselves entitled to the Rio Bravo, and that Laussat declared his orders to be to receive possession to that limit, but not to Perdido; and that France has to us been always silent as to the western boundary, while she spoke decisively as to the eastern. You know Turreau agreed with us that neither party should strengthen themselves in the disputed country during negotiation; and [General] Armstrong, who says Monroe concurs with him, is of opinion, from the character of the Emperor, that were we to restrict ourselves to taking posts on the west side of the Mississippi, and threaten a cessation of intercourse with Spain, Bonaparte would interpose efficiently to prevent the quarrel going further. Add to these things the fact that Spain has sent five hundred colonists to San Antonio, and one hundred troops to Nacogdoches, and probably has fixed or prepared a post at the Bay of St. Bernard, at Matagorda. Supposing, then, a previous alliance with England to guard us in the worst event, I should propose that Congress should pass acts, 1, authorizing the Executive to suspend intercourse with Spain at discretion; 2, to dislodge the new establishments of Spain between the Mississippi and Bravo; and, 3, to appoint commissioners to examine and ascertain all claims for spoliation that they might be preserved for future indemnification.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 587. FORD ED., viii, 379. (M., Sept. 1805.)

935. — — — By the charter of Louis XIV. all the country comprehending the waters which flow into the Mississippi, was made a part of Louisiana. Consequently its northern boundary was the summit of the highlands in which its northern waters rise. But by the Xth Art. of the Treaty of Utrecht, France and England agreed to appoint commissioners to settle the boundary between their possessions in that quarter, and those commissioners settled it at the 49th degree of latitude. (See Hutchinson's Topographical Description of Louisiana, p. 7.) This it was which induced the British Commissioners, in settling the boundary with us, to follow the northern water line to the Lake of the Woods, at the latitude of 49°, and then go off on that parallel. This, then, is the true northern boundary of Louisiana. The western boundary of Louisiana is, rightfully, the Rio Bravo (its main stream), from its mouth to its source, and thence along the highlands and mountains dividing the waters of the Mississippi from those of the Pacific. The usurpations of Spain on the east side of that river, have induced geographers to suppose the Puerto or Salado to be the boundary. The line along the highlands stands on the charter of Louis XIV., that of the Rio Bravo on the circumstance that, when La Salle took possession of the Bay of St. Bernard, Panuco was the nearest possession of Spain, and the Rio Bravo the natural half-way boundary between them. On the waters of the Pacific, we can found no claims in right of Louisiana.—To JOHN MELLISH. vii, 51. (M., 1816.)

936. BOUNDARIES, Massachusetts and New York.—I enclose you a Massachusetts paper, whereby you will see that some acts of force have taken place on our eastern boundary. * * * The want of an accurate map of the Bay of Passamaquoddy renders it difficult to form a satisfactory opinion in the point in contest. * * * There is a report that some acts of force have taken place on the northern boundary of New York, and are now under the consideration of the government of that State. The impossibility of bringing the court of London to an adjustment of any difference whatever, renders our situation perplexing. Should any applications from the States or their citizens be so urgent as to require something to be said before your return, my opinion would be that they should be desired to make no new settlements on our part, nor suffer any to be made on the part of the British, within the disputed territory; and if any attempt should be made to remove them from the settlements already made, that they are to repel force by force, and ask aid of the neighboring militia to do this and no more. I see no other way of forcing the British government to come forward themselves and demand an amicable settlement.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 230. (Pa., March 1791.)

937. BOUNDARIES, Northwest.—[In a conversation with George Hammond, the British minister], he observed that the treaty [of peace] was of itself so vague and inconsistent in many of its parts as to require an explanatory convention. He instanced the two articles, one of which gave them the navigation of the Mississippi, and the other bounded them by a due west line from the Lake of the Woods, which being now understood to pass beyond the most northern sources of the Mississippi, intercepted all access to that river; that to reconcile these articles, that line should be so run as to give them access to the navigable waters of the Mississippi, and that it would even be for our interest to introduce a third power between us and the Spaniards. He asked my idea of the line from the Lake of the Woods, and of now settling it. I told him I knew of no objection to the settlement of it; that my idea of it was, that if it was an impassable line, as proposed in the treaty, it should be rendered passable by as small and unimportant an alteration as might be, which I thought would be to throw in a line running due north from the northernmost source of the Mississippi till it should strike the western line from the Lake of the Woods; that the article giving them a navigation in the Mississippi did not relate at all to this northern boundary, but to the southern one, and to the secret article respecting that; that he knew that our Provisional Treaty was made seven weeks before that with Spain; that at the date of ours, their ministers had still a hope of retaining Florida, in which case they were to come up to the 32d degree, and in which case also the navigation of the Mississippi would have been important; but that they had not been able, in event, to retain the country to which the navigation was to be an appendage. (It was evident to me that they had it in view to claim a slice on our northwestern quarter, that they may get into the Mississippi; indeed, I thought it presented as a sort of make-weight with the Posts to compensate the great losses their citizens had sustained by the infractions charged on us).—THE ANAS. ix, 428. FORD ED., i, 195. (June 1792.)

938. BOUNDARIES, Pennsylvania and Virginia.—The principle on which the boundary between Pennsylvania and this State is to be run having been fixed, it is now proposed by President Reed that commissioners proceed to execute the work from the termination of Mason and Dixon's line to the completion of five degrees of longitude, and thence on a meridian to the Ohio. We propose that the extent of the five degrees of longitude shall be determined by celestial observation. Of course it will require one set of astronomers to be at Philadelphia, and another at Fort Pitt. We ask the favor of yourselves to undertake this business, the one to go to the one place, the other to the other, meaning to add a coadjutor to each of you.—To REV. JAMES MADISON AND ROBERT ANDREWS. FORD ED., ii, 513. (R., 1781.)

939. — — — No mode of determining the extent of the five degrees of longitude of Delaware river, in the latitude of Mason and Dixon's Line having been pointed out by your Excellency [Joseph Reed], I shall venture to propose that this be determined by astronomical observations, to be made at or near the two extremities of the line, as being in our opinion the most certain and unexceptionable mode of determining that point which, being fixed, everything else will be easy.—To PRESIDENT REED. FORD ED., iii, 15. (R., 1781.)

940. BOUNDARIES, United States and Great Britain.—A further knowledge of the ground in the north-eastern and north-western angles of the United States has evinced that the boundaries established by the treaty of Paris, between the British territories and ours in those parts, were too imperfectly described to be susceptible of execution. It has, therefore, been thought worthy of attention, for preserving and cherishing the harmony and useful intercourse subsisting between the two nations, to remove by timely arrangements what unfavorable incidents might otherwise render a ground of future misunderstanding. A convention has, therefore, been entered into, which provides for a practical demarcation of those limits to the satisfaction of both parties. —THIRD ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 26. FORD ED., viii, 270. (Oct. 1803.)

941. BOUNDARIES, United States and Spain.—The southern limits of Georgia depend chiefly on, 1. The charter of Carolina to the Lords Proprietors, in 1663, extending southwardly to the river Matheo, now called St. John's, supposed in the charter to be in latitude 31°, and 50° west in a direct line as far as the South Sea. See the charter in 4th Manoires de l'Amerique, 554. 2. On the proclamation of the British King, in 1763, establishing the boundary between Georgia and the two Floridas, to begin in the Mississippi, in thirty-one degrees of latitude north of the equator, and running eastwardly to the Apalachicola; thence, along the said river to the mouth of the Flint; thence, in a direct line, to the source of the St Mary's River, and down the same to the ocean. 3. On the treaties between the United States and Great Britain, of November 30, 1782, and September 3, 1783, repeating and confirming these ancient boundaries. There was an intermediate transaction, to wit: a convention concluded at the Pardo, in 1739, whereby it was agreed that Ministers Plenipotentiary should be immediately appointed by Spain and Great Britain for settling the limits of Florida and Carolina. The convention is to be found in the collections of treaties. But the proceedings of the Plenipotentiaries are unknown here. * * * —MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 573. FORD ED., v, 464. (1792.)

942. — — — To this demonstration of our rights may be added the explicit declaration of the court of Spain, that she would accede to them. This took place in conversations and correspondence thereon between Mr. Jay, Minister Plenipotentiary for the United States at the court of Madrid, the Marquis de Lafayette, and the Count de Florida Blanca. Monsieur de Lafayette, in his letter of February 19, 1783, to the Count de Florida Blanca, states the result of their conversations on limits in these words: "With respect to limits, his Catholic Majesty has adopted those that are determined by the preliminaries of the 30th of November, between the United States and the court of London." The Count de Florida Blanca, in his answer of February 22d, to M. de Lafayette, says, "although it is his Majesty's intention to abide for the present by the limits established by the treaty of the 30th of November, 1782, between the English and the Americans, the King intends to inform himself particularly whether it can be in any ways inconvenient or prejudicial to settle that affair amicably with the United States;" and M. de Lafayette, in his letter of the same day to Mr. Jay, wherein he had inserted the preceding, says, "On receiving the answer of the Count de Florida Blanca (to wit: his answer, before mentioned, to M. de Lafayette), I desired an explanation respecting the addition that relates to the limits. I was answered that it was a fixed principle to abide by the limits established by the treaty between the English and the Americans: that his remark related only to mere unimportant details, which he wished to receive from the Spanish commandants, which would be amicably regulated, and would by no means oppose the general principle. I asked him, before the Ambassador of France (M. de Montmorin), whether he would give me his word of honor for it; he assured me he would, and that I might engage it to the United States.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 574. FORD ED., v, 465. (1792.)

943. ——. To conclude the subject of boundary, the following condition is to be considered by the commissioners as a sine qua non: That our southern boundary remain established at the completion of thirty-one degrees of latitude on the Mississippi, and so on to the ocean, * * * and our western one along the middle of the channel of the Mississippi, however that channel may vary, as it is constantly varying, and that Spain cease to occupy, or to exercise jurisdiction in any part northward or eastward of these boundaries.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 585. FORD ED., v, 475. (1792.)

944. ——. It is not true that our ministers, in agreeing to establish the Colorado as our western boundary, had been obliged to exceed the authority of their instructions. Although we considered our title good as far as the Rio Bravo, yet in proportion to what they could obtain east of the Mississippi, they were to relinquish to the westward, and successive sacrifices were marked out, of which even the Colorado was not the last.*—To W. A. BURWELL. v, 20. FORD ED., viii, 469. (M., Sep. 1806.)

945. BOUNDARIES, Virginia and Maryland.—I suppose you are informed of the proceeding commenced by the Legislature of Maryland, to claim the south branch of the Potomac as their boundary, and thus of Albemarle, now the central county of the State, to make a frontier. As it is impossible upon any consistent principles, and after such a length of undisturbed possession, that they can expect to establish their claim, it can be ascribed to no other than intention to irritate and divide; and there can be no doubt from what bow the shaft is shot. However, let us cultivate Pennsylvania, and we need not fear the universe. The Assembly have named me among those who are to manage this controversy. But I am so averse to motion and contest, and the other members are so fully equal to the business, that I cannot undertake to act in it. I wish you were added to them.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 162. FORD ED., vii, 109. (M., Jan. 1797.)

946. BOUNTIES, Policy regarding.—It is not the policy of the government in America to give aid to works of any kind. They let things take their natural course without help or impediment, which is generally the best policy.—To THOMAS DIGGES. ii, 413. FORD ED., v, 29. (P., 1788.)

947. BOUNTIES, Recommended.—Among the purposes to which the Constitution permits Congress to apply money, the granting premiums or bounties is not enumerated, and there has never been a single instance of their doing it, although there has been a multiplicity of applications. The Constitution has left these encouragements to the separate States. I have in two or three messages to Congress recommended an amendment to the Constitution, which shall extend their power to these objects. But nothing is yet done in it. I fear, therefore, that the institution you propose must rest on the patronage of the State in which it is to be. I wish I could have answered you more to my own mind, as well as yours; but truth is the first object.—To DR. MAESE. v, 412. (W., Jan. 1809.)

948. BOURBONS, Incompetent.—A new trial of the Bourbons has proved to the world their incompetence to the functions of the stations they have occupied; and the recall of the usurper has clothed him with the semblance of a legitimate autocrat.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 458. (M., June 1815.)

949. BOWLES (W. A.), Incites Creek Indians.—I * * * enclose you [the British Minister] an extract of a letter * * * giving information of a Mr. Bowles,* lately come from England into the Creek country, endeavoring to excite that nation of Indians to war against the United States, and pretending to be employed by the government of England. We have other testimony of these pretensions, and that he carries them much farther than there stated. We have too much confidence in the justice and wisdom of the British government to believe they can approve of the proceedings of this incendiary and impostor, or countenance for a moment a person who takes the liberty of using their name for such a purpose.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. FORD ED., v. (Pa., 1791.)

950. ——. Of this adventurer the Spanish government rid us.—To CARMICHAEL AND SHORT. iv, 11. FORD ED., vi, 332. (Pa., 1793.)

951. BOYS, Sound Principles and.—The boys of the rising generation are to be the men of the next, and the sole guardians of the principles we deliver over to them.—To REV. MR. KNOX. v, 502. (M., 1810.) See CHILDREN.

952. BRAZIL, Condition of.—Procure for us all the information possible as to the strength, riches, resources, lights and dispositions of Brazil. The jealousy of the court of Lisbon on this subject will, of course, inspire you with due caution in making and communicating these inquiries.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. FORD ED., v, 317. (Pa., 1791.)

953. BRAZIL, Empire of.—Having learned the safe arrival of your Royal Highness at the city of Rio Janeiro I perform with pleasure the duty of offering you my sincere congratulations * * *. I trust that this event will be as propitious to the prosperity of your faithful subjects as to the happiness of your Royal Highness in which the United States of America have ever taken a lively interest. Inhabitants now of the same land, of that great continent which the genius of Columbus has given to the world, the United States feel sensibly that they stand in new and closer relations with your Royal Highness, and that the motives which heretofore nourished the friendly relations which have so happily prevailed, have acquired increased strength on the transfer of your residence to their shores. They see in prospect, a system of intercourse between the different regions of this hemisphere of which the peace and happiness of mankind may be the essential principle. To this principle your long tried adherence, for the benefit of those you governed, in the midst of warring powers, is a pledge to the new world that its peace, its free and friendly intercourse, will be your chief concern. On the part of the United States I assure you, that these which have hitherto been their ruling objects, will be most particularly cultivated with your Royal Highness and your subjects at Brazil, and they hope that that country so favored by the gifts of nature, now advanced to a station under your immediate auspices, will find, in the interchange of mutual wants and supplies, the true alimant of an unchanging friendship with the United States of America.—TO THE EMPEROR OF BRAZIL. v, 285. (May 1808.)

954. BRAZIL, Republicanism in.—I shall not wonder if Brazil should revolt in mass, and send their royal family back to Portugal. Brazil is more populous, more wealthy, more energetic, and as wise as Portugal.—TO MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 68. FORD ED., x, 85. (M., 1817.)

955. — — — Although we have no right to intermeddle with the form of government of other nations, yet it is lawful to wish to see no emperors nor kings in our hemisphere, and that Brazil as well as Mexico will homologize with us.—TO PRESIDENT MONROE. FORD ED., x, 244. (M., Dec. 1822.)

956. BRIBERY, Electoral.—No person shall be capable of acting in any office, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, who shall have given any bribe to obtain such office.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 28. (June 1776.)

957. — — — Every person * * * qualified to elect [to the House of Representatives of Virginia], shall be capable of being elected [to the House of Representatives]; provided he shall have given no bribe, either directly or indirectly, to any elector.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 14. (June 1776.)

958. — — — The Senators' qualifications shall be * * * the having given no bribe, directly or indirectly, to obtain their appointment.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 16. (June 1776.)

959. BRIBERY, Great Britain and.—The known practice [of the British Government] is to bribe whom they can, and whom they cannot to calumniate. They have found scoundrels in America, and either judging from that, or their own principles, they would pretend to believe all are so. If pride of character be of worth at any time, it is when it disarms the efforts of malice. What a miserable refuge is individual slander to so glorious a nation as Great Britain has been.—TO GENERAL NELSON. FORD ED., ii, 464. (R., 1781.)

960. BRIBERY, Jefferson and.—Of you, my neighbors, I may ask, in the face of the world, "whose ox have I taken, or whom have I defrauded? Whom have I oppressed, or of whose hand have I received a bribe to blind mine eyes therewith? On your verdict I rest with conscious security.—TO THE INHABITANTS OF ALBEMARLE COUNTY. v, 439. FORD ED., ix, 251. (M., April 1809.)

961. BRIBERY OF OFFICIALS.—In general, I am confident that you will receive notice of the [trade] regulations of this country [France] respecting their islands, by the way of those islands before you will from hence [Paris]. Nor can this be remedied but by a system of bribery which would end in the corruption of your own ministers, and produce no good adequate to the expense.—TO JAMES MONROE. i, 590. FORD ED., iv, 250. (P., 1786.) See CORRUPTION.

962. BRIGGS (Isaac), Scientific Attainments of.—I have appointed Isaac Briggs, of Maryland, surveyor of the lands south of Tennessee. He is a Quaker, a sound republican, and of a pure and unspotted character. In point of science, in astronomy, geometry and mathematics, he stands in a line with Mr. Ellicott, and second to no man in the United States. I recommend him to your particular patronage; the candor, modesty and simplicity of his manners cannot fail to gain your esteem. For the office of surveyor, men of the first order of science in astronomy and mathematics are essentially necessary.—TO GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. iv, 489. (W., 1803.)

963. BROGLIO (Marshal de), Character of.—The Marshal de Broglio, is a high flying aristocrat, cool and capable of everything.—TO JOHN JAY. iii, 74. (P., 1789.)

964. BROWN (James), Loyalty of.—That you ever participated in any plan for a division of the Union, I never for a moment believed. I knew your Americanism too well. But as the enterprise against Mexico was of a very different character, I had supposed what I heard on that subject to be possible. You disavow it; that is enough for me, and I forever dismiss the idea.—TO DR. JAMES BROWN. v, 378. FORD ED., ix, 210. (W., 1808.)

965. BUBBLES, Speculative.—The American mind is now in that state of fever which the world has so often seen in the history of other nations. We are under the bank bubble, as England was under the South Sea bubble, France under the Mississippi bubble, and as every nation is liable to be, under whatever bubble, design, or delusion may puff up in moments when off their guard.—TO CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 515. FORD ED., x, 2. (M., Jan. 1816.) See SPECULATION.

966. BUCHAN (Earl of), Character.—He is an honorable, patriotic, and virtuous character [and], was in correspondence with Dr. Franklin and General Washington.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 287. (W., 1804.)

967. BUCHANAN (George), Works of.—The title of the tract of Buchanan which you propose to translate was familiar to me, and I possessed the tract; but no circumstance had ever led me to look into it. Yet I think nothing more likely than that, in the free spirit of that age and state of society, principles should be avowed, which were felt and followed, although unwritten in the Scottish constitution. Undefined powers had been intrusted to the crown, undefined rights retained by the people, and these depended for their maintenance on the spirit of the people, which, in that day was dependence sufficient.—To REV. MR. KNOX. v, 502. (M., 1810.)

968. ———. His latinity is so pure as to claim a place in school reading.—To REV. MR. KNOX. v, 502. (M., 1810.)

969. BUFFON (Count de), Animal theories refuted.—The opinion advanced by the Count de Buffon, is, 1. That the animals common both to the old and new world are smaller in the latter. 2. That those peculiar to the new are on a smaller scale. 3. That those which have been domesticated in both have degenerated in America; and 4. That on the whole it exhibits fewer species. And the reason he thinks is, that the heats of America are less; that more waters are spread over its surface by nature, and fewer of these drained off by the hand of man. In other words, that heat is friendly, and moisture adverse to the production and development of large quadrupeds. I will not meet this hypothesis on its first doubtful ground, whether the climate of America be comparatively more humid, because we are not furnished with observations sufficient to decide this question. And though, till it be decided, we are as free to deny as others are to affirm the fact, yet for a moment let it be supposed. The hypothesis after this supposition, proceeds to another; that moisture is unfriendly to animal growth. The truth of this is inscrutable to us by reasonings à priori. Nature has hidden from us her modus agendi. Our only appeal on such questions is to experience; and I think that experience is against the supposition. It is by the assistance of heat and moisture that vegetables are elaborated from the elements of earth, air, water, and fire. We accordingly see the more humid climates produce the greater quantity of vegetables. Vegetables are mediately or immediately the food of every animal; and in proportion to the quantity of food, we see animals not only multiplied in their numbers, but improved in their bulk, as far as the laws of their nature will admit. Of this opinion is the Count de Buffon himself in another part of his work: "En general il paroît que les pays un peu froids conviennent mieux à nos bœufs que les pays chauds et qu'ils sont d'autant plus gros et plus grands que le climat est plus humide et plus abondans en paturages. Les bœufs de Danemarck, de la Podolie, de l'Ukraine et de la Tartarie qu'habitent les Calmouques sont les plus grands de tous." Here then a race of animals, and one of the largest too, has been increased in its dimensions by cold and moisture, in direct opposition to the hypothesis, which supposes that these two circumstances diminish animal bulk, and that it is their contraries, heat and dryness which enlarge it.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 290. FORD ED., iii, 135. (1782.)

970. ———. The mammoth should have sufficed to have rescued the earth it inhabited, and the atmosphere it breathed, from the imputation of impotence in the conception and nourishment of animal life on a large scale; to have stifled, in its birth, the opinion of a writer, the most learned, too, of all others in the science of animal history, that in the new world, "La nature vivante est beaucoup moins agissante, beaucoup moins forte"; that nature is less active, less energetic on one side of the globe than she is on the other. As if both sides were not warmed by the same genial sun; as if a soil of the same chemical composition was less capable of elaboration into animal nutriment; as if the fruits and grains from that soil and sun yielded a less rich chyle, gave less extension to the solids and fluids of the body, or produced sooner in the cartilages, membranes, and fibres, that rigidity which restrains all further extension, and terminates animal growth. The truth is that a pigmy and a Patagonian, a mouse and a mammoth, derive their dimensions from the same nutritive juices. The difference of increment depends on circumstances unsearchable to beings with our capacities. Every race of animals seems to have received from their Maker certain laws of extension at the time of their formation. Their elaborate organs were formed to produce this, while proper obstacles were opposed to its further progress. Below these limits they cannot fall, nor rise above them. What intermediate station they shall take may depend on soil, on climate, on food, on a careful choice of breeders. But all the manna of heaven would never raise the mouse to the bulk of the mammoth.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 289. FORD ED., iii, 134. (1782.) See MAMMOTH.

971. BUFFON (Count de), Gifts to.—I wrote to some of my friends in America desiring they would send me such of the spoils of the moose, caribou, elk and deer, as might throw light on that class of animals. * * * I am happy to be able to present to you * * * the bones and skin of a moose, the horns of the caribou, the elk, the deer, the spiked horned buck, and the roebuck of America. They all come from New Hampshire and Massachusetts.—To COMTE DE BUFFON. ii, 285. FORD ED., iv, 457. (P., 1787.)

972. BUNKER HILL, Battle of.—Bunker's Hill, or rather Breed's Hill, whereon the action was, is a peninsula joined to the mainland by a neck of land almost level with the water, a few paces wide, and about one or two hundred toises long. On one side of this neck lay a vessel of war, and on the other several gunboats. The body of our army was on the mainland; and only a detachment had been sent into the peninsula. When the enemy determined to make the attack, they sent the vessel of war and gunboats to take the position, before mentioned, to cut off all reinforcements, which they effectually did. Not so much as a company could venture to the relief of the men engaged, who therefore fought through the whole action, and at length were obliged to retire across the neck through the cross fire of the vessels before mentioned. Single persons passed along the neck during the engagement, particularly General Putnam.—To M. SOULES. ix, 293. FORD ED., iv, 301. (P., 1786.)

973. BURKE (Edmund), Toryism of.—The Revolution of France does not astonish me so much as the revolution of Mr. Burke. I wish I could believe the latter proceeded from as pure motives as the former. But what demonstration could scarcely have established before, less than the hints of Dr. Priestley and Mr. Paine establish firmly now. How mortifying that this evidence of the rottenness of his mind must oblige us now to ascribe to wicked motives those actions of his life which wore the mark of virtue and patriotism.—To BENJAMIN VAUGHAN. FORD ED., v, 333. (1791.)

974. BUSINESS, Visionary Principles in.—Men come into business at first with visionary principles. It is practice alone which can correct and conform them to the actual current of affairs. In the meantime, those to whom their errors were first applied have been their victims.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., v, 16. (P., 1788.)

975. BURR (Aaron), Characteristics of.—I never thought him an honest, frank-dealing man, but considered him as a crooked gun, or other perverted machine, whose aim or shot you could never be sure of. Still, while he possessed the confidence of the nation, I thought it my duty to respect in him their confidence, and to treat him as if he deserved it.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. v, 68. FORD ED., ix, 46. (M., April 1807.)

976. BURR (Aaron), Distrust of.—I had never seen Colonel Burr till he came here as a member of the Senate. His conduct very soon inspired me with distrust. I habitually cautioned Mr. Madison against trusting him too much. I saw afterwards that under General Washington's and Mr. Adams's administrations, whenever a great military appointment or a diplomatic one was to be made, he came post to Philadelphia to show himself and in fact that he was always at market, if they had wanted him. He was indeed told by Dayton in 1800 he might be Secretary of War; but this bid was too late. His election as V. P. was then foreseen. With these impressions of Colonel Burr there never had been any intimacy between us, and but little association. When I destined him for a high appointment, it was out of respect for the favor he had obtained with the republican party by his extraordinary exertions and successes in the New York election in 1800.—ANAS. ix, 207. FORD ED., i, 304. (1804.)

977. BURR (Aaron), Feeling toward.—Against Burr, personally, I never had one hostile sentiment.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. v, 68. FORD ED., ix, 46. (M., April 1807.)

978. BURR (Aaron), Honesty and.—No man's history proves better the value of honesty. With that, what might he not have been!—To LEVI LINCOLN. v, 55. (W., 1807.)

979. BURR (Aaron), Overrated Talents.—Burr has indeed made a most inglorious exhibition of his much overrated talents.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. v, 55. FORD ED., ix, 38. (W., 1807.)

980. — — — A great man in little things, he is really small in great ones.—To GEORGE HAY. v, 88. FORD ED., ix, 55. (W., 1807.)

981. BURR (Aaron), Political Services.—He has certainly greatly merited of his country, and the republicans in particular, to whose efforts his have given a chance of success.—To PIERCE BUTLER. FORD ED., vii, 449. (Aug. 1800.)

982. — — — While I must congratulate you on the issue of this contest [the Presidential], because it is more honorable, and, doubtless, more grateful to you than any station within the competence of the Chief Magistrate, yet for myself, and for the substantial service of the public, I feel most sensibly the loss we sustain of your aid in our new administration. It leaves a chasm in my arrangements, which cannot be adequately filled up. I had endeavored to compose an administration whose talents, integrity, names, and dispositions, should at once inspire unbounded confidence in the public mind, and insure a perfect harmony in the conduct of the public business. I lose you from the list, and am not sure of all the others. Should the gentlemen, who possess the public confidence, decline taking a part in their affairs, and force us to take persons unknown to the people, the evil genius of this country may realize his avowal that "he will beat down the administration."—To AARON BURR. iv, 341. FORD ED., vii, 467. (W., Dec. 1800.)

983. BURR (Aaron), Presidential Contest.—It was to be expected that the enemy would endeavor to sow tares between us, that they might divide us and our friends. Every consideration satisfies me you will be on your guard against this, as I assure you I am strongly. I hear of one stratagem so imposing and so base that it is proper I should notice it to you. Mr. Munford says he saw at New York an original letter of mine to Judge Breckenridge, in which are sentiments highly injurious to you. He knows my handwriting, and did not doubt that to be genuine. I enclose you a copy taken from the press copy of the only letter I ever wrote to Judge Breckenridge in my life. * * * Of consequence, the letter seen by Mr. Munford must be a forgery, and if it contains a sentiment unfriendly or disrespectful to you, I affirm it solemnly to be a forgery; as also if it varies from the copy enclosed. With the common trash of slander I should not think of troubling you; but the forgery of one's handwriting is too imposing to be neglected.—To AARON BURR. iv, 349. FORD ED., vii, 485. (W., Feb. 1801.) See ELECTIONS—PRESIDENTIAL, 1800.

dent, called on me in the evening [January 26th, 1804], having previously asked an opportunity of conversing with me. He began by recapitulating summarily, that he had come to New York a stranger, some years ago; that he found the country in possession of two rich families (the Livingstons and Clintons); that his pursuits were not political, and he meddled not. When the crisis, however, of 1800 came on, they found their influence worn out, and solicited his aid with the people. He lent it without any views of promotion. That his being named as a candidate for Vice-President was unexpected by him. He acceded to it with a view to promote my fame and advancement, and from a desire to be with me, whose company and conversation had always been fascinating to him. That since, those great families had become hostile to him, and had excited the calumnies which I had seen published. That in this Hamilton had joined, and had even written some of the pieces against him. That his attachment to me had been sincere, and was still unchanged, although many little stories had been carried to him, and he supposed to me also, which he despised; but that attachment must be reciprocal or cease to exist, and, therefore, he asked if any change had taken place in mine towards him; that he had chosen to have this conversation with myself directly, and not through any intermediate agent. He reminded me of a letter written to him about the time of counting the votes (say February, 1801), mentioning that his election had left a chasm in my arrangements; that I had lost him from my list in the Administration, &c. He observed, he believed it would be for the interest of the republican cause for him to retire; that a disadvantageous schism would otherwise take place; but that were he to retire, it would be said he shrunk from the public sentence, which he never would do; that his enemies were using my name to destroy him, and something was necessary from me to prevent and deprive them of that weapon, some mark of favor from me which would declare to the world that he retired with my confidence.

I answered by recapitulating to him what had been my conduct previous to the election of 1800. That I had never interfered directly or indirectly with my friends or any others, to influence the election either for him or myself; that I considered it as my duty to be merely passive, except that in Virginia, I had taken some measures to procure for him the unanimous vote of that State, because I thought any failure there might be imputed to me. That in the election now coming on, I was observing the same conduct, held no councils with anybody respecting it, nor suffered any one to speak to me on the subject, believing it my duty to leave myself to the free discussion of the public; that I do not at this moment know, nor have ever heard, who were to be proposed as candidates for the public choice, except so far as could be gathered from the newspapers. That as to the attack excited against him in the newspapers, I had noticed it but as the passing wind; that I had seen complaints that Cheetham, employed in publishing the laws, should be permitted to eat the public bread and abuse its second officer; that as to this, the publishers of the laws were appointed by the Secretary of State, without any reference to me; that to make the notice general, it was often given to one republican and one federal printer of the same place; that these federal printers did not in the least intermit their abuse of me, though receiving emoluments from the government, and that I never thought it proper to interfere for myself, and consequently not in the case of the Vice-President. That as to the letter he referred to, I remembered it, and believed he had only mistaken the date at which it was written; that I thought it must have been on the first notice of the event of the election of South Carolina; and that I had taken that occasion to mention to him, that I had intended to have proposed to him one of the great offices, if he had not been elected; but that his election in giving him a higher station had deprived me of his aid in the Administration. The letter alluded to was, in fact, mine to him of December the 15th, 1800. I now went on to explain to him verbally, what I meant by saying I had lost him from my list. That in General Washington's time, it had been signified to him that Mr. Adams, the Vice-President, would be glad of a foreign embassy; that General Washington mentioned it to me, expressed his doubts whether Mr. Adams was a fit character for such an office, and his still greater doubts, indeed his conviction, that it would not be justifiable to send away the person who, in case of his death, was provided by the Constitution to take his place; that it would moreover appear indecent for him to be disposing of the public trusts, in apparently buying off a competitor for the public favor. I concurred with him in the opinion, and, if I recollect rightly, Hamilton, Knox, and Randolph were consulted and gave the same opinions. That when Mr. Adams came to the Administration, in his first interview with me, he mentioned the necessity of a mission to France, and how desirable it would have been to him if he could have got me to undertake it; but that he conceived it would be wrong in him to send me away, and assigned the same reasons General Washington had done; and, therefore, he should appoint Mr. Madison, &c. That I had myself contemplated his (Colonel Burr's) appointment to one of the great offices, in case he was not elected Vice-President; but that as soon as that election was known, I saw it could not be done, for the good reasons which had led General Washington and Mr. Adams to the same conclusion; and therefore, in my first letter to Colonel Burr, after the issue was known, I had mentioned to him that a chasm in my arrangements had been produced by this event. I was thus particular in rectifying the date of this letter, because it gave me an opportunity of explaining the grounds on which it was written, which were, indirectly an answer to his present hints. He left the matter with me for consideration, and the conversation was turned to indifferent subjects. I should here notice, that Colonel Burr must have thought that I could swallow strong things in my own favor, when he founded his acquiescence in the nomination as Vice-President, to his desire of promoting my honor, the being with me, whose company and conversation had always been fascinating with him, &c.—THE ANAS. ix, 204. FORD ED., i, 301. (Jan. 1804.)

985. BURR (Aaron), Threatens Jefferson.—About a month ago [March 1806] Colonel Burr called on me, and entered into a conversation, in which he mentioned that a little before my coming into office, I had written to him a letter intimating that I had destined him for high employ, had he not been placed by the people in a different one; that he had signified his willingness to resign as Vice-President, to give aid to the Administration in any other place, that he had never asked an office, however; he asked aid of nobody, but could walk on his own legs and take care of himself; that

I had always used him with politeness, but nothing more; that he aided in bringing on the present order of things; that he had supported the Administration; and that he could do me much harm; he wished, however, to be on different ground; he was now disengaged from all particular business—willing to engage in something—should be in town some days, if I should have anything to propose to him. I observed to him, that I had always been sensible that he possessed talents which might be employed greatly to the advantage of the public, and that as to myself, I had a confidence that if he were employed, he would use his talents for the public good; but that he must be sensible the public had withdrawn their confidence from him, and that in a government like ours it was necessary to embrace in its administration as great a mass of public confidence as possible, by employing those who had a character with the public, of their own, and not merely a secondary one through the Executive. He observed, that if we believed a few newspapers, it might be supposed he had lost the public confidence, but that I knew how easy it was to engage newspapers in anything. I observed, that I did not refer to that kind of evidence of his having lost the public confidence, but to the late Presidential election, when, though in possession of the office of Vice-President, there was not a single voice heard for his retaining it. That as to any harm he could do me, I knew no cause why he should desire it, but, at the same time, I feared no injury which any man could do me; that I never had done a single act, or been concerned in any transaction, which I feared to have fully laid open, or which could do me any hurt, if truly stated; that I had never done a single thing with a view to my personal interest, or that of any friend, or with any other view than that of the greatest public good; that, therefore, no threat or fear on that head would ever be a motive of action with me. I did not commit these things to writing at the time, but I do it now, because in a suit between him and Cheetham, he has had a deposition of Mr. Bayard taken, which seems to have no relation to the suit, nor to any other object than to calumniate me. Bayard pretends to have addressed to me, during the pending of the Presidential election in February, 1801, through General Samuel Smith, certain conditions on which my election might be obtained, and that General Smith, after conversing with me, gave answers from me. This is absolutely false. No proposition of any kind was ever made to me on that occasion by General Smith, nor any answer authorized by me. And this fact General Smith affirms at this moment.—THE ANAS. ix, 208. FORD ED., i, 311. (April 1806.)

986. BURR'S (A.) TREASON, Counteracted.—During the last session of Congress, Colonel Burr who was here [Washington], finding no hope of being employed in any department of the government, opened himself confidentially to some persons on whom he thought he could rely, on a scheme of separating the Western from the Atlantic States, and erecting the former into an independent confederacy. He had before made a tour of those States which had excited suspicions, as every nation does of such a Catalinian character. * * * We [the cabinet] are of opinion unanimously, that confidential letters be written to the Governors of Ohio, Indiana, Mississippi and Orleans * * * to have him strictly watched and on his committing any overt act unequivocally, to have him arrested and tried for treason, misdeemeanor, or whatever other offence the act may amount to. And in like manner to arrest and try any of his followers committing acts against the laws.—ANAS. FORD ED., i, 318. (July 1806.)

987. BURR'S (A.) TREASON, Decoys.—Burr has been able to decoy a great proportion of his people by making them believe the government secretly approves of this expedition against the Spanish territories. We are looking with anxiety to see what exertions the Western country will make in the first instance for their own defence; and I confess that my confidence in them is entire.—TO GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. FORD ED., viii, 502. (W., Dec. 1806.)

988. — — — It is understood that wherever Burr met with subjects who did not choose to embark in his projects, unless approved by their government, he asserted that he had that approbation. Most of them took his word for it, but it is said that with those who would not, the following stratagem was practiced. A forged letter, purporting to be from General Dearborn, was made to express his approbation, and to say that I was absent at Monticello, but that there was no doubt that, on my return, my approbation of his enterprises would be given. This letter was spread open on his table, so as to invite the eye of whoever entered his room, and he contrived occasions of sending up into his room those whom he wished to become witnesses of his acting under sanction. By this means he avoided committing himself to any liability to prosecution for forgery, and gave another proof of being a great man in little things, while he is really small in great ones. I must add General Dearborn's declaration, that he never wrote a letter to Burr in his life, except that when here, once in a winter, he usually wrote him a billet of invitation to dine.—TO GEORGE HAY. v, 87. FORD ED., ix, 54. (W., June 1807.)

989. BURR'S (A.) TREASON, Designs of.—The designs of our Cataline are as real as they are romantic, but the parallel he has selected from history for the model of his own course corresponds but by halves. It is true in its principal character, but the materials to be employed are totally different from the scourgings of Rome. I am confident he will be completely deserted on the appearance of the proclamation, because his strength was to consist of people who had been persuaded that the government connived at the enterprise.—TO CAESAR A. RODNEY. FORD ED., viii, 497. (W., Dec. 1806.)

990. — — — Burr's object is to take possession of New Orleans, as a station whence to make an expedition against Vera Cruz and Mexico. His party began their formation at the mouth of the Beaver, whence they started the 1st or 2d of this month, and would collect all the way down the Ohio. We trust that the opposition we have provided at Marietta, Cincinnati, Louisville, and Massac will be sufficient to stop him; but we are not certain because we do not know his strength. It is, therefore, possible he may escape, and then his great rendezvous is to be at Natchez. * * * We expect you will collect all your force of militia, act in conjunction with Colonel Freeman, and take such a stand as shall be concluded best.—TO GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. FORD ED., viii, 501. (W., Dec. 1806.)

991. — — — His first enterprise was to have been to seize New Orleans, which he supposed would powerfully bridle the upper country, and place him at the door of Mexico.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. v, 131. FORD ED., x, 144. (W., July 1807.)

992. ——. Burr's enterprise is the most extraordinary since the days of Don Quixote. It is so extravagant that those who know his understanding, would not believe it if the proofs admitted doubt. He has meant to place himself on the throne of Montezuma, and extend his empire to the Alleghany, seizing on New Orleans as the instrument of compulsion for western States.—To REV. CHAS. CLAY. v, 28. FORD ED., ix, 7. (W., Jan. 1807.)

993. BURE'S (A.) TREASON, Fearless of.—For myself, even in Burr's most flattering periods of the conspiracy, I never entertained one moment's fear. My long and intimate knowledge of my countrymen, satisfied and satisfies me, that let there ever be occasion to display the banners of the law, and the world will see how few and pitiful are those who shall array themselves in opposition.—To DR. JAMES BROWN. v, 379. FORD ED., ix, 211. (W., Oct. 1808.)

994. BURE'S (A.) TREASON, Flagitious.—His conspiracy has been one of the most flagitious of which history will ever furnish an example. He meant to separate the Western States from us, to add Mexico to them, place himself at their head, establish what he would deem an energetic government, and thus provide an example and an instrument for the subversion of our freedom. The man who could expect to effect this, with American materials, must be a fit subject for Bedlam.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. v, 129. FORD ED., ix, 113. (W., July 1807.)

995. ——. Burr's conspiracy has been one of the most flagitious of which history will ever furnish an example. He had combined the objects of separating the Western States from us, of adding Mexico to them, and of placing himself at their head. But he who could expect to effect such objects by the aid of American citizens, must be perfectly ripe for Bedlam.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 128. FORD ED., ix, 111. (W., July 1807.)

996. BURE'S (A.) TREASON, Louisiana and.—It has given me infinite satisfaction that not a single native Creole of Louisiana, and but one American, settled there before the delivery of the country to us, were in his interest. His partisans there were made up of fugitives from justice, or from their debts, who had flocked there from other parts of the United States, after the delivery of the country, and of adventurers and speculators of all descriptions.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 128. FORD ED., ix, 113. (W., July 1807.)

997. ——. The native inhabitants were unshaken in their fidelity. But there was a small band of American adventurers who had fled from their debts, and who were longing to dip their hands into the mines of Mexico, enlisted in Burr's double project of attacking that country, and severing our Union. Had Burr had a little success in the upper country, these parricides would have joined him.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. FORD ED., ix, 65. (W., May 1807.)

998. BURE'S (A.) TREASON, The People and.—The hand of the people has given the mortal blow to a conspiracy which, in other countries, would have called for an appeal to armies, and has proved that government to be the strongest of which every man feels himself a part. It is a happy illustration, too, of the importance of preserving to the State authorities all that vigor which the Constitution foresaw would be necessary, not only for their own safety, but for that of the whole.—To GOVERNOR H. D. TIFFIN. v, 38. FORD ED., ix, 21. (W., Feb. 1807.)

999. ——. The whole business has shown that neither Burr nor his [associates] knew anything of the people of this country. A simple proclamation informing the people of these combinations, and calling on them to suppress them, produced an instantaneous levee en masse of our citizens wherever there appeared anything to lay hold of, and the whole was crushed in one instant.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. FORD ED., ix, 66. (W., May 1807.)

1000. BURE'S (A.) TREASON, Punishment of.—Their crimes are defeated, and whether they shall be punished or not belongs to another department, and is not the subject of even a wish on my part.—To J. H. NICHOLSON. v, 45. FORD ED., ix, 31. (W., Feb. 1807.)

1001. BURE'S (A.) TREASON, Self-government and.—The suppression of the late conspiracy by the hand of the people, uplifted to destroy it wherever it reared its head, manifests their fitness for self-government, and the power of a nation, of which every individual feels that his own will is part of the public authority.—R. to A. NEW JERSEY LEGISLATURE. viii, 122. (Dec. 1807.)

1002. BURE'S (A.) TREASON, Strength of Government and.—The proof we have lately seen of the innate strength of our government, is one of the most remarkable which history has recorded, and shows that we are a people capable of self-government, and worthy of it. The moment that a proclamation apprised our citizens that there were traitors among them, and what was the object, they rose upon them wherever they lurked, and crushed by their own strength what would have produced the march of armies and civil war in any other country. The government which can wield the arm of the people must be the strongest possible. To MR. WEAVER. v, 89. (W., June 1807.)

1003. ——. Nothing has ever so strongly proved the innate force of our form of government, as this conspiracy. Burr had probably engaged one thousand men to follow his fortunes, without letting them know his projects, otherwise than by assuring them that the government approved them. The moment a proclamation was issued, undeceiving them, he found himself left with about thirty desperadoes only. The people rose in mass wherever he was, or was suspected to be, and by their own energy the thing was crushed in one instant, without its having been necessary to employ a man of the military but to take care of their respective stations.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. v, 130. FORD ED., ix, 114. (W., July 1807.)

1004. ——. This affair has been a great confirmation in my mind of the innate strength of the form of our government. He had probably induced near a thousand men to engage with him, by making them believe the government connived at it. A proclamation alone, by undeceiving them, so completely disarmed him, that he had not above thirty men left, ready to go all lengths with him.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 128. FORD ED., ix, 111. (W., July 1807.)

1005. BURR'S (A.) TREASON, Suppressed.—I informed Congress at their last session* of the enterprises against the public peace which were believed to be in preparation by Aaron Burr and his associates, of the measures taken to defeat them, and to bring the offenders to justice. Their enterprises were happily defeated by the patriotic exertions of the militia wherever called into action, by the fidelity of the army, and energy of the commander-in-chief in promptly arranging the difficulties presenting themselves on the Sabine, repairing to meet those arising on the Mississippi, and dissipating, before their explosion, plots engendering them.—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 87. FORD ED., ix, 162. (Oct. 1807.)

1006. BURR'S (A.) TREASON, Western Loyalty.—The enterprise has done good by proving that the attachment of the people in the West is as firm as that in the East to the union of our country, and by establishing a mutual and universal confidence.—TO MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. FORD ED., ix, 66. (W., May 1807.)

1007. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Arrest.—Your sending here [Washington] Swartwout and Ballman and adding to them Burr, Blennerhassett and Tyler, should they fall into your hands, will be supported by the public opinion. * * * I hope, however, you will not extend this deportation to persons against whom there is only suspicion, or shades of offence not strongly marked. In that case, I fear the public sentiment would desert you: because seeing no danger here, violations of law are felt with strength.—TO GENERAL WILKINSON. v, 39. FORD ED., ix, 4. (W., Feb. 1807.)

1008. ———. That the arrest of Colonel Burr was military has been disproved; but had it been so, every honest man and good citizen is bound, by any means in his power, to arrest the author of projects so daring and dangerous.—TO EDMUND PENDLETON GAINES. v, 141. FORD ED., ix, 122. (W., July 1807.)

— BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Bollman's confession.—See BOLLMAN.

1009. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Charges.—I do suppose the following overt acts will be proved. 1. The enlistment of men in a regular way. 2. The regular mounting of guard round Blennerhassett's Island * * *. 3. The rendezvous of Burr with his men at the mouth of the Cumberland. 4. His letter to the acting Governor of Mississippi, holding up the prospect of civil war. 5. His capitulation regularly signed with the aids of the Governor, as between two independent and hostile commanders.—TO WILLIAM B. GILES. v, 66. FORD ED., ix, 43. (M., April 1807.)

1010. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Conviction doubtful.—That there should be anxiety and doubt in the public mind, in the present defective state of the proof, is not wonderful; and this has been sedulously encouraged by the tricks of the judges to force trials before it is possible to collect the evidence, dispersed through a line of two thousand miles from Maine to Orleans.—TO WILLIAM B. GILES. v, 65. FORD ED., ix, 42. (M., April 1807.)

1011. ———. Although there is not a man in the United States who doubts his guilt, such are the jealous provisions of our laws in favor of the accused against the accuser, that I question if he is convicted.—TO MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. v, 130. FORD ED., ix, 113. (W., July 1807.)

1012. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Court rulings.—Hitherto we have believed our law to be, that suspicion on probable grounds was sufficient cause to commit a person for trial, allowing time to collect witnesses till the trial. But the judges have decided, that conclusive evidence of guilt must be ready in the moment of arrest, or they will discharge the malefactor. If this is still insisted on, Burr will be discharged; because his crimes having been sown from Maine through the whole line of the western waters to New Orleans, we cannot bring the witnesses here under four months.—TO JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 65. FORD ED., ix, 41. (W., April 1807.)

1013. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Evidence required.—A moment's calculation will show that the evidence cannot be collected under four months, probably five, from the moment of deciding when and where the trial shall be. I desired Mr. Rodney [Attorney General] expressly to inform the Chief Justice of this, unofficially. But Mr. Marshall says: "More than five weeks have elapsed since the opinion of the Supreme Court has declared the necessity of proving the overt acts, if they exist. Why are they not proved?" In what terms of decency can we speak of this? As if an express could go to Natchez, or the mouth of the Cumberland, and return in five weeks, to do what has never taken less than twelve. Again: "If, in November or December last, a body of troops had been assembled on the Ohio, it is impossible to suppose the affidavits establishing the fact could not have been obtained by the last of March." But I ask the judge where they should have been lodged? At Frankfort? at Cincinnati? at Nashville? St. Louis? Natchez? New Orleans? These were the probable places of apprehension and examination. It was not known at Washington till the 26th of March that Burr would escape from the Western tribunals, be retaken and brought to an Eastern one; and in five days after (neither five months nor five weeks, as the judge calculated), he says, "it is impossible to suppose the affidavits could not have been obtained". Where? At Richmond he certainly meant, or meant only to throw dust in the eyes of his audience. But all the principles of law are to be perverted which would bear on the favorite offenders who endeavor to overturn this odious Republic. "I understand", says the judge, "probable cause of guilt to be a case made out by proof furnishing good reason to believe", &c. Speaking as a lawyer, he must mean legal proof, i. e., proof on oath, at least. But this is confounding probability and proof. We had always before understood that where there was reasonable ground to believe guilt, the offender must be put on his trial. That guilty intentions were probable, the judge believed. And as to the overt acts, were not the bundle of letters of information in Mr. Rodney's hands, the letters and facts published in the local newspapers, Burr's flight, and the universal belief or rumor of his guilt, probable ground for presuming the facts of enlistment, military guard, rendezvous, threats of civil war, or capitulation, so as to put him on trial? Is there a candid man in the United States who does not believe some one, if not all, of these overt acts to have taken place?—TO WILLIAM B. GILES. v, 67. FORD ED., ix, 44. (M., April 1807.)

* Jefferson sent a message to Congress, January 22, 1807, giving a record of the facts in Burr's conspiracy.

— BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Executive Papers demanded.—See PAPERS (EXECUTIVE).

1014. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Federalist support.—The federalists appear to make Burr's cause their own, and to spare no efforts to screen his adherents. Their great mortification is at the failure of his plans. Had a little success dawned on him, their openly joining him might have produced some danger.—To COLONEL G. MORGAN. v, 57. (W., March 1807.)

1015. — — — The federalists, too, give all their aid, making Burr's cause their own, mortified only that he did not separate the Union or overturn the government, and proving, that had he had a little dawn of success, they would have joined him to introduce his object, their favorite monarchy, as they would any other enemy, foreign or domestic, who could rid them of this hateful Republic for any other government in exchange.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. v, 66. FORD ED., ix, 42. (M., April 1807.)

1016. — — — The fact is that the federalists make Burr's case their own, and exert their whole influence to shield him from punishment, as they did the adherents of Miranda. And it is unfortunate that federalism is still predominant in our Judiciary department, which is in opposition to the Legislative and Executive branches, and is able to baffle their measures often.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 65. FORD ED., ix, 41. (W., April 1807.)

1017. — — — The first ground of complaint [by the federalists] was the supine inattention of the Administration to a treason stalking through the land in open day. The present one, that they have crushed it before it was ripe for execution, so that no overt acts can be produced. This last may be true; though I believe it is not. Our information having been chiefly by way of letter, we do not know of a certainty yet what will be proved. We have set on foot an inquiry through the whole of the country which has been the scene of these transactions, to be able to prove to the courts, if they will give time, or to the public by way of communication to Congress, what the real facts have been. For obtaining this, we are obliged to appeal to the patriotism of particular persons in different places, of whom we have requested to make the inquiry in their neighborhood, and on such information as shall be voluntarily offered. Aided by no process or facilities from the federal courts, but frowned on by their new born zeal for the liberty of those men whom we would not permit to overthrow the liberties of their country, we can expect no revelations from the accomplices of the chief offender. Of treasonable intentions the judges have been obliged to confess there is probable appearance. What loophole they will find in the case, when it comes to trial, we cannot foresee. Eaton, Stoddart, Wilkinson, and two others whom I must not name, will satisfy the world, if not the judges, of Burr's guilt.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. v, 66. FORD ED., ix, 42. (M., April 1807.)

1018. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Grand Jury and.—The favor of the marshal and the judge promises Burr all which can depend on them. A grand jury of two "feds", four "quids" and ten republicans, does not seem to be a fair representation of the State of Virginia. I have always entertained a high opinion of the marshal's integrity and political correctness. But in a State where there are not more than eight "quids", how five of them should have been summoned to one jury, is difficult to explain from accident. But all this will show the original error of establishing a judiciary independent of the nation, and which, from the citadel of the law, can turn its guns on those they were meant to defend, and control and fashion their proceedings to its own will.—To JOHN W. EPPES. FORD ED., ix, 68. (W., May 1807.)

1019. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Guilt clear.—Before an impartial jury, Burr's conduct would convict himself, were not one word of testimony to be offered against him. But to what a state will our law be reduced by party feelings in those who administer it?—To GEORGE HAY. v, 174. FORD ED., ix, 62. (M., Aug. 1807.)

— BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Jefferson Subpoenaed.—See PRESIDENT.

1020. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Judiciary Partisanship.—If there ever had been an instance in this or the preceding administrations, of federal judges so applying principles of law as to condemn a federal or acquit a republican offender, I should have judged them in the present case with more charity. All this, however, will work well. The nation will judge both the offender and judges for themselves. If a member of the Executive or Legislature does wrong, the day is never far distant when the people will remove him. They will see then and amend the error in our Constitution, which makes any branch independent of the nation. They will see that one of the great coordinate branches of the government, setting itself in opposition to the other two, and to the common sense of the nation, proclaims impunity to that class of offenders which endeavors to overturn the Constitution, and are themselves protected in it by the Constitution itself; for impeachment is a farce which will not be tried again. If their protection of Burr produces this amendment, it will do more good than his condemnation would have done. * * * If his punishment can be commuted now for an useful amendment of the Constitution, I shall rejoice in it.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. v, 68. FORD ED., ix, 45. (M., April 1807.)

1021. — — — Burr's trial goes on to the astonishment of all, as to the manner of conducting it.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 172. (M., Aug. 1807.)

1022. — — — The scenes which have been acted at Richmond are such as have never before been exhibited in any country where all regard to public character has not yet been thrown off. They are equivalent to a proclamation of impunity to every traitorous combination which may be formed to destroy the Union; and they preserve a head for all such combinations as may be formed within, and a centre for all the intrigues and machinations which foreign governments may nourish to disturb us. However, they will produce an amendment to the Constitution which, keeping the judges independent of the Executive, will not leave them so, of the nation.—To GENERAL WILKINSON. v, 108. FORD ED., ix, 142. (M., Sep. 1807.)

1023. — — — The scenes which have been acting at Richmond are sufficient to fill us with alarm. We had supposed we possessed fixed laws to guard us equally against treason and oppression. But it now appears we have no law but the will of the judge. Never will chicanery have a more difficult task than has been

now accomplished to warp the text of the law to the will of him who is to construe it. Our case, too, is the more desperate, as the attempt to make the law plainer by amendment is only throwing out new amendments for sophistry.—To WILLIAM THOMPSON. FORD ED., ix, 143. (M., Sep. 1807.)

— BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Judge Marshall and.—See MARBURY vs. MADISON, MARSHALL.

1024. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Release.—The event has been—(blank in the original) not only to clear Burr, but to prevent the evidence from ever going before the world. But this latter case must not take place. It is now, therefore, more than ever indispensable, that not a single witness be paid or permitted to depart until his testimony has been committed to writing, either as delivered in court, or taken by yourself in the presence of any of Burr's counsel, who may choose to attend to cross-examine. These whole proceedings will be laid before Congress, that they may decide whether the defect has been in the evidence of guilt, or in the law, or in the application of the law, and that they may provide the proper remedy for the past and the future.—To GEORGE HAY. v, 188. (M., Sep. 1807.)

1025. ——. The criminal is preserved to become the rallying point of all the disaffected and the worthless of the United States, and to be the pivot on which all the intrigues and the conspiracies which foreign governments may wish to disturb us with, are to turn. If he is convicted of the misdemeanor, the judge must in decency give us a respite by some short confinement of him; but we must expect it to be very short.—To GEORGE HAY. v, 187. (M., Sept. 1807.)

1026. BURR'S (A.) TRIAL, Relegated to Congress.—Be * * * the result before the formal tribunal fair or false, it becomes our duty to provide that full testimony shall be laid before the Legislature, and through them the public. For this purpose, it is necessary that we be furnished with the testimony of every person who shall be with you as a witness. * * * Go into any expense necessary for this purpose * * *. —To GEORGE HAY. v, 81. FORD ED., ix, 52. (W., May 1807.)

1027. ——. I shall think it my duty to lay before you the proceedings and the evidence publicly exhibited on the arraignment of the principal offenders before the Circuit Court of Virginia. You will be enabled to judge whether the defeat was in the testimony, in the law, or in the administration of the law; and wherever it shall be found, the Legislature alone can apply or originate the remedy. The framers of our Constitution certainly supposed they had guarded, as well their government against destruction by treason, as their citizens against oppression, under pretence of it; and if these ends are not attained, it is of importance to inquire by what means, more effectual, they may be secured.*—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 87. FORD ED., viii, 163. (Oct. 1807.)

1028. CABELL (J. C.), University of Va. and.—We always counted on you as the main pillar of their [University of Virginia measures] support.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. FORD ED., ix, 500. (M., 1815.)

his bosom confidence. Our geographical position has been an impediment to that.—To SAMUEL DEXTER. iv, 359. FORD ED., vii, 498. (W., Feb. 1801.)

1030. CABINET, Contentions.—In the discussions [on the affairs of France and England], Hamilton and myself were daily pitted in the cabinet like two cocks. We were then but four in number, and, according to the majority, which of course was three to one, the President decided. The pain was for Hamilton and myself, but the public experienced no inconvenience.—To DR. WALTER JONES. v, 510. FORD ED., ix, 273. (M., 1810.)

1031. ——. The method of separate consultation, practiced sometimes in the Cabinet, prevents disagreeable collisions.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 496. FORD ED., ix, 269. (M., 1810.)

1032. CABINET, Enmity in.—I have learned, with real sorrow, that circumstances have arisen among our executive counsellors, which have rendered foes those who once were friends. To themselves it will be a source of infinite pain and vexation, and therefore chiefly I lament it, for I have a sincere esteem for both parties. To the President, it will be really inconvenient; but to the nation I do not know that it can do serious injury, unless we were to believe the newspapers, which pretend that Mr. Gallatin will go out. That, indeed, would be a day of mourning for the United States; but I hope that the position of both gentlemen may be made so easy as to give no cause for either to withdraw.—To DR. WALTER JONES. v, 509. FORD ED., ix, 273. (M., March 1810.)

1033. ——. The dissensions between two members of the Cabinet are to be lamented. But why should these force Mr. Gallatin to withdraw? They cannot be greater than between Hamilton and myself, and yet we served together four years in that way. We had indeed no personal dissensions. Each of us, perhaps, thought well of the other as a man, but as politicians it was impossible for two men to be of more opposite principles.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 496. FORD ED., ix, 269. (M., 1810.)

1034. CABINET, Equipoise of Opinion in.—President Washington [said to me] that he thought it important to preserve the check of my opinions in the Administration, in order to keep things in their proper channel, and prevent them from going too far.—THE ANAS. ix, 121. FORD ED., i, 204. (Oct. 1792.)

1035. CABINET, Harmonious.—Our Administration now drawing towards a close, I have a sublime pleasure in believing it will be distinguished as much by having placed itself above all the passions which could disturb its harmony, as by the great operations by which it will have advanced the well-being of the nation.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 23. FORD ED., viii, 476. (W., 1806.)

1036. ——. I have so much reliance on the superior good sense and candor of all those associated with me, as to be satisfied that they will not suffer either friend or foe to sow tares among us.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 23. FORD ED., viii, 476. (W., 1806.)

1037. ——. Among the felicities which have attended my administration, I am most thankful for having been able to procure coadjutors so able, so disinterested, and so harmonious. Scarcely ever has a difference of opinion appeared among us which has not, by candid consultation, been amalgamated into something which all approved; and never one which in the slightest degree affected our personal attachments.—To MR. WEAVER. v, 89. (W., 1807.)

1038. ——. I look back with peculiar satisfaction on the harmony and cordial good will which, to ourselves and to our brethren of the Cabinet, so much sweetened our toils.—To ROBERT SMITH. v, 451. (M., June 1809.)

1039. ——. I have thought it among the most fortunate circumstances of my late Administration that, through its eight years' continuance, it was conducted with a cordiality and harmony among all its members, which never were ruffled on any, the greatest or smallest occasion.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 533. (M., 1810.)

1040. ——. The harmony among us was so perfect, that whatever instrument appeared most likely to effect the object, was always used without jealousy.—To WILLIAM WIRT. v, 594. FORD ED., ix, 318. (M., 1811.)

1041. ——. The affectionate harmony of our Cabinet is among the sweetest of my recollections.—To CÆSAR RODNEY. vi, 448. (M., 1815.)

1042. CABINET, Indebtedness to.—Far from assuming to myself the merit of the measures you note, they belong first, to a wise and patriotic Legislature, which has given them the form and sanction of law, and next to my faithful and able fellow laborers in the Executive administration.—R. To A. MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE. viii, 116. (1807.)

1043. ——. For the advantages flowing from the measures of the government, you are indebted principally to a wise and patriotic Legislature, and to the able and inestimable coadjutors with whom it has been my good fortune to be associated in the direction of affairs.—R. To A. PHILADELPHIA CITIZENS. viii, 145. (1809.)

1044. ——. Whatever may be the merit or demerit of the acquisition of Louisiana, I divide it with my colleagues, to whose counsels I was indebted for a course of administration which, notwithstanding this late coalition of clay and brass, will, I hope, continue to receive the approbation of our country.—To HENRY DEARBORN. vii, 215. FORD ED., x, 192. (M., August 1821.)

1045. CABINET, Intrigue in.—It is impossible for you to conceive what is passing in our conclave; and it is evident that one or two at least, under pretence of avoiding war on the one side, have no great antipathy to run foul of it on the other, and to make a part in the confederacy of princes against human liberty.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 563. FORD ED., vi, 261. (Pa., May 1793.)

1046. CABINET, A Kitchen.—That there is an ostensible Cabinet and a concealed one, a public profession and concealed counteraction, is false.—To WILLIAM DUANE. iv, 592. FORD ED., viii, 433. (W., 1806.)

1047. CABINET, Rules of Jefferson's.—Coming all of us into executive office, new, and unfamiliar with the course of business previously practiced, it was not to be expected we should in the outset, adopt in every part a line of proceeding so perfect as to admit no amendment. The mode and degrees of communication, particularly between the President and heads of departments, have not been practiced exactly on the same scale in all of them. Yet it would certainly be more safe and satisfactory for ourselves as well as the public, that not only the best, but also an uniform course of proceeding as to manner and degree, should be observed. Having been a member of the first Administration under General Washington, I can state with exactness what our course then was. Letters of business came addressed sometimes to the President, but most frequently to the heads of departments. If addressed to himself, he referred them to the proper department to be acted on; if to one of the Secretaries, the letter, if it required no answer, was communicated to the President, simply for his information. If an answer was requisite, the Secretary of the department communicated the letter and his proposed answer to the President. Generally they were simply sent back after perusal, which signified his approbation. Sometimes he returned them with an informal note, suggesting an alteration or a query. If a doubt of any importance arose, he reserved it for conference. By this means, he was always in accurate possession of all facts and proceedings in every part of the Union, and to whatsoever department they related; he formed a central point for the different branches; preserved an unity of object and action among them; exercised that participation in the suggestion of affairs which his office made incumbent on him; and met himself the due responsibility for whatever was done. During Mr. Adam's Administration, his long and habitual absences from the seat of government, rendered this kind of communication impracticable, removed him from any share in the transaction of affairs, and parcelled out the government, in fact, among four independent heads, drawing sometimes in opposite directions. That the former is preferable to the latter course, cannot be doubted. It gave, indeed, to the heads of departments the trouble of making up, once a day, a packet of all their communications for the perusal of the President; it commonly also retarded one day their despatches by mail. But in pressing cases, this injury was prevented by presenting that case singly for immediate attention; and it produced us in return the benefit of his sanction for every act we did. Whether any change in circumstances may render a change in this procedure necessary, a little experience will show us. But I cannot withhold recommending to heads of departments, that we should adopt this course for the present, leaving any necessary modifications of it to time and trial. I am sure my conduct must have proved, better than a thousand declarations would, that my confidence in those whom I am so happy as to have associated with me, is unlimited, unqualified, and unabated. I am well satisfied that everything goes on with a wisdom and rectitude which I could not improve. If I had the universe to choose from, I could not change one of my associates to my better satisfaction. My sole motives are those before expressed, as governing the first Administration in chalking out the rules of their proceeding; adding to them only a sense of obligation imposed on me by the public will, to meet personally the duties to which they have appointed me.—To THE HEADS OF THE DEPARTMENTS. iv, 415. FORD ED., viii, 99. (W., Nov. 1801.)

1048. ——. In ordinary affairs every head of a department consults me on those of his department, and where anything arises too difficult or important to be decided between us, the consultation becomes general.—To WILLIAM DUANE. iv, 592. FORD ED., viii, 432. (W., 1806.)

1049. ——. Something now occurs almost every day on which it is desirable to have the opinions of the heads of departments, yet to have a formal meeting every day would consume so much of their time as to seriously obstruct their regular business. I have proposed to them, as most convenient for them, and wasting less of their time, to call on me at any moment of the day which suits their separate convenience, when, besides any other business they may have to do, I can learn their opinions separately on any matter which has occurred, and also communicate the information received daily.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 122. FORD ED., ix, 104. (W., July 1807.)

1050. CABINET, Theory and the.—Our Government, although in theory subject to be directed by the unadvised will of the President, is, and from its origin has been, a very different thing in practice. The minor business in each department is done by the head of the department, on consultation with the President alone. But all matters of importance or difficulty are submitted to all the heads of departments composing the Cabinet: sometimes by the President consulting them separately and successively, as they happen to call on him; but in the gravest cases, by calling them together, discussing the subject maturely, and finally taking the vote, in which the President counts himself but as one. So that in all important cases the Executive is, in fact a directory, which certainly the President might control; but of this there was never an example, either in the first or the present administration. I have heard, indeed, that my predecessor sometimes decided things against his council by dashing and trampling his wig on the floor. This only proves what you and I know, that he had a better heart than head.—To WILLIAM SHORT. v, 94. FORD ED., ix, 69. (W., 1807.)

1051. CABINET, An Unbroken.—It would have been to me the greatest of consolations to have gone through my term with the same coadjutors, and to have shared with them the merit, or demerit, of whatever good or evil we may have done.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 229. FORD ED., ix, 171. (W., Jan. 1808.)

1052. CABINET, Verbal and Written Opinions.—I practiced the method [of assembling the Cabinet members and taking their opinions verbally], because the harmony was so cordial among us all, that we never failed, by a contribution of mutual views on a subject, to form an opinion acceptable to the whole. I think there never was one instance to the contrary, in any case of consequence.—To DR. WALTER JONES. v, 510. FORD ED., ix, 273. (M., 1810.)

1053. ——. The [method of taking the opinions of the Cabinet verbally] does, in fact, transform the Executive into a directory, and I hold the other method [opinions in writing,] to be more constitutional. It is better calculated, too, to prevent collision and irritation, and to cure it, or at least suppress its effects when it has already taken place.—To DR. WALTER JONES. v, 510. FORD ED., ix, 273. (M., 1810.)

1054. ——. The ordinary business of every day is done by consultation between the President and the head of the department alone to which it belongs. For measures of importance or difficulty, a consultation is held with the heads of departments, either assembled, or by taking their opinions separately in conversation or in writing. The latter is most strictly in the spirit of the Constitution: because the President, on weighing the advice of all, is left free to make up an opinion for himself. In this way they are not brought together, and it is not necessarily known to any what opinion the others have given. This was General Washington's practice for the first two or three years of his Administration, till the affairs of France and England threatened to embroil us, and rendered consideration and discussion desirable.—To DR. WALTER JONES. v, 510. FORD ED., ix, 273. (M., 1810.)

1055. CABINET, Vice-President and.—The Vice-President, Secretaries of the Treasury and War, and myself, met. * * * We unanimously advised an immediate order*

* Before the President set out on his Southern tour in April, 1791, he addressed a letter of the 4th of that month, from Mt. Vernon to the Secretaries of State, Treasury and War, desiring that if any serious and important cases should arise during his absence, they would consult and act on them, and he requested that the Vice-President should also be consulted. This

1058. ——. My letters inform me that Mr. Adams speaks of me with great friendship and with satisfaction in the prospect of administering the government in concurrence with me. * * * If by that he means the Executive Cabinet, both duty and inclination will shut that door to me. I cannot have a wish to see the scenes of 1793 revived as to myself, and to descend daily into the arena like a gladiator, to suffer martyrdom in every conflict.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 161. FORD ED., vii, 107. (M., Jan. 1797.)

1057. CABINET OFFICERS, Congress and.—An attempt has been made to give further extent to the influence of the Executive over the Legislature, by permitting the heads of departments to attend the House, and explain their measures viva voce. But it was negatived by a majority of 35 to 11, which gives us some hope of the increase of the republican vote.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iii, 491. FORD ED., vi, 134. (Pa., Nov. 1792.)

1058. CABINET OFFICERS, Courtesy between.—It is but common decency to leave to my successor [in the State Department] the moulding of his own business.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 504. FORD ED., vi, 156. (1793.)

1059. CABINET OFFICERS, Newspapers and.—Is not the dignity, and even decency of government committed, when one of its principal ministers enlists himself as an anonymous writer or paragraphist for either the one or the other paper? *—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 467. FORD ED., vi, 108. (M., 1792.)

1060. CABINET OFFICERS, Public Confidence in.—It is essential to assemble in the outset persons to compose our Administration, whose talents, integrity and revolutionary name and principles may inspire the nation at once, with unbounded confidence, and impose an awful silence on all the maligners of republicanism; as may suppress in embryo the purpose avowed by one of their most daring and effective chiefs, of beating down the Administration. These names do not abound at this day. So few are they, that yours cannot be spared among them without leaving a blank which cannot be filled. If I can obtain for the public the aid of those I have contemplated, I fear nothing. If this cannot be done, then we are unfortunate indeed! We shall be unable to realize the prospects which have been held out to the people, and we must fall back into monarchism, for want of heads, not hands to help us out of it. This is a common cause, common to all republicans. Though I have been too honorably placed in front of those who are to enter the breach so happily made, yet the energies of every individual are necessary, and in the very place where his energies can most serve the enterprise. * * * The part which circumstances constrain us to propose to you is the Secretaryship of the Navy. * * * Come forward, then, and give us the aid of your talents, and the weight of your character towards the new establishment of republicanism: I say, for its new establishment, for hitherto we have only seen its travesty.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 338. FORD ED., vii, 464. (M., Dec. 1800.)

1061. CABINET OFFICERS, Society and.—The gentlemen who composed General Washington's first Administration took up, too universally, a practice of general entertainment, which was unnecessary, obstructive of business, and so oppressive to themselves, that it was among the motives for their retirement. Their successors profited by the experiment, and lived altogether as private individuals, and so have ever continued to do. Here. [Washington] indeed, it cannot be otherwise, our situation being so rural, that during the vacations of the Legislature we shall have no society but of the officers of the government, and in time of sessions the Legislature is become and becoming so numerous, that for the last half dozen years nobody but the President has pretended to entertain them.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 339. FORD ED., vii, 465. (W., Dec. 1800.)

—CÆSAR.—See CICERO.

1062. CALLENDER (J. T.), Defence of.—I think it essentially just and necessary that Callender should be substantially defended. Whether in the first stages by public interference, or private contributors, may be a question. Perhaps it might be as well that it should be left to the Legislature, who will meet in time, and before whom you can lay the matter so as to bring it before them. It is become peculiarly their cause, and may furnish them a fine opportunity of showing their respect to the Union, and at the same time of doing justice in another way to those whom they cannot protect without committing the public tranquillity.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 448. (Ep., May 1800.)

1063. CALLENDER (J. T.), Federalists and.—I enclose you a paper which shows the torries mean to pervert these charities to Callender as much as they can. They will probably first represent me as the patron and support of the "Prospect Before Us," and other things of Callender's; and then picking out all the scurrilities of the author against General Washington, Mr. Adams, and others, impute them to me. I, as well as most other republicans who were in the way of doing it, contributed what I could afford to the support of the republican papers and printers, paid sums of money for The Bee, the Albany Register, &c., when they were staggering under the Sedition law; contributed to the fines of Callender himself, of Holt, Brown and others, suffering under that law. I discharged, when I came into office, such as were under the persecution of our enemies, without instituting any prosecutions in retaliation. They may, therefore, with the same justice, impute to me, or to every republican contributor, everything which was ever published in those papers, or by those persons.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 447. FORD ED., viii, 167. (W., 1802.)

1064. CALLENDER (J. T.), Fine paid.

—To take from Callender all room for complaint, I think, with you, we had better refund his fine by private contributions. I enclose you an order * * * for fifty dollars, which, I believe, is one-fourth of the whole sum.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 58. (W., May 1801.)

1065. CALLENDER (J. T.), Persecution of.—The violence which was meditated against you lately has excited a very general indignation in this part of the country. Our State, from its first plantation, has been remarkable for its order and submission to the laws. But three instances are recollected in its history of an organized opposition to the laws. The first was Bacon's rebellion; the second, our Revolution; the third, the Richmond association, who, by their committee, have in the public papers avowed their purpose of taking out of the hands of the law the function of declaring who may or may not have free residence among us. But these gentlemen miscalculate the temper and force of this country extremely if they supposed there would have been a want of either to support the authority of the laws; and equally mistake their own interests in setting the example of club-law. Whether their self-organized election of a committee, and publication of their manifesto, be such overt acts as bring them within the pale of the law; the law, I presume is to decide; and there it is our duty to leave it.—To J. T. CALLENDER. FORD ED., vii, 392. (M., Sep. 1799.)

1066. CALLENDER (J. T.), Relations with Jefferson.—I am really mortified at the base ingratitude of Callender. It presents human nature in a hideous form. It gives me concern, because I perceive that relief, which was afforded him on mere motives of charity, may be viewed under the aspect of employing him as a writer. When the "Political Progress of Britain" first appeared in this country, it was in a periodical publication called The Bee, where I saw it. I was speaking of it in terms of strong approbation to a friend in Philadelphia, when he asked me if I knew that the author was then in the city, a fugitive from prosecution on account of that work, and in want of employ for his subsistence. This was the first of my learning that Callender was author of the work. I considered him, as a man of science fled from persecution, and assured my friend of my readiness to do whatever could serve him. It was long after this before I saw him; probably not till 1798. He had, in the meantime, written a second part of the Political Progress, much inferior to the first, and his History of the United States. In 1798, I think, I was applied to by Mr. Leiper to contribute to his relief. I did so. In 1799, I think, S. T. Mason applied for him. I contributed again. He had, by this time, paid me two or three personal visits. When he fled in a panic from Philadelphia to General Mason's, he wrote to me that he was a fugitive, in want of employ, wished to know if he could get into a counting-house or a school, in my neighborhood or in that of Richmond; that he had materials for a volume, and if he could get as much money as would buy the paper, the profit of the sale would be all his own. I availed myself of this pretext to cover a mere charity, by desiring him to consider me a subscriber for as many copies of his book as the money enclosed (fifty dollars) amounted to; but to send me two copies only, as the others might lie till called for. But I discouraged his coming into my neighborhood. His first writings here had fallen far short of his original Political Progress, and the scurrilities of his subsequent ones began evidently to do mischief. As to myself, no man wished more to see his pen stopped; but I considered him still as a proper object of benevolence. The succeeding year, he again wanted money to buy paper for another volume. I made his letter, as before, the occasion of giving him another fifty dollars. He considers these as proofs of my approbation of his writings, when they were mere charities, yielded under a strong conviction that he was injuring us by his writings. It is known to many that the sums given to him were such, and even smaller than I was in the habit of giving to others in distress, of the federal as well as the republican party, without attention to political principles. Soon after I was elected to the government, Callender came on here [Washington] wishing to be made postmaster at Richmond. I knew him to be totally unfit for it; and however ready I was to aid him with my own charities (and I then gave him fifty dollars). I did not think the public offices confided to me to give away as charities. He took it in mortal offence, and from that moment has been hauling off to his former enemies, the federalists. Besides the letters I wrote him in answer to the one from General Mason, I wrote him another, containing answers to two questions he addressed to me. 1. Whether Mr. Jay received salary as Chief Justice and Envoy at the same time; and 2. something relative to the expenses of an embassy to Constantinople. I think these were the only letters I ever wrote him in answer to volumes he was perpetually writing to me. This is the true state of what has passed between him and me. I do not know that it can be used without committing me in controversy, as it were, with one too little respected by the public to merit that notice. I leave to your judgment what use can be made of these facts. Perhaps it will be better judged of, when we see what use the tories will endeavor to make of their new friend.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 444. FORD ED., viii, 164. (W., July 1802.)

1067. CALLENDER (J. T.), Threats of.

—Callender is arrived here [Washington]. He did not call on me; but understanding he was in distress I sent Captain Lewis to him with fifty dollars, to inform him we were making some enquiries as to his fine which would take a little time, and lest he should suffer in the meantime, I had sent him, &c. His language to Captain Lewis was very high-toned. He intimated that he was in possession of things which he could and would make use of in a certain case; that he received the fifty dollars, not as a charity but a due, in fact as hush money; that I knew what he expected, viz., a certain office, and more to this effect. Such a misconstruction of my charities puts an end to them forever. You will, therefore, be so good as to make no use of the order* I enclosed you. He knows nothing of me which I am not willing to declare to the world myself. I knew him first as the author of the Political Progress of Britain, a work I had read with great satisfaction, and as a fugitive from persecution for this very work. I gave to him from time to time such aids as I could afford, merely as a man of genius suffering under persecution, and not as a writer in our politics. It is long since I wished he would cease writing on them, as doing more harm than good.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 61. (W., May 1801.)

1068. CALONNE (C. A. de), Character of.—The memoir of M. de Calonne, though it does not prove him to be more innocent than his predecessors, shows him not to have been that exaggerated scoundrel which the calculations and the clamors of the public have supposed.—To MADAME DE CARNY. D. L. J., 132. (P., 1787.)

1069. CALUMNY, Character and.—I laid it down as a law to myself, to take no notice of the thousand calumnies issued against me, but to trust my character to my own conduct, and the good sense and candor of my fellow citizens.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. v, 452. FORD ED., ix, 253. (M., 1809.)

1070. CALUMNY, Contradiction of.—I have never even contradicted the thousands of calumnies so industriously propagated against myself.—To THOMAS SEYMOUR. v, 43. FORD ED., ix, 30. (W., 1807.)

1071. CALUMNY, Foolish.—Of all the charges brought against me by my political adversaries, that of possessing some science has probably done them the least credit. Our countrymen are too enlightened themselves to believe that ignorance is the best qualification for their service.—To C. F. WELLS. v, 483. (M., 1809.)

1072. CALUMNY, Forgotten.—The expression respecting myself, stated in your letter to have been imputed to you by your calumniators, had either never been heard by me, or, if heard, had been unheeded and forgotten. I have been too much the butt of such falsehoods myself to do others the injustice of permitting them to make the least impression on me. My consciousness that no man on earth has me under his thumb is evidence enough that you never used the expression.—To GENERAL WILKINSON. v, 573. (M., 1811.)

1073. CALUMNY, Newspaper.—Were I to undertake to answer the calumnies of the newspapers, it would be more than all my own time, and that of twenty aids could effect. For while I should be answering one, twenty new ones would be invented. I have thought it better to trust to the justice of my countrymen, that they would judge me by what they see of my conduct on the stage where they have placed me, and what they knew of me before the epoch since which a particular party has supposed it might answer some view of theirs to vilify me in the public eye. Some. I know, will not reflect how apocryphal is the testimony of enemies so palpably betraying the views with which they give it. But this is an injury to which duty requires every one to submit whom the public think proper to call into its councils.—To SAMUEL SMITH. iv, 255. FORD ED., vii, 279. (M., 1798.)

1074. CALUMNY, Political.—With the aid of lying renegade from republicanism [Callender], the federalists have opened all their sluices of calumny. They say we lied them out of power, and, openly avow they will do the same by us. But it was not lies or arguments on our part which dethroned them, but their own foolish acts, Sedition laws, Alien laws, taxes, extravagance and heresies. "Porcupine," their friend wrote them down. Callender, their new recruit, will do the same. Every decent man among them revolts at his filth.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 448. FORD ED., viii, 173. (W., Oct. 1802.)

1075. — — — It has been a source of great pain to me, to have met with so many among our opponents, who had not the liberality to distinguish between political and social opposition; who transferred at once to the person, the hatred they bore to his political opinions. I suppose, indeed, that in public life, a man whose political principles have any decided character, and who has energy enough to give them effect, must always expect to encounter political hostility from those of adverse principles. But I came to the government under circumstances calculated to generate peculiar acrimony. I found all its offices in the possession of a political sect, who wished to transform it ultimately into the shape of their darling model, the English government; and in the meantime, to familiarize the public mind to the change, by administering it on English principles, and in English forms. The elective interposition of the people had blown all their designs, and they found themselves and their fortresses of power and profit put in a moment into the hands of other trustees. Lamentations and invective were all that remained to them. This last was naturally directed against the agent selected to execute the multiplied reformations, which their heresies had rendered necessary. I became, of course, the butt of everything which reason, ridicule, malice and falsehood could supply. They have concentrated all their hatred on me, till they have really persuaded themselves, that I am the sole source of all their imaginary evils.—To RICHARD M. JOHNSON. v, 256. (W., 1808.)

1076. — — — The large share I have enjoyed, and still enjoy of anti-republican hatred and calumny, gives me the satisfaction of supposing that I have been some obstacle to anti-republican designs; and if truth should find its way into history, the object of these falsehoods and calumnies will render them honorable to me.—To W. LAMBERT. v, 450. (M., May 1809.)

1077. — — — If, brooding over past calamities, the adherents of federalism can, by abusing me, be diverted from disturbing the course of government, they will make me useful longer than I had expected to be so. Having served them faithfully for a term of twelve or fourteen years, in the terrific station of Rawhead and Bloodybones, it was supposed that, retired from power, I should have been functus officio, of course, for them a' so. If, nevertheless, they wish my continuance in that awful office, I yield, and the rather as it may be exercised at home, without interfering with the tranquil enjoyment of my farm, my family, my friends and books. In truth, having never felt a pain from their abuse, I bear them no malice.—To W. D. G. WORTHINGTON. v, 504. (M., 1810.)

1078. CALUMNY, Posterity and.—It is fortunate for those in public trust that posterity will judge them by their works and not by the malignant vituperations and invectives of the Pickering and Gardiners of their age.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 62. (M., 1817.)

1079. CALUMNY, Public Service and.—Calumny would not weigh an atom with me on any occasion where my avowal of either facts or opinions would be of public use; but whenever it will not, I then think it useful to keep myself out of the way of calumny.—To J. T. CALLENDER. FORD ED., vii, 394. (M., 1799.)

1080. CALUMNY, Religion and.—From the moment that a portion of my fellow citizens looked towards me with a view to one of their highest offices, the flood-gates of calumny have been opened upon me; not where I am personally known, and where their slanders would be instantly judged and suppressed from the general sense of their falsehood; but in the remote parts of the Union, where the means of detection are not at hand, and the trouble in an enquiry is greater than would suit the hearers to undertake. I know that I might have filled the courts of the United States with actions for these slanders, and have ruined, perhaps, many persons who are not innocent. But this would be no equivalent to the loss of character. I leave them, therefore, to the reproof of their own consciences. If these do not condemn them, there will yet come a day when the false witness will meet a Judge who has not slept over his slanders. If the Rev. Cotton Mather Smith, of Shena, believed this as firmly as I do, he would surely never have affirmed that "I had obtained my property by fraud and robbery; that in one instance, I had defrauded and robbed a widow and fatherless children of an estate and to which I was executor, of ten thousand pounds sterling by keeping the property and paying then in money at the nominal rate, when it was worth no more than forty for one; and that all this could be proved." Every tittle of it is fable; there not having existed a single circumstance of my life to which any part of it can hang. I never was executor but in two instances, both of which having taken place about the beginning of the Revolution, which withdrew me immediately from all private pursuits, I never meddled in either executorship. In one of the cases only, were there a widow and children. She was my sister. She retained and managed the estate in her own hands, and no part of it was ever in mine. In the other, I was a co-partner, and only received on a division the equal portion allotted to me. To neither of these executorships, therefore, could Mr. Smith refer. Again, my property is all patrimonial, except about seven or eight hundred pounds worth of lands, purchased by myself and paid for not, to widows and orphans, but to the very gentleman from whom I purchased. If Mr. Smith, therefore, thinks the precepts of the gospel intended for those who preach them as well for others, he will doubtless some day feel the duties of repentance, and of acknowledgment in such forms as to correct the wrong he has done. Perhaps he will have to wait till the passions of the moment have passed away. All this is left to his own conscience.—To URIAH MCGREGORY. iv, 333. (M., Aug. 1800.)

1081. CALUMNY, Silence under.—Though I see the pen of the Secretary of the Treasury [Alexander Hamilton] plainly in the attack on me, yet, since he has not chosen to put his name to it, I am not free to notice it as his. I have preserved through life a resolution, set in a very early part of it, never to write in a public paper without subscribing my name, and to engage openly an adversary who does not let himself be seen, is staking all against nothing. The indecency, too, of newspaper squabbling between two public ministers, besides my own sense of it, has drawn something like an injunction from another quarter [President Washington]. Every fact alleged under the signature of "An American" as to myself, is false, and can be proved so * * *. But for the present, lying and scribbling must be free to those mean enough to deal in them, and in the dark.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. iii, 470. FORD ED., vi, 112. (M., 1792.)

1082. CALUMNY, Unnoticed.—My rule of life has been never to harass the public with findings and provings of personal slanders. * * * I have ever trusted to the justice and consideration of my fellow citizens, and have no reason to repent it, or to change my course.—To MARTIN VAN BUREN. vii, 372. FORD ED., x, 315. (M., 1824.)

1083. CAMDEN, Battle of.—I sincerely condole with you on our late misfortune [the battle of Camden], which sits the heavier on my mind as being produced by my own countrymen. Instead of considering what is past, however, we are to look forward and prepare for the future.—To GENERAL EDWARD STEVENS. i, 250. FORD ED., ii, 333. (R., 1780.)

1084. — I am extremely mortified at the misfortune [the battle of Camden] incurred in the South, and the more so as the militia of our State concurred so eminently in producing it.—To GENERAL GATES. FORD ED., ii, 332. (R., 1780.)

1085. CAMPBELL (Col.), Battle of King's Mountain.—Your favor * * * gives me the first information * * * that the laurels which Colonel Campbell so honorably won in the battle of King's Mountain had ever been brought into question by any one. To him has been ever ascribed so much of the success of that brilliant action as the valor and conduct of an able commander might justly claim. * * * It was the joyful annunciation of that turn of the tide of success which terminated the Revolutionary war with the seal of our Independence. * * * The descendants of Colonel Campbell may rest their heads quietly on the pillow of his renown. History has consecrated, and will forever preserve it in the faithful annals of a grateful country.—To JOHN CAMPBELL. vii, 268. (M., 1822.)

1086. CANADA, The Colonies and.—They [Parliament] have erected in a neighboring province [Quebec], acquired by the joint arms of Great Britain and America, a tyranny dangerous to the very existence of all these Colonies.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 468. (July 1775.)

1088. — — —. The cooperation of the Canadians is taken for granted in all the ministerial schemes. We hope, therefore, they will be dislocated by the events in that quarter.—To FRANCIS EFFES. FORD ED., i, 487. (Pa., Oct. 1775.)

1089. — — —. In a short time, we have reason to hope, the delegates of Canada will join us in Congress and complete the American union, as far as we wish to have it completed.—To JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 202. FORD ED., i, 492. (Pa., Nov. 1775.)

1090. CANADA, Conquest of.—The British [by forcing us into war] will oblige us to take from them Canada and Nova Scotia which it is not our interest to possess.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. FORD ED., iv, 453. (P., Sep. 1787.)

1091. — — —. One of our first [Cabinet] consultations must be on the question whether we shall not order all the militia and volunteers destined for the Canadas to be embodied on the 26th of October, and to march immediately to such points on the way to their destination as shall be pointed out, there to await the decision of Congress?—To JAMES MADISON. v, 197. FORD ED., ix, 141. (M., Sep. 1807.)

1092. — — —. [It was agreed in Cabinet to] prepare all necessities for an attack of Upper Canada, and the upper part of Lower Canada, as far as the mouth of Richelieu river; also to take possession of the islands of Campobello, &c., in the bay of Passamaquoddy.—ANAS. FORD ED., i, 326. (July 1807.)

1093. — — —. The acquisition of Canada this year, as far as the neighborhood of Quebec, will be a mere matter of marching, and will give us experience for the attack of Halifax the next, and the final expulsion of England from the American continent.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 75. FORD ED., ix, 366. (M., Aug. 1812.)

1094. — — —. Our present enemy will have the sea to herself, while we shall be equally predominant at land, and shall strip her of all her possessions on this continent.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. vi, 68. FORD ED. ix, 361. (M., June 1812.)

1095. — — —. To continue the war popular, * * * it is necessary to stop Indian barbarities. The conquest of Canada will do this.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 70. FORD ED., ix, 364. (M., June 1812.)

1096. — — —. The declaration of war is entirely popular here [Virginia], the only opinion being that it should have been issued the moment the season admitted the militia to enter Canada.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 70. FORD ED., ix, 364. (M., June 1812.)

1097. — — —. I know your feelings on the present state of the world, and hope they will be cheered by the successful course of our war, and the addition of Canada to our confederacy. The infamous intrigues of Great Britain to destroy our government (of which Henry's is but one sample), and with the Indians to tomahawk our women and children, prove that the cession of Canada, their fulcrum for these Machiavelian levers, must be a sine qua non at a treaty of peace.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. vi, 70. FORD ED., ix, 363. (M., June 1812.)

1098. — — —. We have taken Upper Canada, * * * and hope to remove the British fully and finally from our continent.—To MADAME DE TESSE. vi, 273. FORD ED., ix, 440. (Dec. 1813.)

1099. CANADA, Indemnification and.—With Canada in hand we can go to treaty with an off-set for spoliation before the war.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 78. (M., Aug. 1812.)

1100. — — —. For one thousand ships taken, and six thousand seamen impressed, give us Canada for indemnification, and the only security they can give us against their Henrys and the savages.—To MR. WRIGHT. vi, 78. (M., Aug. 1812.)

1101. — — —. If we could but get Canada to Trois Rivières in our hands we should have a set-off against spoliations to be treated of, and in the meantime separate the Indians from them, and set the friendly to attack the hostile part with our aid.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 370. (M., Nov. 1812.)

1102. — — —. We have a great and a just claim of indemnifications against the British for the thousand ships they have taken piratically, and six thousand seamen impressed. Whether we can, on this score, successfully insist on curtailing their American possessions, by the meridian of Lake Huron, so as to cut them off from the Indians bordering on us, would be matter for conversation and experiment at the treaty of pacification.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 129. (M., June 1813.)

1103. — — —. Could we acquire that country, we might perhaps insist successfully at St. Petersburg on retaining all westward of the meridian of Lake Huron, or of Ontario, or of Montreal, according to the pulse of the place, as an indemnification for the past and security for the future. To cut them off from the Indians even west of the Huron would be a great future security.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 131. (M., June 1813.)

1104. ——. A thousand ships taken unjustifiably in time of peace, and thousands of our citizens impressed, warrant expectations of indemnification; such a Western frontier, perhaps, given to Canada, as may put it out of their power to employ the tomahawk and scalping knife of the Indians on our women and children; or, what would be nearly equivalent, the exclusive right to the Lakes.—To DR. GEORGE LOGAN. vi, 216. FORD ED., ix, 422. (M., Oct. 1813.)

1105. ——. The conduct of the British during the war in exciting the Indian hordes to murder and scalp the women and children on our frontier, renders peace forever impossible but on the establishment of such a meridian boundary to their possessions, as that they never more can have such influence with the savages as to excite again the same barbarities. The thousand ships, too, they took from us in peace, and the six thousand seamen impressed call for this indemnification.—To DON. V. TORONDA CORUNA. vi, 275. (M., Dec. 1813.)

1106. CANADA, Value of.—If the war is lengthened we shall take Canada, which will relieve us from Indians, and Halifax, which will put an end to their occupation of the American Seas, because every vessel must then go to England to repair every accident. To retain these would become objects of first importance to us, and of great importance to Europe, as the means of curtailing the British marine. But at present, being merely in posse, they should not be an impediment to peace.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 129. (M., June 1813.)

1107. CANAL, Big Beaver.—I remember having written to you, while Congress sat at Annapolis, on the water communication between ours and the western country, and to have mentioned particularly the information I had received of the plain face of the country between the sources of Big Beaver and Cayohoga, which made me hope that a canal of no great expense might unite the navigation of Lake Erie and the Ohio. You must since have had occasion of getting better information on this subject, and if you have, you would oblige me by a communication of it. I consider this canal, if practicable, as a very important work.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 250. (P. 187.)

1108. ——. I thank you for the information * * * on the communication between the Cayohoga and Big Beaver. I have ever considered the opening of a canal between those two water courses as the most important work in that line which the State of Virginia could undertake. It will infallibly turn through the Potomac all the commerce of Lake Erie, and the country west of that, except what may pass down the Mississippi; and it is important that it be soon done, lest that commerce should, in the meantime, get established in another channel. * * * I take the liberty of sending you the notes I made when I examined the canal of Languedoc, through its whole course, last year. You may find in them something, perhaps, which may be turned to account, some time or other, in the prosecution of the Potomac canal.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 370. FORD ED., v, 7. (P., 1788.)

1109. ——. Another vast object, and of much less difficulty, is to add, also, all the country on the Lakes and their waters. This would enlarge our [Virginia's] field immensely, and would certainly be effected by an union of the Ohio and Lake Erie. The Big Beaver and Cayohoga offer the most direct line. * * * The States of Maryland and Virginia should make a common object of it. The navigation, again, between Elizabeth River and the Sound, is of vast importance, and in my opinion, it is much better that these should be done at public than private expense.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. iii, 30. FORD ED., v, 93. (P., 1789.)

1110. CANAL, Erie.—The most gigantic undertaking yet proposed is that of New York, for drawing the waters of Lake Erie into the Hudson. The expense will be great, but its effect incalculably powerful in favor of the Atlantic States.—To F. H. ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. vii, 75. FORD ED., x, 89. (M., 1817.)

1111. CANAL, James River.—The opinion I have ever expressed of the advantages of a western communication through the James River, I still entertain; and that the Cayuga is the most promising of the links of communication. To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 156. (M., 1820.)

1112. CANAL, Languedoc.—I am now about setting out on a journey to the South of France. * * * I shall carefully examine the canal of Languedoc.—To COLONEL MONROE. ii, 70. (P., 1786.)

1113. CANAL, New Orleans.—The United States feel a strong interest in the New Orleans canal, * * * and in some conversations * * * on the subject the winter before last, there was a mutual understanding that the company would complete the canal, and the United States would make the locks. This we are still disposed to do; and so anxious are we to get this means of defence completed, that to hasten it we would contribute any other encouragement within the limits of our authority which might produce this effect.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 306. (W., July 1808.)

1114. ——. The first interests of the company will be to bring a practicable navigation from the Lake Pontchartrain through the Bayou St. Jean and Canal de Carondelet to the city, because that entitles them to a toll on the profitable part of the enterprise. But this would answer no object of the government unless it was carried through to the Mississippi, so that our armed vessels drawing five feet of water might pass through. Instead therefore of the ground I suggested in my last letter, I would propose to lend them a sum of money on the condition of their applying it entirely to that part of the canal which, beginning at the Mississippi, goes round the city to a junction with the canal of Carondelet; and we may moreover at our own expense erect the locks.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 319. (W., July 1808.)

1115. ——. The Canal Company ask specifically that we should either lend them fifty thousand dollars, or buy the remaining part of their shares now on hand. On consultation with Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin and Mr.

Rodney, we concluded it best to say we would lend them a sum of money if they would agree to lay out the whole of it in making the canal from the Mississippi round the town to its junction with the canal of Carondelet.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 321. (W., 1808.)

1116. CANAL, Panama.—The Spaniards are, at this time, desirous of trading to the Philippine Islands, by the way of the Cape of Good Hope; but opposed in it by the Dutch, under authority of the treaty of Munster, they are examining the practicability of a common passage through the Straits of Magellan or round Cape Horn. Were they to make an opening through the Isthmus of Panama, a work much less difficult than some even of the inferior canals of France, however small this opening should be in the beginning, the tropical current, entering it with all its force, would soon widen it sufficiently for its own passage.—To M. LE ROY DE L'ACADEMIE DES SCIENCES. ii, 59. (P., 1786.) See GULF STREAM.

1117. ——. I have been told that the cutting through the Isthmus of Panama, which the world has so often wished, and supposed practicable, has at times been thought of by the government of Spain, and that they once proceeded so far as to have a survey and examination made of the ground; but that the result was either impracticable or of too great difficulty. Probably the Count de Campomanes, or Don Ulloa, can give you information on this head. I should be exceedingly pleased to get as minute details as possible on it, and even copies of the survey, report, &c., if they could be obtained at a moderate expense. I take the liberty of asking your assistance in this.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 325. FORD ED., iv, 473. (P., 1877.)

1118. ——. With respect to the Isthmus of Panama, I am assured by Burgoyne * * * that a survey was made, that a canal appeared very practicable, and that the idea was suppressed for political reasons altogether. He has seen and minutely examined the report. This report is to me a vast desideratum, for reasons political and philosophical.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 397. FORD ED., v, 22. (P., 1788.)

1119. CANAL, Potomac and Ohio.—I consider the union of the Potomac and the Ohio rivers as among the strongest links of communication between the eastern and western sides of our confederacy. It will, moreover, add to the commerce of Virginia, in particular, all the upper parts of the Ohio and its waters. * * * With respect to the doubts which you say are entertained by some, whether the upper waters of the Potomac can be rendered capable of navigation on account of the falls and rugged banks, they are answered, by observing that it is reduced to a maxim that whenever there is water enough to float a bateau, there may be navigation for a bateau. Canals and locks may be necessary, and they are expensive; but I hardly know what expense would be too great for the object in question.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. iii, 27. FORD ED., v, 93. (P., 1789.)

1120. CANAL, Santee and Cooper Rivers.—As to the Santee and Cooper rivers canal, I shall be glad to do anything I can to promote it. But I confess I have small expectations for the following reason: General Washington sent me a copy of the Virginia act for opening the Potomac. * * * It was pushed here [Paris] among the moneyed men to obtain subscriptions, but not a single one could be obtained. The stockjobbing in this city offered greater advantages than to buy shares in the canal.—To M. TERRASSON. ii, 383. (P., 1788.)

1121. CANDOR, Appeal to.—I ask only to be judged with truth and candor.—To THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY. iv, 397. (W., May 1801.)

1122. CANDOR, Appreciating.—If those, who thought I might have been remiss, would have written to me on the subject, I should have admired them for their candor, and thanked them for it; for I have no jealousies nor resentments at things of this kind, where I have no reason to believe they have been excited by a hostile spirit.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 589. FORD ED., iv, 248. (P., 1786.)

1123. CANNIBALS, Rulers as.—Cannibals are not to be found in the wilds of America only, but are revelling on the blood of every living people.—To CHARLES CLAS. vi, 413. (M., 1815.)

1124. CANNING (George), Policy of.—Canning's equivocations degrade his government as well as himself.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 468. (M., Sep. 1809.)

1125. CANOVA (A.), Washington's Statue and.—Who should make the Washington statue? There can be but one answer to this. Old Canova, of Rome. No artist in Europe would place himself in a line with him; and for thirty years, within my own knowledge, he has been considered by all Europe as without a rival.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vi, 534. (M., 1816.)

1126. CAPITAL, Corruption through.—The capital employed in paper speculation * * * has furnished effectual means of corrupting such a portion of the Legislature, as turns the balance between the honest voters, whichever way it is directed. This corrupt squadron, deciding the voice of the Legislature, have manifested their dispositions to get rid of the limitations imposed by the Constitution on the General Legislature, limitations, on the faith of which, the States acceded to that instrument.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 361. FORD ED., vi, 3. (Pa., May 1792.)

1127. CAPITAL, Creation of.—Capital may be produced by industry, and accumulated by economy; but jugglers only will propose to create it by legerdemain tricks with paper.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 241. FORD ED., ix, 413. (M., Nov. 1813.)

1128. CAPITAL, Opportunities for.—The citizens of a country like ours will never have unemployed capital. Too many enterprises are open, offering high profits, to permit them to lend their capitals on a regular and moderate interest. They are too enterprising and sanguine themselves not to believe they can do better with it.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. vi, 393. FORD ED., ix, 491. (M., 1815.)

1129. CAPITAL, Stock-jobbing and.—The capital employed in paper speculation

 nourishes in our citizens habits of vice and idleness, instead of industry and morality.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 361. FORD ED., vi, 3. (Pa., 1792.)

1130. ——. The capital employed in paper speculation is barren and useless, producing, like that on a gaming table, no accession to itself, and is withdrawn from commerce and agriculture, where it would have produced addition to the common mass.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 361. FORD ED., vi, 3. (Pa., 1792.)

— CAPITAL LAWS.—See DEATH PENALTY.

— CAPITAL, National.—See WASHINGTON CITY.

1131. CAPITALS (State), Location of.—The equal rights of all the inhabitants require that the seat of government should be as nearly central to all as may be.*—BILL TO REMOVE VA. CAPITAL. FORD ED., ii, 106. (1776.)

1132. ——. The seat of government [in Virginia] had been originally fixed in the peninsula of Jamestown, the first settlement of the colonists; and had been afterwards removed a few miles inland to Williamsburg. But this was at a time when our settlements had not extended beyond the tide waters. Now they had crossed the Alleghany; and the centre of population was very far removed from what it had been. Yet Williamsburg was still the depository of our archives, the habitual residence of the Governor and many other of the public functionaries, the established place for the sessions of the legislature, and the magazine of our military stores; and its situation was so exposed that it might be taken at any time in war, and, at this time particularly, an enemy might in the night run up either of the rivers, between which it lies, land a force above, and take possession of the place, without the possibility of saving either persons or things. I had proposed its removal so early as October, '76; but it did not prevail until the session of May, '79.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 40. FORD ED., i, 55. (1821.)

1133. CAPITOL (United States), Burning of.—The Vandalism of our enemy has triumphed at Washington over science as well as the arts, by the destruction of the public library with the noble edifice in which it was deposited. Of this transaction, as of that of Copenhagen, the world will entertain but one sentiment. They will see a nation suddenly withdrawn from a great war, full armed and full handed, taking advantage of another whom they had recently forced into it, unarmed, and unprepared, to indulge themselves in acts of barbarism which do not belong to a civilized age. When Van Ghent destroyed their shipping at Chatham, and De Ruyter rode triumphantly up the Thames, he might in like manner, by the acknowledgment of their own historians, have forced all their ships up to London Bridge, and there have burned them, the Tower, and city, had these examples been then set. London, when thus menaced, was near a thousand years old, Washington is but in its teens.—To S. H. SMITH. vi, 383. FORD ED., ix, 485. (M., Sep. 1814.)

1134. CAPITOL (United States), Inscription for.—If it be proposed to place an inscription on the Capitol, the lapidary style requires that essential facts only should be stated, and these with a brevity admitting no superfluous word. The essential facts in the two inscriptions proposed are these: "FOUNDED 1791.—BURNED BY A BRITISH ARMY 1814.—RESTORED BY CONGRESS 1817." The reasons for this brevity are that the letters must be of extraordinary magnitude to be read from below; that little space is allowed them, being usually put into a pediment or in a frieze, or on a small tablet on the wall; and in our case, a third reason may be added, that no passion can be imputed to this inscription, every word being justifiable from the most classical examples. But a question of more importance is whether there should be one at all? The barbarism of the conflagration will immortalize that of the nation. It will place them forever in degraded comparison with the execrated Bonaparte, who, in possession of almost every capitol in Europe, injured no one. Of this, history will take care, which all will read, while our inscription will be seen by few.—To JAMES MONROE. vii, 41. FORD ED., x, 65. (M., 1816.)

1135. CAPITOL (United States), Wisdom of Inscription.—But a question of more importance is whether there should be one at all? The barbarism of the conflagration will immortalize that of the nation. It will place them forever in degraded comparison with the execrated Bonaparte, who, in possession of almost every capitol in Europe, injured no one. Of this, history will take care, which all will read, while our inscription will be seen by few. Great Britain, in her pride and ascendancy, has certainly hated and despised us beyond every earthly object. Her hatred may remain, but the hour of her contempt is passed and is succeeded by dread; not a present, but a deep and distant one. It is the greater as she feels herself plunged into an abyss of ruin from which no human means point out an issue. We have also more reason to hate her than any nation on earth. But she is not now an object for hatred. She is falling from her transcendent sphere, which all men ought to have wished, but not that she should lose all place among nations. It is for the interest of all that she should be maintained nearly on a par with other members of the republic of nations. Her power absorbed into that of any other, would be an object of dread to all, and to us more than all, because we are accessible to her alone and through her alone. The armies of Bonaparte with the fleets of Britain would change the aspect of our destinies. Under these circumstances should we perpetuate hatred against her? Should we not, on the contrary, begin to open ourselves to other and more rational dispositions? It is not improbable that the circumstances of the war [1812] and her own circumstances may have brought her wise men to begin to view us with other and even with kindred eyes. Should not our wise men, then, lifted above the passions of the ordinary citizen, begin to contemplate what will be the interests of our country on so important a change among the elements which influence it? I think it would be better to give her time to show her present temper, and to prepare the minds of our citizens for a corresponding change of disposition, by acts of comity towards England rather than by commemoration of hatred. These views might be greatly extended. Perhaps, however, they are premature, and that I may see the ruin of England nearer than it really is. This will be matter of consideration with those to whose councils we have committed ourselves, and whose wisdom, I am sure, will conclude on what is best. Perhaps they may let it go off on the single and short consideration that the thing can do no good, and may do harm.—To JAMES MONROE. vii, 42. FORD ED., x, 66. (M., 1816.) See ARCHITECTURE.

1136. CAPTIVES, American in Algiers.

—The Algerines have taken two of our vessels, and I fear they will ask such a tribute for a forbearance of their piracies as the United States would be unwilling to pay. When this idea comes across my mind, my faculties are absolutely suspended between indignation and impatience.—To GENERAL GREENE. i, 509. (P., 1786.)

1137. CAPTIVES, Attempts at Ransom.—If Congress decide to redeem our captives, * * * it is of great importance that the first redemption be made at as low a price as possible, because it will form the future tariff. If these pirates find that they can have a very great price for Americans, they will abandon proportionally their pursuits against other nations to direct them towards ours.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 113. (P., 1787.)

1138. CAPTIVES, Failure to Release.

The demands of Algiers for the ransom of our prisoners, and also for peace, are so infinitely beyond our instructions that we must refer the matter back to Congress.*—To WM. CARMICHAEL. i, 580. (P., 1786.)

1139. CAPTIVES, Intercession of the Mathurins.—That the choice of Congress may be enlarged as to the instruments they may use for effecting the redemption [of our captives], I think it my duty to inform them that there is an order of priests called the Mathurins, the object of whose institution is to beg alms for the redemption of captives. They keep members always in Barbary, searching out the captives of their country, and redeem, I believe, on better terms than any other body, public or private. It occurred to me, that their agency might be obtained for the redemption of our prisoners at Algiers. I obtained conference with the General, and with some members of the order. The General, with all the benevolence and cordiality possible, undertook to act for us, if we should desire it. He told me that their last considerable redemption was of about three hundred prisoners, who cost them somewhat upwards of fifteen hundred livres apiece; but that they should not be able to redeem ours as cheap as they do their own, and that it must be absolutely unknown that the public concern themselves in the operation, or the price would be greatly enhanced. The difference of religion was not once mentioned, nor did it appear to me to be thought of. It was a silent reclamation and acknowledgment of fraternity between two religions of the same family which historical events of ancient date had rendered more hostile to one another than to their common adversaries.*—To JOHN JAY. ii, 113. (P., 1787.)

* Congress sent a Mr. Lambe to Europe with instructions respecting Algiers. Jefferson and Adams made him their agent to visit Algiers, but his mission resulted in failure. Referring to it, Jefferson wrote to Monroe (l. 606 [1786]. FORD ED., iv, 264) that, "an angel sent on this business, and so much limited in his terms, could have done nothing".—EDITOR.

1140. CAPTIVES, Jefferson and.—I do not wonder that Captain O'Bryan has lost patience under his long continued captivity, and that he may suppose some of the public servants have neglected him and his brethren. He may possibly have imputed neglect to me, because a forbearance to correspond with him would have that appearance, though it was dictated by the single apprehension, that if he received letters from me as Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, or as Secretary of State, it would increase the expectations of his captors, and raise the ransom beyond what his countrymen would be disposed to give, and so end in their perpetual captivity. But, in truth, I have labored for them constantly and zealously in every situation in which I have been placed. In the first moment of their captivity, I first proposed to Mr. Adams to take upon ourselves their ransom, though unauthorized by Congress. I proposed to Congress and obtained their permission to employ the Order of Mercy in France for their ransom, but never could obtain orders for the money till just as I was leaving France, and was obliged to turn the matter over to Mr. Short. As soon as I came here, I laid the matter before the President and Congress in two long reports, but Congress could not decide until the beginning of 1792, and then clogged their ransom by a previous requisition of peace. The unfortunate death of two successive commissioners [Paul Jones and Mr. Barclay] have still retarded their relief, and even should they be now relieved, will probably deprive me of the gratification of seeing my endeavors for them crowned at length with success by their arrival when I am here. It would, indeed, be grating to me if, after all, I should be supposed by them to have been indifferent to their situation. I will ask of your friendship to do me justice in their eyes, that to the pain I have already felt for them, may not be added that of their dissatisfaction.—To COLONEL DAVID. iii, 531. (Pa., 1793.)

1141. CARMICHAEL (William), Character.—Mr. Carmichael is, I think, very little known in America. I never saw him, and while I was in Congress I formed rather a disadvantageous idea of him. His letters * * * showed him vain, and more attentive to ceremony and etiquette, than we suppose men

* The Mathurins were employed, but the negotiations were fruitless, and the captives remained in prison. In December, 1790, Jefferson made an exhaustive report on the subject to Congress.—EDITOR.

of sense should be. I have now a constant correspondence with him, and find him a little hypochondriac and discontented. He possesses a very good understanding, though not of the first order. I have had great opportunities of searching into his character, and have availed myself of them. Many persons of different nations, coming from Madrid to Paris, all speak of him as in high esteem, and I think it certain that he has more of the Count de Blanca's friendship, than any diplomatic character at that court. As long as that minister is in office, Carmichael can do more than any other person who could be sent there.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 107. FORD ED., iv, 365. (P., 1787.)

1142. — —. Neither Mr. J. nor Mr. — ever mentioned one word of any want of decorum in Mr. Carmichael.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. iv, 108. FORD ED., vi, 513. (M., 1794.)

1143. CARMICHAEL (William), Spanish Mission and.—I think it probable that Mr. Carmichael will impute to me an event which must take place this year. In truth, it is so extraordinary a circumstance, that a public agent placed in a foreign court for the purpose of correspondence, should, in three years, have found means to get but one letter to us, that he must himself be sensible that if he could have sent us letters, he ought to be recalled as negligent, and if he could not, he ought to be recalled as useless. I have, nevertheless, procured his continuance, in order to give him an opportunity which occurred of his rendering a sensible service to his country, and thereby drawing some degree of favor on his return.—To COLONEL DAVID. iii, 532. (Pa., 1793.)

1144. CARMICHAEL (William), Standing in Spain.—With Mr. Carmichael I am unacquainted personally, but he stands on advantageous grounds in the opinion of Europe, and most especially in Spain. Every person, whom I see from there, speaks of him with great esteem. I mention this for your private satisfaction, as he seemed to be little known in Congress. Mr. Jay, however, knows him well.—To COL. MONROE. i, 526. (P., 1786.)

— CAROLINA (North).—See NORTH CAROLINA.

— CAROLINA (South).—See SOUTH CAROLINA.

1145. CARONDELET (Baron), Animosity of.—We are quite disposed to believe that the late wicked excitements [among the Indians] to war have proceeded from the Baron de Carondelet himself, without authority from his court. If so, have we not reason to expect the removal of such an officer from our neighborhood, as an evidence of the disavowal of his proceedings?—To CARMICHAEL AND SHORT. iii, 481. FORD ED., vi, 130. (Pa., 1792.)

1146. CARR (Dabney), Character.—His character was of a high order. A spotless integrity, sound judgment, handsome imagination, enriched by education and reading, quick and clear in his conceptions, of correct and ready elocution, impressing every hearer with the sincerity of the heart from which it flowed. His firmness was inflexible in whatever he thought was right; but when no moral principle stood in the way, never had man more of the milk of human kindness, of indulgence, of softness, of pleasantries of conversation and conduct. The number of his friends and the warmth of their affection, were proofs of his worth, and of their estimate of it. To give to those now living, an idea of the affliction produced by his death in the minds of all who knew him, I liken it to that lately felt by themselves on the death of his eldest son, Peter Carr, so like in all his endowments and moral qualities, and whose recollection can never recur without a deep-drawn sigh from the bosom of any one who knew him.—To DABNEY CARR, JR. vi, 528. FORD ED., x, 17. (M., 1816.)

1147. — —. Dabney Carr, * * * mover of the proposition of March, 1773, for Committees of Correspondence, the first fruit of which was the call of an American Congress, merits honorable mention in your history, if any proper occasion offers.—To MR. GIBBARDIN. vi, 411. (M., 1815.)

1148. — —. This friend of ours, Page, in a very small house, with a table, half a dozen chairs, and one or two servants, is the happiest man in the universe. Every incident in life he so takes as to render it a source of pleasure. With as much benevolence as the heart of man will hold, but with an utter neglect of the costly apparatus of life, he exhibits to the world a new phenomenon in philosophy—the Samian sage in the tub of the cynic.*—To JOHN PAGE. i, 195. FORD ED., i, 373. (1770.)

1149. CARRIAGES, Tax on.—Almost every carriage owner has been taken in for a double-tax; information through the newspapers not being actual, though legal, in a country where they are little read. This circumstance has made almost every man, so taken in, a personal enemy to the tax. I escaped the penalty only by sending an express over the country to search out the officer the day before the forfeiture would have been incurred.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 2. (M., Feb. 1795.)

1150. CARRYING TRADE, Preservation of the.—Admitting their right of keeping their markets to themselves, ours cannot be denied of keeping our carrying trade to ourselves.—REPORT ON THE FISHERIES. vii, 554. (1791.) See NAVIGATION.

1151. CARRYING TRADE, Protection of.—We find in some parts of Europe monopolizing discriminations, which, in the form of duties, tend effectually to prohibit the carrying thither our own produce in our own vessels. From existing amities, and a spirit of justice, it is hoped that friendly discussion will produce a fair and adequate reciprocity. But should false calculations of interest defeat our hope, it rests with the Legislature to decide whether they will meet inequalities abroad with countervailing inequalities at home, or provide for the evil in any other way.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 16. FORD ED., viii, 182. (Dec. 1802.)

1152. CARTER (Landon), Speeches of.—Landon Carter's speeches, like his writings, were dull, rapid, verbose, egotistical, smooth as the lullaby of the nurse, and commanding, like that, the repose only of the hearer.—To WILLIAM WIRT. vi, 486. FORD ED., ix, 474. (M., 1815.)

1153. CARTHAGE, History of.—It has often been a subject of regret, that Carthage had no writer to give her side of her own history, while her wealth, power and splendor prove she must have had a very distinguished policy and government.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 63. (M., 1817.)

1154. CENSORS, Government and.—No government ought to be without censors; and where the press is free, no one ever will.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 467. FORD ED., vi, 108. (M., 1792.)

1155. CENSURE, Pain of.—I find the pain of a little censure, even when it is unfounded, is more acute than the pleasure of much praise.—To F. HOPKINSON. ii, 587. FORD ED., v, 78. (P., 1789.)

1156. CENSUS, First U. S.—I enclose you a copy of the census which I have made out for you.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., v, 371. (Pa., 1791.)

1157. — — — Nearly the whole of the States have now returned their census. I send you the result. * * * Making a very small allowance for omissions, we are upwards of four millions; and we know in fact that the omissions have been very great.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. FORD ED., v, 372. (Pa., Aug. 1791.)

1158. CENSUS, Perfecting the.—For the articles of a statistical table, I think the last census of Congress presented what was proper, as far as it went, but did not go far enough. It required detailed accounts of our manufactures, and an enumeration of our people, according to ages, sexes and colors. But to this should be added an enumeration according to their occupations. We should know what proportion of our people are employed in agriculture, what proportion are carpenters, smiths, shoemakers, tailors, bricklayers, merchants, seamen, &c. No question is more curious than that of the distribution of society into occupations, and none more wanting. I have never heard of such tables being effected but in the instance of Spain, where it was first done under the administration, I believe, of Count D' Aranda, and a second time under the Count de Florida Blanca, and these have been considered as the most curious and valuable tables in the world. The combination of callings with us would occasion some difficulty, many of our tradesmen being, for instance, agriculturists also; but they might be classed under their principal occupation.—To THOMAS W. MAURY. vi, 548. (M., 1816.)

1159. CENTRALIZATION, Advancing toward.—I told the President [Washington] that they [the Hamilton party] had now brought forward a proposition, far beyond every one ever yet advanced, and to which the eyes of many were turned, as the decision which was to let us know, whether we live under a limited or an unlimited government, * * * [to wit], that in the Report on Manufactures which, under color of giving bounties for the encouragement of particular manufactures, meant to establish the doctrine, that the power given by the Constitution to collect taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States, permitted Congress to take everything under their management which they should deem for the public welfare, and which is susceptible of the application of money; consequently, that the subsequent enumeration of their powers was not the description to which resort must be had, and did not at all constitute the limits of their authority; that this was a very different question from that of the Bank [of the United States], which was thought an incident to an enumerated power.—THE ANAS. ix, 104. FORD ED., i, 177. (Feb. 1792.)

1160. — — — I wish to see maintained that wholesome distribution of powers established by the Constitution for the limitation of both; and never to see all offices transferred to Washington, where, further withdrawn from the eyes of the people, they may more secretly be bought and sold as at market.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 297. FORD ED., x, 232. (M., 1823.)

1161. CENTRALIZATION, Balance of Power and.—I said to [President Washington] that if the equilibrium of the three great bodies, Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary, could be preserved, if the Legislature could be kept independent, I should never fear the result of such a government; but that I could not but be uneasy when I saw that the Executive had swallowed up the Legislative branch.—ANAS. ix, 122. FORD ED., i, 204. (1792.)

1162. CENTRALIZATION, Corruption and.—Our government is now taking so steady a course as to show by what road it will pass to destruction, to wit: by consolidation first, and then corruption, its necessary consequence. The engine of consolidation will be the Federal judiciary; the two other branches the corrupting and corrupted instruments.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 223. (M., 1821.)

1163. — — — I do verily believe that * * * a single consolidated government would become the most corrupt government on the earth.—To GIDEON GRANGER. iv, 331. FORD ED., vii, 451. (M., Aug. 1800.)—

1164. CENTRALIZATION, Disguised Toryism.—Consolidation is but toryism in disguise.—To NATHANIEL MACON. FORD ED., x, 379. (M., 1826.)

1165. — — — The consolidationists may call themselves republicans if they please, but the school of Venice, and all of this principle, I call at once tories.—To NATHANIEL MACON. FORD ED., x, 378. (M., 1826.)

1166. CENTRALIZATION, Eastern States and.—I fear our eastern associates wish for consolidation, in which they would be joined by the smaller States generally.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 223. FORD ED., x, 194. (M., 1821.)

1167. CENTRALIZATION, Enumerated Powers and.—To take from the States all the powers of self-government and transfer them to a general and consolidated government, without regard to the special delegations and reservations solemnly agreed to in [the Federal] compact, is not for the peace, happiness or prosperity of these States.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 468. FORD ED., vii, 300. (1798.)

1168. CENTRALIZATION, Jobbery and.—You have seen the practices by which the public servants have been able to cover their conduct, or, where that could not be done, delusions by which they have varnished it for the eye of their constituents. What an augmentation of the field for jobbing, speculating, plundering, office-building and office-hunting would be produced by an assumption of all the State powers into the hands of the General Government.—TO GIDEON GRANGER. iv, 331. FORD ED., vii, 451. (M., Aug. 1800.)

1169. CENTRALIZATION, Judiciary drives on to.—After twenty years' confirmation of the federal system by the voice of the nation, declared through the medium of elections, we find the judiciary on every occasion, still driving us into consolidation.—TO SPENCER ROANE. vii, 134. FORD ED., x, 140. (P.F., 1819.)

1170. — — — It has long been my opinion, and I have never shrunk from its expression (although I do not choose to put it into a newspaper, nor like a Priam in armor to offer myself as its champion), that the germ of dissolution of our Federal Government is in the constitution of the Federal Judiciary; an irresponsible body (for impeachment is scarcely a scare-crow), working like gravity by night and by day, gaining a little to-day and a little to-morrow, and advancing its noiseless step like a thief, over the field of jurisdiction, until all shall be usurped from the States, and the government of all be consolidated into one. To this I am opposed; because, when all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the centre of all power, it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another, and will become as venal and oppressive as the government from which we separated. It will be, as in Europe, where every man must be either pike or gudgeon, hammer or anvil. Our functionaries and theirs are wares from the same workshop; made of the same materials and by the same hand. If the States look with apathy on this silent descent of their government into the gulf which is to swallow all, we have only to weep over the human character formed uncontrollable but by a rod of iron, and the blasphemers of man, as incapable of self-government, become his true historians.—TO C. HAMMOND. vii, 216. (M., 1821.)

1171. — — — We already see the power, installed for life, responsible to no authority (for impeachment is not even a scare-crow), advancing with a noiseless and steady pace to the great object of consolidation. The foundations are already deeply laid by their decisions for the annihilation of constitutional State rights, and the removal of every check, every counterpoise to the ingulfing power of which themselves are to make a sovereign part. If ever this vast country is brought under a single government, it will be one of the most extensive corruption, indifferent and incapable of a wholesome care over so wide a spread of surface. This will not be borne, and you will have to choose between reformation and revolution. If I know the spirit of this country, the one or the other is inevitable. Before the canker is become inveterate, before its venom has reached so much of the body politic as to get beyond control, remedy should be applied.—TO WILLIAM T. BARRY. vii, 256. (M., 1822.)

1172. — — — There is no danger I apprehend so much as the consolidation of our government by the noiseless, and, therefore, unalarming instrumentality of the Supreme Court. This is the form in which federalism now arrays itself, and consolidation is the present principle of distinction between republicans and the pseudo-republicans but real federalists.—TO WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 278. FORD ED., x, 248. (M., 1823.)

1173. CENTRALIZATION, Liberty and.—It is a singular phenomenon, that while our State governments are the very best in the world, without exception or comparison, our General Government has, in the rapid course of nine or ten years, become more arbitrary, and has swallowed more of the public liberty than even that of England.—TO JOHN TAYLOR. iv, 260. FORD ED., vii, 311. (M., 1798.)

1174. — — — What has destroyed the liberty and the rights of man in every government which has ever existed under the sun? The generalizing and concentrating all cares and powers into one body, no matter whether of the autocrats of Russia or France, or of the aristocrats of a Venetian Senate.—TO JOSEPH C. CABELL. vi, 543. (M., 1816.)

1175. CENTRALIZATION, Limitless.—It is but too evident that the branches of our foreign department of government, Executive, Judiciary and Legislative, are in combination to usurp the powers of the domestic branch, all so reserved to the States, and consolidate themselves into a single government without limitation of powers. I will not trouble you with details of the instances which are threadbare and unheeded. The only question is, what is to be done? Shall we give up the ship? No, by heavens, while a hand remains able to keep the deck. Shall we, with the hot-headed Georgian, stand at once to our arms? Not yet, nor until the evil, the only greater one than separation, shall be all upon us, that of living under a government of discretion. Between these alternatives there can be no hesitation. But, again, what are we to do? * * * We had better, at present, rest awhile on our oars and see which way the tide will set in Congress and in the State Legislatures.—TO WILLIAM F. GORDON. FORD ED., x, 358. (M., Jan. 1826.)

1176. CENTRALIZATION, Local Government vs.—It is not by the consolidation, or concentration of powers, but by their distribution, that good government is effected.

Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made, that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly, and what it can so much better do than a distant authority. Every State again is divided into counties, each to take care of what lies within its local bounds; each county again into townships or wards, to manage minutely details; and every ward into farms, to be governed each by its individual proprietor. * * * It is by this partition of cares, descending in gradation from general to particular, that the mass of human affairs may be best managed, for the good and prosperity of all.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 82. FORD ED., i, 113. (1821.)

1177. CENTRALIZATION, Local Interest and.—Of the two questions of the tariff and public improvements, the former, perhaps, is not yet at rest, and the latter will excite boisterous discussions. It happens that both these measures fall in with the western interests, and it is their secession from the agricultural States which gives such strength to the manufacturing and consolidating parties, on these two questions. The latter is the most dreaded, because thought to amount to a determination in the Federal government to assume all powers not-enumerated as well as enumerated in the Constitution, and by giving a loose to construction, make the text say whatever will relieve them from the bridle of the States. These are difficulties for your day; I shall give them the slip.—To RICHARD RUSH. vii, 380. FORD ED., x, 322. (M., 1824.)

1178. CENTRALIZATION, Opposition to.—I fear an explosion in our State Legislature. I wish they may restrain themselves to a strong but temperate protestation. Virginia is not at present in favor with her co-States. An opposition headed by her would determine all the anti-Missouri States to take the contrary side. She had better lie by, therefore, till the shoe shall pinch an eastern State.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 223. FORD ED., x, 194. (M., Oct. 1821.)

1179. CENTRALIZATION, Plunder and.—Our country is too large to have all its affairs directed by a single government. Public servants at such a distance, and from under the eye of their constituents, must, from the circumstance of distance, be unable to administer and overlook all the details necessary for the good government of the citizens; and the same circumstance, by rendering detection impossible to their constituents, will invite the public agents to corruption, plunder and waste.—To GIDEON GRANGER. iv, 331. FORD ED., vii, 451. (M., Aug. 1800.)

—CENTRALIZATION, Plundered Yeomanry and.—See YEOMANRY.

1180. CENTRALIZATION, Poverty and.—Were we directed from Washington when to sow, and when to reap, we should soon want bread.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 82. FORD ED., i, 113. (1821.)

1181. CENTRALIZATION, Resistance to.—Although I have little hope that the torrent of consolidation can be withstood, I should not be for giving up the ship without efforts to save her. She lived well through the first squall, and may weather the present one.—To C. W. GOOCH. vii, 430. (M., January 1826.)

1182. CENTRALIZATION, Revolution and.—I have been blamed for saying, that a prevalence of the doctrines of consolidation would one day call for reformation or revolution. I answer by asking if a single State of the Union would have agreed to the Constitution had it given all powers to the General Government? If the whole opposition to it did not proceed from the jealousy and fear of every State, of being subjected to the other States in matters merely its own? And if there is any reason to believe the States more disposed now than then, to acquiesce in this general surrender of all their rights and powers to a consolidated government, one and undivided?—To SAMUEL JOHNSON. vii, 293. FORD ED., x, 228. (M., 1823.)

1183. CENTRALIZATION, States' Rights and.—I see with the deepest affliction, the rapid strides with which the Federal branch of our government is advancing towards the usurpation of all the rights reserved to the States, and the consolidation in itself of all powers, foreign and domestic; and that too, by constructions which, if legitimate, leave no limits to their power. Take together the decisions of the Federal Court, the doctrines of the President [John Quincy Adams], and the misconstructions of the constitutional compact acted on by the legislature of the Federal branch, and it is but too evident, that the three ruling branches of that department are in combination to strip their colleagues, the State authorities, of the powers reserved by them, and to exercise themselves all functions foreign and domestic. Under the power to regulate commerce, they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, and call it regulation to take the earnings of one of these branches of industry, and that, too, the most depressed, and put them into the pockets of the other, the most flourishing of all. Under the authority to establish post roads, they claim that of cutting down mountains for the construction of roads, of digging canals, and aided by a little sophistry on the words "general welfare," a right to do, not only the acts to effect that, which are specifically enumerated and permitted, but whatsoever they shall think, or pretend will be for the general welfare. And what is our resource for the preservation of the Constitution? Reason and argument? You might as well reason and argue with the marble columns encircling them. The representatives chosen by ourselves? They are joined in the combination, some from incorrect views of government, some from corrupt ones, sufficient voting together to outnumber the sound parts; and with majorities only of one, two, or three, bold enough to go forward in defiance. Are we then to stand to our arms, with the hot-headed Georgian? No. That must be the last resource, not to be thought of until much longer and greater sufferings. If every infraction of a compact of so many parties is to be resisted at once, as a dissolution of it, none can ever be formed: which would last one year. We must have patience and longer endurance then with our brethren while under delusion; give them time for reflection and experience of consequences; keep ourselves in a situation to profit by the chapter of accidents; and separate from our companions only when the sole alternatives left, are the dissolution of our Union with them, or submission to a government without limitation of powers. Between these two evils, when we must make a choice, there can be no hesitation. But, in the meanwhile, the States should be watchful to note every material usurpation on their rights; denounce them as they occur in the most peremptory terms; to protest against them as wrongs to which our present submission shall be considered, not as acknowledgments or precedents of right, but as a temporary yielding to the lesser evil, until their accumulation shall outweigh that of separation. I would go still further, and give to the Federal member, by a regular amendment of the Constitution, a right to make roads and canals of intercommunication between the States, providing sufficiently against corrupt practices in Congress (log-rolling, &c.) by declaring that the Federal proportion of each State of the moneys so employed, shall be in works within the State, or elsewhere with its consent, and with a due salvo of jurisdiction. This is the course which I think safest and best as yet.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. vii, 426. FORD ED., x, 354. (M., Dec. 1825.)

1184. CENTRALIZATION, Venality and.—When all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the centre of all power, it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another, and will become as venal and oppressive as the government from which we separated.—To C. HAMMOND. vii, 216. (M., 1821.)

1185. CEREMONY, Suppression of monarchical.—We have suppressed all those public forms and ceremonies which tended to familiarize the public eye to the harbingers of another form of government.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 430. (W., April 1802.)

1186. CEREMONY, Unnecessary.—Mr. Adams, your predecessor, seemed to understand, on his being presented to the Court [of St. James's] that a letter was expected for the Queen also. You will be pleased to inform yourself whether the custom of that court requires this from us; and to enable you to comply with it, if it should, I enclose a letter sealed for the Queen, and a copy of it open for your own information. Should its delivery not be a requisite, you will be so good as to return it, as we do not wish to set a precedent which may bind us hereafter to a single unnecessary ceremony.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 441. FORD ED., vi, 74. (Pa., 1792.)

1187. CEREMONY, Yellow fever and.—Those [in Philadelphia] who caught the yellow fever seemed to consider every man as their personal enemy who would not catch their disorder, and many suffered themselves to think it was a sufficient cause for breaking off society with them. I became sensible of this on my next arrival in town, on perceiving that many declined visiting me with whom I had been on terms of the greatest friendship and intimacy. I determined, for the first time in my life, to stand on the ceremony of the first visit, even with my friends; because it served to sift out those who chose a separation.—To WILLIAM HAMILTON. FORD ED., vii, 441. (Pa., 1800.)

1188. CHANCELLORS, Inconsistencies of English.—The English Chancellors have gone on from one thing to another without any comprehensive or systematic view of the whole field of equity, and therefore they have sometimes run into inconsistencies and contradictions.—To PETER CARR. iii, 452. FORD ED., vi, 92. (Pa., 1792.)

— CHANCERY COURTS.—See COURTS.

1189. CHAPLAINS, Appointment of.—These small preferments. [chaplains to legislative bodies] should be reserved to reward and encourage genius, and not be strowed with an indiscriminating hand among the common herd of competitors.—To COLONEL W. PRESTON. FORD ED., i, 368. (1768.)

1190. CHARACTER, Evidence of.—The uniform tenor of a man's life furnishes better evidence of what he has said or done on any particular occasion than the word of any enemy, and of an enemy, too, who shows that he prefers the use of falsehoods which suit him to truths which do not.—To DE WITT CLINTON. iv, 520. (W., 1803.)

1191. CHARACTER, Public Service and.—There is sometimes an eminence of character on which society have such peculiar claims as to control the predilections of the individual for a particular walk of happiness, and restrain him to that alone arising from the present and future benedictions of mankind.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 364. FORD ED., vi, 5. (Pa., 1792.)

1192. CHARACTER, Rational.—Like the rest of mankind, General Washington was disgusted with atrocities of the French Revolution, and was not sufficiently aware of the difference between the rabble who were used as instruments of their perpetration, and the steady and rational character of the American people, in which he had not sufficient confidence.—INTRODUCTION TO ANAS. ix, 99. FORD ED., i, 168. (1818.)

1193. CHARACTER, Steady American.—The steady character of our countrymen is a rock to which we may safely moor.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 392. FORD ED., viii, 43. (W., March 1801.)

1194. CHARACTER, Strong American.—The order and good sense displayed in this recovery from delusion, and in the momentous crisis [Presidential election] which lately arose, really bespeak a strength of character in our nation which augurs well for the duration of our Republic; and I am much better satisfied now of its stability than I was before it was tried.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, iv, 374. FORD ED., viii, 22. (W., March 1801.)

1195. CHARITY, A duty.—Private charities, as well as contributions to public purposes in proportion to every one's circumstances, are certainly among the duties we owe to society.—To CHARLES CHRISTIAN. vi, 44. (M., 1812.)

1196. CHARITY, Principles of Distributing.—We are all doubtless bound to contribute a certain portion of our income to the support of charitable and other useful public institutions. But it is a part of our duty also to apply our contributions in the most effectual way we can to secure their object. The question, then, is whether this will not be better done by each of us appropriating our whole contributions to the institutions within our reach, under our own eye; and over which we can exercise some useful control? Or, would it be better that each should divide the sum he can spare among all the institutions of his State, or of the United States? Reason, and the interest of these institutions themselves, certainly decide in favor of the former practice. This question has been forced on me, heretofore, by the multitude of applications which have come to me from every quarter of the Union on behalf of academies, churches, missions, hospitals, charitable establishments, &c. Had I parcelled among them all the contributions which I could spare, it would have been for each too feeble a sum to be worthy of being either given or received. If each portion of the State, on the contrary, will apply its aids and its attentions exclusively to those nearest around them, all will be better taken care of. Their support, their conduct, and the best administration of their funds, will be under the inspection and control of those most convenient to take cognizance of them, and most interested in their prosperity.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. v, 489. (M., 1810.)

1197. — — — It is a duty certainly to give our sparings to those who want; but to see also that they are faithfully distributed, and duly apportioned to the respective wants of those receivers. And why give through agents whom we know not, to persons whom we know not, and in countries from which we get no account, when we can do it at short hand, to objects under our eye, through agents we know, and to supply wants we see? —To MR. MEGEAR. vii, 286. (M., 1823.)

1198. CHARITY, Rules in bestowing.—I deem it the duty of every man to devote a certain portion of his income for charitable purposes; and that it is his further duty to see it so applied as to do the most good of which it is capable. This I believe to be best insured, by keeping within the circle of his own inquiry and information the subjects of distress to whose relief his contributions shall be applied. If this rule be reasonable in private life, it becomes so necessary in my situation, that to relinquish it would leave me without rule or compass. The applications of this kind from different parts of our own, and foreign countries, are far beyond any resources within my command. The mission of Serampore, in the East Indies, the object of the present application, is but one of many items. However disposed the mind may feel to unlimited good, our means having limits, we are necessarily circumscribed by them. They are too narrow to relieve even the distresses under my own eye; and to desert these for others which we neither see nor know, is to omit doing a certain good for one which is uncertain. I know, indeed, there have been splendid associations for effecting benevolent purposes in remote regions of the earth. But no experience of their effect has proved that more good would not have been done by the same means employed nearer home. In explaining, however, my own motives of action, I must not be understood as impeaching those of others. Their views are those of an expanded liberality. Mine may be too much restrained by the law of usefulness. But it is a law to me, and with minds like yours, will be felt as a justification.—To DR. ROGERS. iv, 589. (W., 1806.)

1199. — — — The general relation in which I, some time since, stood to the citizens of all our States, drew on me such multitudes of applications as exceeded all resource. Nor have they abated since my retirement to the limited duties of a private citizen, and the more limited resources of a private fortune. They have obliged me to lay down as a law of conduct for myself, to restrain my contributions for public institutions to the circle of my own State, and for private charities to that which is under my own observation; and these calls I find more than sufficient for everything I can spare.—To CHARLES CHRISTIAN. vi, 44. (M., 1812.)

1200. CHARTERS, Abolishing.—He has combined with others * * * for taking away our charters.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

1201. CHARTERS, Altering.—But, what is of more importance [than the loss of property], and what they keep in this proposal [of Lord North] out of sight, as if no such point was in contest, they claim a right of altering all our charters and established laws, which leaves us without the least security for our lives or liberties.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 481. (July 1775.)

1202. CHARTERS, Violation of.—They [Parliament] have attempted fundamentally to alter the form of government in one of these Colonies, a form secured by charters on the part of the crown and confirmed by acts of its own legislature.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 468. (July 1775.)

1203. CHASE (Samuel), Independence and.—A Fourth of July oration, delivered in the town of Milford, in your State, gives to Samuel Chase the credit of having "first started the cry of Independence in the ears of his countrymen". Do you remember anything of this? I do not. I have no doubt it was uttered in Massachusetts even before it was by Thomas Paine. But, certainly, I never considered Samuel Chase as foremost, or even forward in that hallowed cry. I know that Maryland hung heavily on our backs, and that Chase, although first named, was not most in unison with us of that delegation.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 218. (1821.)

1204. CHASE (Samuel), Partisan charge of.—You must have heard of the extraordinary charge of Chase to the grand jury at Baltimore. Ought this seditious and official attack on the principles of our Constitution, and on the proceedings of a State, to go unpunished? And to whom so pointedly as yourself will the public look for the necessary measures? I ask these questions for your consideration; for myself it is better that I should not interfere.—To MR. NICHOLSON. iv, 486. (W., May 1803.)

1205. CHATHAM (Lord), Colonies and.—When I saw Lord Chatham's bill, I entertained high hope that a reconciliation could have been brought about. The difference between his terms and those offered by our Congress might have been accommodated, if entered on by both parties with a disposition to accommodate.—To DR. WILLIAM SMALL. i, 199. FORD ED., i, 454. (1775.)

1206. CHATHAM (Lord), Gratitude to.—I hope Lord Chatham may live till the fortune of war puts his son into our hands, and enables us by returning him safe to his father, to pay a debt of gratitude.—To JOHN PAGE. FORD ED., 496. (1775.)

1207. CHEMISTRY, Application of.—I have wished to see chemistry applied to domestic objects, to malting, for instance, brewing, making cider, to fermentation and distillation generally, to the making of bread, butter, cheese, soap, to the incubation of eggs, &c.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 73. (M., 1812.)

1208. CHEMISTRY, Experiments in.—The contradictory experiments of chemists leave us at liberty to conclude what we please. My conclusion is, that art has not yet invented sufficient aids to enable such subtle bodies [air, light, &c.] to make a well-defined impression on organs as blunt as ours; that it is laudable to encourage investigation but to hold back conclusion.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. ii, 431. (P., 1788.)

1209. CHEMISTRY, Merits attention.—I do not know whether you are fond of chemical reading. There are some things in this science worth reading.—To MR. RITTENHOUSE. i, 517. (P., 1786.)

1210. CHEMISTRY, Nomenclature.—The attempt of Lavoisier to reform the chemical nomenclature is premature. One single experiment may destroy the whole filiation of his terms; and his string of sulphates, sulphites, and sulphures, may have served no other end than to have retarded the progress of the science by a jargon, from the confusion of which time will be requisite to extricate us.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. ii, 432. (P., 1788.)

1211. ———. You have heard of the new chemical nomenclature endeavored to be introduced by Lavoisier, Fourcroy, &c. Other chemists of this country, of equal note, reject it, and prove in my opinion that it is premature, insufficient and false. These latter are joined by the British chemists; and upon the whole, I think the new nomenclature will be rejected, after doing more harm than good. There are some good publications in it, which must be translated into the ordinary chemical language before they will be useful.—To DR. CURRIE. ii, 544. (P., 1788.)

1212. ———. A schism has taken place among the chemists. A particular set of them in France have undertaken to remodel all the terms of the science, and to give to every substance a new name, the composition, and especially the termination of which, shall define the relation in which it stands to other substances of the same family. But the science seems too much in its infancy as yet, for this reformation; because in fact, the reformation of this year must be reformed again the next year, and so on, changing the names of substances as often as new experiments develop properties in them undiscovered before. The new nomenclature has, accordingly, been already proved to need numerous and important reformations. * * * It is espoused by the minority only here, and by very few, indeed, of the foreign chemists. It is particularly rejected in England.—To DR. WILLARD. iii, 15. (P., 1789.)

1213. CHEMISTRY, System of.—Chemistry is yet, indeed, a mere embryo. Its principles are contested; experiments seem contradictory; their subjects are so minute as to escape our senses; and their result too fallacious to satisfy the mind. It is probably an age too soon to propose the establishment of a system.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. ii, 431. (P., 1788.)

1214. CHEMISTRY, Utility of.—Speaking one day with Monsieur de Buffon, on the present ardor of chemical inquiry, he affected to consider chemistry but as cookery, and to place the toils of the laboratory on a footing with those of the kitchen. I think it, on the contrary, among the most useful of sciences, and big with future discoveries for the utility and safety of the human race.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. ii, 431. (P., 1788.)

1215. CHERBOURG, Expense of.—That work will be steadily pursued, and, in all probability, be finally successful. They calculate on half a million of livres, say twenty thousand pounds sterling, for every cone, and that there will be from seventy to eighty cones. Probably they must make more cones. Suppose

one hundred; this will be two millions of pounds sterling. Versailles has cost fifty millions of pounds sterling. Ought we to doubt then that they will persevere to the end in a work, small and useful in proportion as the other was great and foolish?—To Mr. CUTTING. ii, 438. (P., 1788.)

1216. CHERBOURG, Harbor of.—The King's visit to Cherbourg has made a great sensation in England and here [France]. It proves to the world, that it is a serious object to this country, and that the King commits himself for the accomplishment of it. Indeed, so many cones have been sunk, that no doubt remains of the practicability of it. It will contain, as is said, eighty ships of the line, be one of the best harbors in the world, and by means of two entrances, on different sides, will admit vessels to come in and go out with every wind. The effect of this, in another war with England, defies calculation.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 587. FORD ED., iv, 245. (P., 1786.)

1217. CHERBOURG, Invasion of England from.—An event seems to be preparing, in the order of things, which will probably decide the fate of that country [England]. It is no longer doubtful that the harbor of Cherbourg will be completed, that it will be a most excellent one, and capacious enough to hold the whole navy of France. Nothing has ever been wanting to enable France to invade that but a naval force conveniently stationed to protect the transports. This change of situation must oblige the English to keep up a great standing army, and there is no king, who, with sufficient force, is not always ready to make himself absolute.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 8. FORD ED., iv, 269. (P., 1786.)

1218. — — — This port will enable them in case of a war with England, to invade that country, or to annihilate its commerce, and of course its marine. Probably, too, it will oblige them to keep a standing army of considerable magnitude.—To Mr. HAWKINS. ii, 3. (P., 1786.)

1219. — — — The harbor of Cherbourg will * * * hold the whole [French] navy. This is putting a bridle into the mouth of England.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. ii, 11. (P., 1786.)

1220. CHEROKEE INDIANS, Hope-well Treaty and.—Were the treaty of Hope-well, and the act of acceptance of Congress to stand in any point in direct opposition to each other, I should consider the act of acceptance as void in that point; because the treaty is a law made by two parties, and not revocable by one of the parties either acting alone or in conjunction with a third party. If we consider the acceptance as a legislative act of Congress, it is the act of one party only; if we consider it as a treaty between Congress and North Carolina, it is but a subsequent treaty with another power, and cannot make void a preceding one, with a different power. But I see no such opposition between these two instruments. The Cherokees were entitled to the sole occupation of the lands within the limits guaranteed to them. The State of North Carolina, according to the jus gentium established for America by universal usage, had only a right of preemption of these lands against all other nations. It could convey, then, to its citizens only this right of preemption, and the right of occupation could not be united to it until obtained by the United States from the Cherokees. The act of cession of North Carolina only preserves the rights of its citizens in the same state as they would have been, had that act never been passed. It does not make imperfect titles perfect; but only prevents their being made worse. Congress, by their act, accept on these conditions. The claimants of North Carolina, then, and also the Cherokees, are exactly where they would have been, had neither the act of cession, nor that of acceptance, been ever made; that is, the latter possess the right of occupation, and the former the right of preemption. Though these deductions seem clear enough, yet the question would be a disagreeable one between the General Government, a particular government, and individuals, and it would seem very desirable to draw all the claims of preemption within a certain limit, by commuting for those out of it, and then to purchase of the Cherokees the right of occupation.—To HENRY KNOX. iii, 192. FORD ED., v, 237. (N.Y., 1790.)

1221. CHESAPEAKE, Attack on Frigate.—On the 22nd day of June last [1807], by a formal order from the British admiral, the frigate Chesapeake, leaving her port for distant service, was attacked by one of those vessels which had been lying in our harbors under the indulgences of hospitality, was disabled from proceeding, had several of her crew killed, and four taken away. On this outrage no commentaries are necessary. Its character has been pronounced by the indignant voice of our citizens with an emphasis and unanimity never exceeded. I immediately, by proclamation, interdicted our harbors and waters to all British armed vessels, forbade intercourse with them, and uncertain how far hostilities were intended, and the town of Norfolk, indeed, being threatened with immediate attack, a sufficient force was ordered for the protection of that place, and such other preparations commenced and pursued as the prospect rendered proper. An armed vessel of the United States was dispatched with instructions to our ministers at London to call on that government for the satisfaction and security required by the outrage. A very short interval ought now to bring the answer. * * * The aggression thus begun has been continued on the part of the British commanders by remaining within our waters, in defiance of the authority of the country, by habitual violations of its jurisdiction, and at length by putting to death one of the persons whom they had forcibly taken from on board the Chesapeake. These aggravations necessarily lead to the policy, either of never admitting an armed vessel into our harbors, or of maintaining in every harbor such an armed force as may constrain obedience to the laws, and protect the lives and property of our citizens, against their armed guests. But the expense of such a standing force, and its inconsistency with our principles, dispense with those obligations of hospitality which would necessarily call for it and leave us equally free to exclude the navy, as we are the army of a foreign power, from entering our limits.—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 83. FORD ED., viii, 152. (Oct. 27, 1807.)

1222. CHESAPEAKE, Demand for reparation.—We now send a vessel to call upon the British government for reparation for the past outrage, and security for the future, nor will anything be deemed security but a renunciation of the practice of taking persons out of our vessels, under the pretence of their being English.—To JOHN ARMSTRONG. v, 134. FORD ED., ix, 110. (W., July 1807.)

1223. — — — You will have seen by the proclamation the measures adopted. We act on these principles, 1. That the usage of nations requires that we shall give the offender an opportunity of making reparation and avoiding war.* 2. That we should give time to our merchants to get in their property and vessels and our seamen now afloat. And, 3. That the power of declaring war being with the Legislature, the Executive should do nothing, necessarily committing them to decide for war in preference to non-intercourse, which will be preferred by a great many.—To VICE-PRESIDENT CLINTON. v, 116. FORD ED., ix, 100. (W., July 1807.)

1224. — — — We have acted on these principles; 1, to give that government an opportunity to disavow and make reparation; 2, to give ourselves time to get in the vessels, property and seamen now spread over the ocean; 3, to do no act which might compromise Congress in their choice between war, non-intercourse, or any other measure.—To BARNABAS BIDWELL. v, 126. FORD ED., ix, 106. (W., 1807.)

1225. — — — Whether the outrage is a proper cause of war, belonging exclusively to Congress, it is our duty not to commit them by doing anything which would have to be retracted. We may, however, exercise the powers entrusted to us for preventing future insults within our harbors, and claim firmly satisfaction for the past. This will leave Congress free to decide whether war is the most efficacious mode of redress in our case, or whether, having taught so many other useful lessons to Europe, we may not add that of showing them that there are peaceable means of repressing injustice, by making it the interest of the aggressor to do what is just, and abstain from future wrong.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 114. FORD ED., ix, 87. (W., June 1807.)

1226. CHESAPEAKE, Excitement Over.—This country has never been in such a state

* The action of the commander of the Leopard was disavowed by the British government, and it also disclaimed the right of search in the case of ships of war.—EDITOR.

of excitement since the battle of Lexington.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 124. FORD ED., ix, 105. (July 1807.)

1227. — — — Never since the battle of Lexington have I seen this country in such a state of exasperation as at present, and even that did not produce such unanimity. The federalists themselves coalesce with us as to the object, though they will return to their trade of censuring every measure taken to obtain it.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 127. FORD ED., ix, 110. (W., July 1807.)

1228. CHESAPEAKE, Hostilities Threatened.—You will perceive by the enclosed copies of letters from Captain Decatur that the British commanders have their foot on the threshold of war. They have begun the blockade of Norfolk; have sounded the passage to the town, which appears practicable for three of their vessels, and menace an attack on the Chesapeake and Cybele. These, with four gunboats, form the present defence, and there are four more gunboats in Norfolk nearly ready. The four gunboats at Hampton are hauled up, and in danger, four in Mopjack bay are on the stocks. Blows may be hourly possible.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. v, 117. FORD ED., ix, 101. (W., July 1807.)

1229. CHESAPEAKE, Interdiction of British ships.—The interdicted ships are enemies. Should they be forced, by stress of weather, to run up into safer harbors, we are to act towards them as we would towards enemies in regular war, in a like case. Permit no intercourse, no supplies; and if they land, kill or capture them as enemies. If they lie still, Decatur has orders not to attack them without stating the case to me, and awaiting instructions. But if they attempt to enter the Elizabeth River, he is to attack them without awaiting for instructions. Other armed vessels, putting in from sea in distress, are friends. They must report themselves to the collector, he assigns them their station, and regulates their repairs, supplies, intercourse and stay. Not needing flags, they are under the direction of the collector alone, who should be reasonably liberal as to their repairs and supplies, furnishing them for a voyage to any of their American ports.—To JAMES MADISON. v, 173. FORD ED., ix, 130. (M., Aug. 1807.)

1231. — — — If they come ashore, they must be captured, or destroyed if they cannot be captured, because we mean to enforce the proclamation rigorously in preventing supplies.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 191. (M., Sep. 1807.)

1232. ——. The authority of the proclamation is to be maintained, no supplies to be permitted to be carried to the British vessels, nor their vessels permitted to land. For these purposes force, and to any extent, is to be applied, if necessary, but not unless necessary; nor, considering how short a time the present state of things has to continue, would I recommend any extraordinary vigilance or great industry in seeking even just occasions for collision. It will suffice to do what is right when the occasion comes into their way.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 202. (Oct. 1807.)

1233. CHESAPEAKE, New injuries.—Should the British government give us reparation of the past, and security for the future, yet the continuance of their vessels in our harbors in defiance constitutes a new injury, which will not be included in any settlement with our ministers, and will furnish good ground for declaring their future exclusion from our waters, in addition with the reasonable ground before existing.—To JAMES MADISON. v, 195. FORD ED., ix, 139. (M., Sep. 1807.)

1234. CHESAPEAKE, Premeditation suspected.—Though in the first moments of the outrage on the Chesapeake I did not suppose it was by authority from their government, I now more and more suspect it, and of course, that they will not give the reparation for the past and security for the future, which alone may prevent war. The new depredations committing on us, with this attack on the Chesapeake, and their calling on Portugal to declare on the one side or the other, if true, prove they have coolly calculated it will be to their benefit to have everything on the ocean fair prize, and to support their navy by plundering all mankind. * * * It is really mortifying that we should be forced to wish success to Bonaparte, and to look to his victories as our salvation.—To COLONEL JOHN TAYLOR. v, 149. (W., Aug. 1807.)

1235. CHESAPEAKE, Preparations at New York.—The spirit of the orders to Decatur should be applied to New York. So long as the British vessels merely enter the Hook, or remain quiet there, I would not precipitate hostilities. I do not sufficiently know the geography of the harbor to draw the line which they should not pass. * * * But a line should be drawn which if they attempt to pass, Commodore Rogers should attack them with all his force.—To ROBERT SMITH. v, 196. FORD ED., ix, 140. (M., Sep. 1807.)

1236. CHESAPEAKE, Status of British captives.—The relation in which we stand with the British naval force within our waters is so new, that differences of opinion are not to be wondered at respecting the captives, who are the subject of your letter. Are they insurgents against the authority of the laws? Are they public enemies, acting under the orders of their sovereign? Or will it be more just to take their character from the act of Congress for the preservation of peace in our waters, which authorizes a qualified war against persons of their demeanor, defining its objects, and limiting its extent? Considering this act as constituting the state of things between us and them, the captives may certainly be held as prisoners of war. If we restore them it will be an act of favor, and not of any right they can urge. Whether Great Britain will give us that reparation for the past and security for the future, which we have categorically demanded, cannot as yet be foreseen; but we have believed we should afford an opportunity of doing it, as well from justice and the usage of nations, as a respect to the opinion of an impartial world, whose approbation and esteem are always of value. This measure was requisite, also, to produce unanimity among ourselves. * * * It was necessary, too, for our own interests, afloat on the ocean. * * * These considerations render it still useful that we should avoid every act which may precipitate immediate and general war, or in any way shorten the interval so necessary for our own purposes; and they render it advisable that the captives, in the present instance, should be permitted to return, with their boat, arms, &c., to their ships. * * * And we wish the military to understand that while, for special reasons, we restore the captives in this first instance, we applaud the vigilance and activity which, by taking them, have frustrated the object of their enterprise, and urge a continuance of them, to intercept all intercourse with the vessels, their officers and crews, and to prevent them from taking or receiving supplies of any kind; and for this purpose, should the use of force be necessary, they are unequivocally to understand that force is to be employed without reserve or hesitation.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 141. FORD ED., ix, 89. (W., July 1807.)

1237. CHESAPEAKE, Tergiversation of Great Britain.—The communications made to Congress at their last session explained the posture in which the close of the discussion, relating to the attack by a British ship of war on the frigate Chesapeake, left a subject on which the nation had manifested so honorable a sensibility. Every view of what had passed authorized a belief that immediate steps would be taken by the British government for redressing a wrong, which the more it was investigated, appeared the more clearly to require what had not been provided for in the special mission. It is found that no steps have been taken for the purpose. On the contrary, it will be seen, in the documents laid before you, that the inadmissible preliminary which obstructed the adjustment is still adhered to; and moreover, that it is now brought into connection with the distinct and irrelevant case of the orders in council.—EIGHTH ANNUAL MESSAGE viii, 105. FORD ED., ix, 220. (Nov, 1808.)

1238. CHILDREN, Affection for.—No considerations in this world would compensate to me a separation from yourself and your sister.—To MARY JEFFERSON EPPES. FORD ED., vii, 478. (W., Jan. 1801.)

1239. ——. Francis will ever be to me one of the dearest objects in life.—To JOHN W. EPPES. FORD ED., ix, 107. (W., 1807.)

1240. CHILDREN, A blessing.—I sincerely congratulate you on the addition to your family. The good old Book, speaking of children says, "happy is the man who hath his quiver full of them".—To CÆSAR A. RODNEY. FORD ED., ix, 144. (W., 1807.)

1241. CHILDREN, Good humor in.—In the ensuing autumn, I shall be sending on to Philadelphia a grandson of about fifteen years of age, to whom I shall ask your friendly attentions. Without that bright fancy which captivates, I am in hopes he possesses sound judgment and much observation; and, what I value more than all things, good humor.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. v, 225. (W., 1808.)

1242. CHILDREN, Happiness and.—An only daughter and numerous family of grandchildren, will furnish me great resources of happiness.—To CHARLES THOMSON. v, 403. FORD ED., ix, 234. (W., 1808.)

1243. ——. My expectations from you are high, yet not higher than you may attain. Industry and resolution are all that are wanting. Nobody in this world can make me so happy, or so miserable, as you. Retirement from public life will ere long become necessary for me. To your sister and yourself I look to render the evening of my life serene and contented. Its morning has been clouded by loss after loss, till I have nothing left but you. I do not doubt either your affections or your dispositions. But great exertions are necessary, and you have little time left to make them. Be industrious, then, my child. Think nothing insurmountable by resolution and application, and you will be all that I wish you to be.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 374. (1787.)

1244. CHILDREN, Moral training of.—When your sister arrives [in France] she will become a precious charge on your hands. The difference of your age and your common loss of a mother, will put that office on you. Teach her above all things to be good, because without that we can neither be valued by others nor set any value on ourselves. Teach her always to be true; no vice is so mean as the want of truth, and at the same time so useless. Teach her never to be angry; anger only serves to torment ourselves, to divert others, and alienate their esteem. And teach her industry, and application to useful pursuits. I will venture to assure you that if you inculcate this in her mind, you will make her a happy being herself, a most interesting friend to you, and precious to all the world.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 375.

1245. CHILDREN, Prattle of.—You were never more mistaken than in supposing you were too long on the prattle, &c., of little Anne [his granddaughter]. I read it with quite as much pleasure as you write it.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. FORD ED., vi, 163. (Pa., 1793.)

1246. CHINA, Conciliation of.—Punqua Winchung the Chinese Mandarin, has, I believe, his headquarters at New York, and therefore his case is probably known to you. He came to Washington just as I had left it [for Monticello], and therefore wrote to me, praying for permission to depart to his own country with his property, in a vessel to be engaged by himself. * * * I consider it as a case of national comity, and coming within the views of the first section of the first embargo act. The departure of this individual with good dispositions, may be the means of making our nation known advantageously at the source of power in China, to which it is otherwise difficult to convey information. It may be of sensible advantage to our merchants in that country. I cannot, therefore, but consider that a chance of obtaining a permanent national good will should overweigh the effect of a single case taken out of the great field of the embargo. The case, too, is so singular, that it can lead to no embarrassment as a precedent.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 325. (M., July 1808.)

1247. ——. In the case of the Chinese Mandarin, * * * the opportunity hoped from that, of making known through one of its own characters of note, our nation, our circumstances and character, and of letting that government understand at length the difference between us and the English, and separate us in its policy, rendered that measure a diplomatic one in my view, and likely to bring lasting advantage to our merchants and commerce with that country.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 344. (M., Aug. 1808.)

1248. CHOCOLATE, Tea, coffee and.—The superiority of chocolate, both for health and nourishment, will soon give it the same preference over tea and coffee in America, which it has in Spain.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 494. (P., 1785.)

—CHRISTIANITY, The Common Law and.—See COMMON LAW.

1249. CHURCH, Definition of a.—A church is "a voluntary society of men, joining themselves together of their own accord, in order to the public worshipping of God in such a manner as they judge acceptable to Him and effectual to the salvation of their souls". It is voluntary, because no man is by nature bound to any church. The hope of salvation is the cause of his entering into it. If he find anything wrong in it, he should be as free to go out as he was to come in.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED., ii, 101. (1776?)

1250. CHURCH, Jurisdiction.—Each church being free, no one can have jurisdiction over another one, not even when the civil magistrate joins it. It neither acquires the right of the sword by the magistrate's coming to it, nor does it lose the rights of instruction or excommunication by his going from it. It cannot by the accession of any new member acquire jurisdiction over those who do not accede. He brings only himself, having no power to bring others. Suppose, for instance, two churches, one of Arminians, another of Calvinists in Constantinople, has either any right over the other? Will it be said the orthodox one has? Every church is to itself orthodox; to others erroneous or heretical.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED., ii, 99. (1776?)

1251. CHURCH, Law of.—What is the power of that church? As it is a society, it must have some laws for its regulation. Time and place of meeting; admitting and excluding members, &c., must be regulated. But as it was a spontaneous joining of members, it follows that its laws extend to its own members only, not to those of any other voluntary society; for then, by the same rule, some other voluntary society might usurp power over them.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED., ii, 101. (1776?)

1252. CHURCH, Regulation of.—If anything pass in a religious meeting seditiously and contrary to the public peace, let it be punished in the same manner and no otherwise than as if it had happened in a fair or market. These meetings ought not to be sanctuaries for faction and flagitiousness.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED., ii, 102. (1776?)

1253. CHURCH (Anglican in Virginia), Disestablishment of.—The first settlers of Virginia were Englishmen, loyal subjects to their king and church, and the grant to Sir Walter Raleigh contained an express proviso that their laws "should not be against the true Christian faith, now professed in the Church of England". As soon as the state of the colony admitted, it was divided into parishes, in each of which was established a minister of the Anglican church, endowed with a fixed salary, in tobacco, a glebe house and land with the other necessary appendages. To meet these expenses, all the inhabitants of the parishes were assessed, whether they were or not, members of the established church. Towards Quakers who came here, they were most cruelly intolerant, driving them from the colony by the severest penalties. In process of time, however, other sectarisms were introduced, chiefly of the Presbyterian family; and the established clergy, secure for life in their glebes and salaries, adding to these, generally, the emoluments of a classical school, found employment enough, in their farms and school-rooms, for the rest of the week, and devoted Sunday only to the edification of their flock, by service, and a sermon at their parish church. Their other pastoral functions were little attended to. Against this inactivity, the zeal and industry of sectarian preachers had an open and undisputed field; and by the time of the Revolution, a majority of the inhabitants had become dissenters from the established church, but were still obliged to pay contributions to support the pastors of the minority. This unrighteous compulsion, to maintain teachers of what they deemed religious errors, was grievously felt during the regal government, and without a hope of relief. But the first republican legislature, which met in '76, was crowded with petitions to abolish this spiritual tyranny.

These brought on the severest contests in which I have ever been engaged. Our great opponents were Mr. Pendleton and Robert Carter Nicholas; honest men, but zealous churchmen. The petitions were referred to the "committee of the Whole House on the State of the Country";* and, after desperate contests in that committee, almost daily from the 11th of October to the 5th of December, we prevailed so far only, as to repeal the laws which rendered criminal the maintenance of any religious opinions, the forbearance of repairing to church, or the exercise of any mode of worship; and further, to exempt dissenters from contributions to the support of the established church; and to suspend, only until the next session, levies on the members of that church for the salaries of their own incumbents. For although the majority of our citizens were dissenters, as has been observed, a majority of the legislature were churchmen. Among these, however, were some reasonable and liberal men, who enabled us, on some points, to obtain feeble majorities. But our opponents carried, in the general resolutions of the committee of Nov. 19, a declaration that religious assemblies ought to be regulated, and that provision ought to be made for continuing the succession of the clergy, and superintending their conduct. And, in the bill, now passed,† was inserted an express reservation of the question, whether a general assessment should not be established by law, on every one, to the support of the pastor of his choice; or whether all should be left to voluntary contributions; and on this question, debated at every session, from '76 to '79 (some of our dissenting allies, having now secured their particular object, going over to the advocates of a general assessment), we could only obtain a suspension from session to session until '79, when the question against a general assessment was finally carried, and the establishment of the Anglican church entirely put down. In justice to the two honest but zealous opponents, who have been named, I must add, that although, from their natural temperaments, they were more disposed generally to acquiesce in things as they are, than to risk innovations, yet whenever the public will had once decided, none were more faithful or exact in their obedience to it.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 38. 1259. — — —. To suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion, and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles on supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy, which at once destroys all religious liberty, because he being, of course, judge of that tendency will make his opinions the rule of judgment, and approve or condemn the sentiments of others only as they shall square with or suffer from his own.—STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM. viii, 455. FORD ED., ii, 239. 1260. CHURCH AND STATE, False Religions.—The impious presumption of legislators and rulers, civil as well as ecclesiastical, who, being themselves but fallible and uninspired men, have assumed dominion over the faith of others, setting up their own opinions and modes of thinking as the only true and infallible, and as such endeavoring to impose them on others, hath established and maintained false religions over the greatest part of the world and through all time.—STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM. viii, 454. FORD ED., ii, 38. 1264. CHURCH AND STATE, New York, Pennsylvania and.—Our sister States of Pennsylvania and New York have long subsisted without any establishment at all. The experiment was new and doubtful when they made it. It has answered beyond conception. They flourish infinitely. Religion is well supported; of various kinds, indeed, but all good enough; all sufficient to preserve peace and order; or if a sect arises, whose tenets would subvert morals, good sense has fair play, and reasons and laughs it out of doors, without suffering the State to be troubled with it. They do not hang more malefactors than we do. They are not more disturbed with religious dissensions. On the contrary, their harmony is unparalleled, and can be ascribed to nothing but their unbounded tolerance, because there is no other circumstance in which they differ from every nation on earth. They have made the happy discovery, that the way to silence religious disputes, is to take no notice of them.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 402. FORD ED., iii, 265. (1782.)

1265. CHURCH AND STATE, People and.—The people have not given the magistrate the care of souls because they could not. They could not, because no man has the right to abandon the care of his salvation to another.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED., ii, 101. (1776?)

The forcing a man to support this or that teacher even of his own religious persuasion, is depriving him of the comfortable liberty of giving his contributions to the particular pastor whose morals he would make his pattern, and whose powers he feels most persuasive to righteousness; and is withdrawing from the ministry those temporary rewards, which, proceeding from an approbation of their personal conduct, are an additional incitement to earnest and unremitting labors for the instruction of mankind.—STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM. viii, 454. FORD ED., ii, 238. (1779.)

1269. CHURCH AND STATE, Wall of separation.—Believing that religion is a matter which lies solely between man and his God, that he owes account to none other for his faith or his worship, that the legislative powers of government reach actions only, and not opinions, I contemplate with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their Legislature should "make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof", thus building a wall of separation between Church and State.—R. to A. 1271. CINCINNATI SOCIETY, Foundation.—When the army was about to be disbanded, and the officers to take final leave, perhaps never again to meet, it was natural for men who had accompanied each other through so many scenes of hardship, of difficulty, and danger, who, in a variety of instances, must have been rendered mutually dear by those aids and good offices to which their situations had given occasion; it was natural, I say, for these to seize with fondness any proposition which promised to bring them together again at certain and regular periods. And this, I take for granted, was the origin and object of this institution; and I have no suspicion that they foresaw, much less intended, those mischiefs which exist perhaps in the forebodings of politicians only. I doubt, however, whether, in its execution, it would be found to answer the wishes of those who framed it, and to foster those friendships it was intended to preserve. The members would be brought together at their annual assemblies, no longer to encounter a common enemy, but to encounter one another in debate and sentiment. For something, I suppose, is to be done at these meetings, and, however unimportant, it will suffice to produce difference of opinion, contradiction and irritation. The way to make friends quarrel is to put them in disputation under the public eye. An experience of near twenty years has taught me that few friendships stand this test, and that public assemblies, where every one is free to act and speak, are the most powerful looseners of the bands of private friendship. I think, therefore, that this institution would fail in its principal object, the perpetuation of the personal friendships contracted through the war.—TO GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 333. FORD ED., iii, 465. (A., April 1784.)

* Before sending this reply to the Danbury Baptists, Jefferson enclosed a copy of it to Levi Lincoln, his Attorney General, with a note (FORD ED., viii, 129) in which he said: "The Baptist address admits of a condemnation of the alliance between Church and State, under the authority of the Constitution. It furnishes an occasion, too, which I have long wished to find, of saying why I do not proclaim fastings and thanksgivings, as my predecessors did. * * * I know it will give great offence to the New England clergy; but the advocate of religious freedom is to expect neither peace nor forgiveness from them. Will you be so good as to examine the answer, and suggest any alterations which might prevent an ill effect, or promote a good one among the people? You understand the temper of those in the North, and can weaken it, therefore, to their stomachs; it is at present seasoned to the Southern taste only."—EDITOR.

1272. CINCINNATI SOCIETY, Objections to.—The objections of those who are opposed to the institution shall be briefly sketched. They urge that it is against the Confederation—against the letter of some of our constitutions, against the spirit of all of them—that the foundation on which all these are built is the natural equality of man, the denial of every preeminence but that annexed to legal office, and, particularly, the denial of preeminence by birth; that, however, in their present dispositions, citizens might decline accepting honorary instalments into the order, a time may come, when a change of dispositions would render these flattering, when a well-directed distribution of them might draw into the order all the men of talents, of office and wealth, and, in this case, would probably procure an ingraftment into the government; that in this, they will be supported by their foreign members, and the wishes and influence of foreign courts; that experience has shown that the hereditary branches of modern governments are the patrons of privilege and prerogative, and not of the natural rights of the people, whose oppressors they generally are; that, besides these evils, which are remote, others may take place more immediately; that a distinction is kept up between the civil and military, which it is for the happiness of both to obliterate; that when the members assemble they will be proposing to do something, and what that something may be, will depend on actual circumstances; that being an organized body under habits of subordination, the first obstructions to enterprise will be already surmounted; that the moderation and virtue of a single character have probably prevented this Revolution from being closed, as most others have been, by a subversion of that liberty it was intended to establish; that he is not immortal, and his successor, or some of his successors, may be led by false calculation into a less certain road to glory.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 334. FORD ED., iii, 466. (A., April 1784.)

1273. CINCINNATI SOCIETY, Opposition in Congress.—What are the sentiments of Congress on this subject, and what line they will pursue, can only be stated conjecturally. Congress, as a body, if left to themselves, will, in my opinion, say nothing on the subject. They may, however, be forced into a declaration by instructions from some of the States, or by other incidents. Their sentiments, if forced from them, will be unfriendly to the institution. If permitted to pursue their own path, they will check it by side-blows whenever it comes in their way, and in competitions for office, on equal or nearly equal ground, will give silent preference to those who are not of the fraternity. My reasons for thinking this are, 1. The grounds on which they lately declined the foreign order proposed to be conferred on some of our citizens. 2. The fourth of the fundamental articles of constitution for the new States. * * * 3. Private conversations on this subject with the members. * * * I have taken occasion to extend these, not, indeed, to the military members, because, being of the order, delicacy forbade it, but to the others pretty generally; and among these, I have as yet found but one who is not opposed to the institution.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 335. FORD ED., iii, 467. (A., April 1784.)

1274. CINCINNATI SOCIETY, Sentiment in France.—What has heretofore passed between us on this institution, makes it my duty to mention to you that I have never heard a person in Europe, learned or unlearned, express his thoughts on this institution, who did not consider it as dishonorable and destructive to our governments; and that every writing which has come out since my arrival here [Paris] in which it is mentioned, considers it, even as now reformed, as the germ whose development is one day to destroy the fabric we have reared. I did not apprehend this while I had American ideas only. But I confess that what I have seen in Europe has brought me over to that opinion; and that though the day may be at some distance, beyond the reach of our lives, perhaps, yet it will certainly come, when a single fibre left of this institution will produce an hereditary aristocracy, which will change the form of our governments from the best to the worst in the world. To know the mass of evil which flows from this fatal source, a person must be in France. He must see the finest soil, the finest climate, the most compact State, the most benevolent character of people, and every earthly advantage combined, insufficient to prevent this scourge from rendering existence a curse to twenty-four out of twenty-five parts of the inhabitants of this country. With us, the branches of this institution cover all the States. The southern ones at this time are aristocratical in their disposition; and that that spirit should grow and extend itself, is within the natural order of things. I do not flatter myself with the immortality of our governments; but I shall think little also of their longevity, unless this germ of destruction be taken out. When the society themselves shall weigh the possibility of evil against the impossibility of any good to proceed from this institution, I cannot help hoping they will eradicate it. I know they wish the permanence of our governments as much as any individuals composing them.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 61. FORD ED., iv, 328. (P., Nov. 1786.)

1275. CIPHER, Jefferson's.—A favorable and confidential opportunity offering by M. Dupont de Nemours, who is revisiting his native country * * * I send you a cipher to be used between us, which will give you some trouble to understand, but, once understood, is the easiest to use, the most undecipherable, and varied by a new key with the greatest facility of any I have ever known. I am in hopes the explanation enclosed will be sufficient. Let our key of letters be [some figures which are illegible] and the key of lines be [figures illegible], and lest we should lose our key or be absent from it, it is so formed as to be kept in the memory and put upon paper at pleasure; being produced by writing our names and residences at full length, each of which containing twenty-seven letters is divided into three parts of nine letters each; and each of the nine letters is then numbered according to the place it would hold if the nine were arranged alphabetically thus [so blotted as to be illegible]. The numbers over the letters being then arranged as the letters to which they belong stand in our names, we can always construct our key. But why a cipher between us, when official things go naturally to the Secretary of State, and things not political need no cipher? 1. Matters of a public nature, and proper to go on our records, should go to the Secretary of State. 2. Matters of a public nature, not proper to be placed on our records, may still go to the Secretary of State, headed by the word "private." But, 3, there may be matters merely personal to ourselves, and which require the cover of a cipher more than those of any other character. This last purpose and others, which we cannot foresee, may render it convenient and advantageous to have at hand a mask for whatever may need it.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 431. FORD ED., viii, 143. (W., 1802.)

1276. CIRACCHI, Genius of.—Ciracchi was second to no sculptor living except Canova; and, if he had lived, he would have rivalled him. His style had been formed on the fine models of antiquity in Italy, and he had caught their ineffable majesty of expression. On his return to Rome, he made the bust of General Washington in marble, from that in plaster; it was sent over here, was universally considered as the best effigy of him ever executed, was bought by the Spanish minister for the King of Spain, and sent to Madrid.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vi, 535. (M., 1816.)

1277. CITIES, Corruption and.—When we get piled upon one another in large cities, as in Europe, we shall become as corrupt as in Europe.*—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 479. (P., Dec. 1787.)

* In the Congress edition (ii, 332) this extract has been edited so as to read: "When we get piled upon one another in large cities, as in Europe, we shall become corrupt as in Europe, and go to eating one another as they do there."—EDITOR.

one hundred; this will be two millions of pounds sterling. Versailles has cost fifty millions of pounds sterling. Ought we to doubt then that they will persevere to the end in a work, small and useful in proportion as the other was great and foolish?—To Mr. CUTTING. ii, 438. (P., 1788.)

1216. CHERBOURG, Harbor of.—The King's visit to Cherbourg has made a great sensation in England and here [France]. It proves to the world, that it is a serious object to this country, and that the King commits himself for the accomplishment of it. Indeed, so many cones have been sunk, that no doubt remains of the practicability of it. It will contain, as is said, eighty ships of the line, be one of the best harbors in the world, and by means of two entrances, on different sides, will admit vessels to come in and go out with every wind. The effect of this, in another war with England, defies calculation.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 587. FORD ED., iv, 245. (P., 1786.)

1217. CHERBOURG, Invasion of England from.—An event seems to be preparing, in the order of things, which will probably decide the fate of that country [England]. It is no longer doubtful that the harbor of Cherbourg will be completed, that it will be a most excellent one, and capacious enough to hold the whole navy of France. Nothing has ever been wanting to enable France to invade that but a naval force conveniently stationed to protect the transports. This change of situation must oblige the English to keep up a great standing army, and there is no king, who, with sufficient force, is not always ready to make himself absolute.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 8. FORD ED., iv, 269. (P., 1786.)

1218. — — — This port will enable them in case of a war with England, to invade that country, or to annihilate its commerce, and of course its marine. Probably, too, it will oblige them to keep a standing army of considerable magnitude.—To Mr. HAWKINS. ii, 3. (P., 1786.)

1219. — — — The harbor of Cherbourg will * * * hold the whole [French] navy. This is putting a bridle into the mouth of England.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. ii, 11. (P., 1786.)

1220. CHEROKEE INDIANS, Hopewell Treaty and.—Were the treaty of Hopewell, and the act of acceptance of Congress to stand in any point in direct opposition to each other, I should consider the act of acceptance as void in that point; because the treaty is a law made by two parties, and not revocable by one of the parties either acting alone or in conjunction with a third party. If we consider the acceptance as a legislative act of Congress, it is the act of one party only; if we consider it as a treaty between Congress and North Carolina, it is but a subsequent treaty with another power, and cannot make void a preceding one, with a different power. But I see no such opposition between these two instruments. The Cherokees were entitled to the sole occupation of the lands within the limits guaranteed to them. The State of North Carolina, according to the jus gentium established for America by universal usage, had only a right of preemption of these lands against all other nations. It could convey, then, to its citizens only this right of preemption, and the right of occupation could not be united to it until obtained by the United States from the Cherokees. The act of cession of North Carolina only preserves the rights of its citizens in the same state as they would have been, had that act never been passed. It does not make imperfect titles perfect; but only prevents their being made worse. Congress, by their act, accept on these conditions. The claimants of North Carolina, then, and also the Cherokees, are exactly where they would have been, had neither the act of cession, nor that of acceptance, been ever made; that is, the latter possess the right of occupation, and the former the right of preemption. Though these deductions seem clear enough, yet the question would be a disagreeable one between the General Government, a particular government, and individuals, and it would seem very desirable to draw all the claims of preemption within a certain limit, by commuting for those out of it, and then to purchase of the Cherokees the right of occupation.—To HENRY KNOX. iii, 192. FORD ED., v, 237. (N.Y., 1790.)

1221. CHESAPEAKE, Attack on Frigate.—On the 22nd day of June last [1807], by a formal order from the British admiral, the frigate Chesapeake, leaving her port for distant service, was attacked by one of those vessels which had been lying in our harbors under the indulgences of hospitality, was disabled from proceeding, had several of her crew killed, and four taken away. On this outrage no commentaries are necessary. Its character has been pronounced by the indignant voice of our citizens with an emphasis and unanimity never exceeded. I immediately, by proclamation, interdicted our harbors and waters to all British armed vessels, forbade intercourse with them, and uncertain how far hostilities were intended, and the town of Norfolk, indeed, being threatened with immediate attack, a sufficient force was ordered for the protection of that place, and such other preparations commenced and pursued as the prospect rendered proper. An armed vessel of the United States was dispatched with instructions to our ministers at London to call on that government for the satisfaction and security required by the outrage. A very short interval ought now to bring the answer. * * * The aggression thus begun has been continued on the part of the British commanders by remaining within our waters, in defiance of the authority of the country, by habitual violations of its jurisdiction, and at length by putting to death one of the persons whom they had forcibly taken from on board the Chesapeake. These aggravations necessarily lead to the policy, either of never admitting an armed vessel into our harbors, or of maintaining in every harbor such an armed force as may constrain obedience to the laws, and protect the lives and property of our citizens, against their armed guests. But the expense of such a standing force, and its inconsistency with our principles, dispense with those obligations of hospitality which would necessarily call for it, and leave us equally free to exclude the navy, as we are the army of a foreign power, from entering our limits.—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 83. FORD ED., viii, 152. (Oct. 27. 1807.)

1222. CHESAPEAKE, Demand for reparation.—We now send a vessel to call upon the British government for reparation for the past outrage, and security for the future, nor will anything be deemed security but a renunciation of the practice of taking persons out of our vessels, under the pretence of their being English.—To JOHN ARMSTRONG. v, 134. FORD ED., ix, 116. (W., July 1807.)

1223. — — — You will have seen by the proclamation the measures adopted. We act on these principles, 1. That the usage of nations requires that we shall give the offender an opportunity of making reparation and avoiding war.* 2. That we should give time to our merchants to get in their property and vessels and our seamen now afloat. And, 3. That the power of declaring war being with the Legislature, the Executive should do nothing, necessarily committing them to decide for war in preference to non-intercourse, which will be preferred by a great many.—To VICE-PRESIDENT CLINTON. v, 116. FORD ED., ix, 100. (W., July 1807.)

1224. — — — We have acted on these principles; 1, to give that government an opportunity to disavow and make reparation; 2, to give ourselves time to get in the vessels, property and seamen, now spread over the ocean; 3, to do no act which might compromise Congress in their choice between war, non-intercourse, or any other measure.—To BARNABAS BIDWELL. v, 126. FORD ED., ix, 106. (W., 1807.)

1225. — — — Whether the outrage is a proper cause of war, belonging exclusively to Congress, it is our duty not to commit them by doing anything which would have to be retracted. We may, however, exercise the powers entrusted to us for preventing future insults within our harbors, and claim firmly satisfaction for the past. This will leave Congress free to decide whether war is the most efficacious mode of redress in our case, or whether, having taught so many other useful lessons to Europe, we may not add that of showing them that there are peaceable means of repressing injustice, by making it the interest of the aggressor to do what is just, and abstain from future wrong.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 114. FORD ED., ix, 87. (W., June 1807.)

of excitement since the battle of Lexington.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 124. FORD ED., ix, 105. (July 1807.)

1227. — — — Never since the battle of Lexington have I seen this country in such a state of exasperation as at present, and even that did not produce such unanimity. The federalists themselves coalesce with us as to the object, though they will return to their trade of censuring every measure taken to obtain it.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 127. FORD ED., ix, 110. (W., July 1807.)

1228. CHESAPEAKE, Hostilities Threatened.—You will perceive by the enclosed copies of letters from Captain Decatur that the British commanders have their foot on the threshold of war. They have begun the blockade of Norfolk; have sounded the passage to the town, which appears practicable for three of their vessels, and menace an attack on the Chesapeake and Cybele. These, with four gunboats, form the present defence, and there are four more gunboats in Norfolk nearly ready. The four gunboats at Hampton are hauled up, and in danger, four in Mopjack bay are on the stocks. Blows may be hourly possible.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. v, 117. FORD ED., ix, 101. (W., July 1807.)

1229. CHESAPEAKE, Interdiction of British ships.—The interdicted ships are enemies. Should they be forced, by stress of weather, to run up into safer harbors, we are to act towards them as we would towards enemies in regular war, in a like case. Permit no intercourse, no supplies; and if they land, kill or capture them as enemies. If they lie still, Decatur has orders not to attack them without stating the case to me, and awaiting instructions. But if they attempt to enter the Elizabeth River, he is to attack them without awaiting for instructions. Other armed vessels, putting in from sea in distress, are friends. They must report themselves to the collector, he assigns them their station, and regulates their repairs, supplies, intercourse and stay. Not needing flags, they are under the direction of the collector alone, who should be reasonably liberal as to their repairs and supplies, furnishing them for a voyage to any of their American ports.—To JAMES MADISON. v, 173. FORD ED., ix, 130. (M., Aug. 1807.)

1230. — — — The intention of the [British] squadron in the bay is so manifestly pacific, that your instructions are perfectly proper, not to molest their boats merely for approaching the shore. While they are giving up slaves and citizen seamen, and attempting nothing ashore, it would not be well to stop this by any new restriction.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 191. (M., Sep. 1807.)

1231. — — — If they come ashore, they must be captured, or destroyed if they cannot be captured, because we mean to enforce the proclamation rigorously in preventing supplies.—To W. H. CABELL. v, 191. (M., Sep. 1807.)

1278. CITIES, Evils of.—I view great cities as pestilential to the morals, the health, and the liberties of man. True, they nourish some of the elegant arts, but the useful ones can thrive elsewhere, and less perfection in the others, with more health, virtue and freedom, would be my choice.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 335. FORD ED., vii, 459. (M., 1800.)

1279. CITIES, Federalist strongholds.—The cities [were] the strongholds of federalism.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 292. FORD ED., x, 227. (M., 1823.)

1280. ———. The inhabitants of the commercial cities are as different in sentiment and character from the country people as any two distinct nations, and are clamorous against the order of things [republicanism] established by the agricultural interest.—To M. PICTET. iv, 463. (W., 1803.)

1281. CITIES, Foreign Character of.—In our cities your son will find distant imitations of the cities of Europe. But if he wishes to know the nation, its occupations, manners, and principles, they reside not in the cities. He must travel through the country, accept the hospitalities of the country gentlemen, and visit with them the school of the people.—To MADAME DE STAEL. v, 133. (W., 1807.)

1282. ———. Our cities exhibit specimens of London only; our country is a different nation.—To M. DASHKOFF. v, 463. (M., 1809.)

1283. CITIES, Founding.—There are places [in Virginia] at which * * * the laws have said there shall be towns; but nature has said there shall not. * * * Accidental circumstances, however, may control the indications of nature, and in no instance do they do it more frequently than in the rise and fall of towns.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 351. FORD ED., iii, 213. (1782.)

1284. CITIES, Life in.—A city life offers indeed more means of dissipating time, but more frequent, also, and more painful objects of vice and wretchedness.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 310. (M., 1823.)

1285. CITIES, Misery in.—Even here we find too strong a current from the country to the towns; and instances are beginning to appear of that species of misery, which you are so humanely endeavoring to relieve with you. Although we have in the old countries of Europe the lesson of their experience to warn us, yet I am not satisfied we shall have the firmness and wisdom to profit by it.—To DAVID WILLIAMS, v, 514. (W., 1803.)

1286. ———. The general desire of men to live by their heads rather than their hands, and the strong allurements of great cities to those who have any turn for dissipation threaten to make them here, as in Europe, the sinks of voluntary misery.—To DAVID WILLIAMS. iv, 514. (W., 1803.)

1287. CITIES, Political influence of.—The commercial cities, though, by the command of newspapers, they make a great deal of noise, have little effect in the direction of the government.—To M. PICTET. iv, 463. (W., 1803.)

1288. CITIZENS, Adopted.—Born in other countries, yet believing you could be happy in this, our laws acknowledge, as they should do, your right to join us in society, conforming * * * to our established rules. That these rules shall be as equal as prudential considerations will admit, will certainly be the aim of our legislatures, general and particular.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iv, 394. (W., May 1801.)

1289. ———. If the unexampled state of the world has, in any instance, occasioned among us temporary departures from the system of equal rule, the restoration of tranquillity will doubtless produce reconsideration; and your knowledge of the liberal conduct heretofore observed towards strangers settling among us will warrant the belief that what is right will be done.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iv, 394. (May 1801.)

1290. CITIZENS, Dangerous.—Every society has a right to fix the fundamental principles of its association, and to say to all individuals, that, if they contemplate pursuits beyond the limits of these principles, and involving dangers which the society chooses to avoid, they must go somewhere else for their exercise; that we want no citizens, and still less ephemeral and pseudo-citizens, on such terms. We may exclude them from our territory, as we do persons infected with disease. We have most abundant resources of happiness within ourselves, which we may enjoy in peace and safety without permitting a few citizens, infected with the mania of rambling and gambling, to bring danger on the great mass engaged in innocent and safe pursuits at home.—To WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. i, 6. FORD ED., x, 34. (M., 1816.)

1291. CITIZENS, Fraudulent and real.—[As to citizens] there is a distinction which we ought to make ourselves, and with which the belligerent powers [France and England] ought to be content. Where, after the commencement of a war, a merchant of either comes here and is naturalized, the purpose is probably fraudulent against the other, and intended to cloak their commerce under our flag. This we should honestly discountenance, and never reclaim their property when captured. But merchants from either, settled and made citizens before a war, are citizens to every purpose of commerce, and not to be distinguished in our proceedings from natives. Every attempt of Great Britain to enforce her principle of "once a subject, always a subject" beyond the case of her own subjects, ought to be repelled.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 251. (July 1803.) See EXPATRIATION.

1292. CITIZENS, Government and.—Give to every citizen, personally, a part in the administration of the public affairs.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 13. FORD ED., x, 41. (M., 1816.)

1293. CITIZENS, Military service and.—Every citizen [should] be a soldier. This was the case with the Greeks and Romans, and must be that of every free State.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 131. (M., 1813.)

1294. CITIZENS, Protection of.—It is an obligation of every government to yield protection to its citizens as the consideration of their obedience.—To JOHN JAY. i, 458. (P., 1785.)

1296. — — —. The persons and property of our citizens are entitled to the protection of our government in all places where they may lawfully go.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 624. (1793.)

1297. CITIZENS, Relief of imprisoned.—There are in the prison of St. Pol de Leon six or seven citizens of the United States of America, charged with having attempted a contraband of tobacco, but, as they say themselves, forced into that port by stress of weather. I believe that they are innocent. Their situation is described to me as deplorable as should be that of men found guilty of the worst of crimes. They are in close jail, allowed three sous a day only, and unable to speak a word of the language of the country. I hope their distress, which it is my duty to relieve, * * * will apologize for the liberty I take of asking you to advise them what to do for their defence, to engage some good lawyer for them, and to pass them the pecuniary reliefs necessary. I write to Mr. Lister Asquith, the owner of the vessel, that he may draw bills on me from time to time, for a livre a day for every person of them, and what may be necessary to engage a lawyer for him.—To M. DESBORDES. i, 402. (P., 1785.)

1298. — — —. I take the liberty of troubling your excellency on behalf of six citizens of the United States who have been for some time confined in the prison of St. Pol de Leon, and of referring for particulars to the enclosed state of their case. * * * I have thus long avoided troubling your Excellency with this case, in hopes it would receive its decision in the ordinary course of law, and I relied that that would indemnify the sufferers, if they had been used unjustly; but though they have been in close confinement, now near three months, it has yet no appearance of approaching to decision. In the meantime, the cold of the winter is coming on, and, to men in their situation, may produce events which would render all indemnification too late. I must, therefore, pray the assistance of your Excellency, for the liberation of their persons, if the established order of things may possibly admit of it.—To COUNT DE VERGENNES. i, 479. (P., 1785.)

expected calamity have a right to call for the patronage of the public servants.—To JOHN JAY. i, 583. (P., 1786.) See ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS, EXPATRIATION, NATURALIZATION.

1300. CITIZENSHIP, Government and.—No Englishman will pretend that a right to participate in government can be derived from any other source than a personal right, or a right of property. The conclusion is inevitable that he, who had neither his person nor property in America, could rightfully assume a participation in its government.—To M. SOULÉS. ix, 299. FORD ED., iv, 306. (P., 1786.)

— CIVIL SERVICE.—See OFFICE.

1301. CIVILIZATION, Letters and.—Our experience with the Indians has proved that letters are not the first, but the last step in the progression from barbarism to civilization.—To JAMES PEMBERTON. v, 303. (W., 1808.)

1302. CIVILIZATION, Progress of.—The idea which you present of the progress of society from its rudest state to that it has now attained, seems conformable to what may be probably conjectured. Indeed, we have under our eyes tolerable proofs of it. Let a philosophic observer commence a journey from the savages of the Rocky Mountains, eastwardly to our seacoast. These he would observe in the earliest stages of association living under no law but that of nature, subsisting and covering themselves with the flesh and skins of wild beasts. He would next find those on our frontiers in the pastoral state, raising domestic animals to supply the defects of hunting. Then succeed our semi-barbarous citizens, the pioneers of the advance of civilization, and so in his progress he would meet the gradual shades of improving man until he would reach his, as yet, most improved state in our seaport towns. This, in fact, is equivalent to a survey, in time, of the progress of man from the infancy of creation to the present day. I am eighty-one years of age, born where I now live, in the first range of mountains in the interior of our country. And I have observed this march of civilization advancing from the sea coast, passing over us like a cloud of light, increasing our knowledge and improving our condition, insomuch as that we are at this time more advanced in civilization here than the seaports were when I was a boy. And where this progress will stop no one can say. Barbarism has, in the meantime, been receding before the steady step of amelioration; and will in time, I trust, disappear from the earth. You seem to think that this advance has brought on us too complicated a state of society, and that we should gain in happiness by treading back our steps a little way. I think, myself, that we have more machinery of government than is necessary, too many parasites living on the labor of the industrious. I believe it might be much simplified to the relief of those who maintain it. Your experiment seems to have this in view. A society of seventy families, the number you name, may very possibly be governed as a single family, subsisting on their common industry, and holding all things in common. Some regulators of the family you still must have, and it remains to be seen at what period of your increasing population your simple regulations will cease to be sufficient to preserve order, peace, and justice.—To WILLIAM LUDLOW. vii, 377. (M., 1824.)

1303. CLAIBORNE (W. C. C.), Ap- pointed Governor.—Among the enclosed commissions is one for yourself as Governor of the Territory of Orleans. With respect to this I will enter into frank explanations. This office was originally destined for a person* whose great services and established fame would have rendered him peculiarly acceptable to the nation at large. Circumstances, however, exist, which do not now permit his nomination, and perhaps may not at any time hereafter. That, therefore, being suspended and entirely contingent, your services have been so much approved as to leave no desire to look elsewhere to fill the office. Should the doubts you have sometimes expressed, whether it would be eligible for you to continue, still exist in your mind, the acceptance of the commission gives you time to satisfy yourself by further experience, and to make the time and manner of withdrawing, should you ultimately determine on that, agreeable to yourself.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. iv, 558. (M., Aug. 1804.)

1304. CLAIBORNE (W. C. C.), Federalists and.—The federalists have been long endeavoring to batter down the Governor, who has always been a firm republican. There were characters superior to him whom I wished to appoint, but they refused the office. I know no better man who would accept of it, and it would not be right to turn him out for one not better.—To JOHN DICKINSON. v, 30. FORD ED., ix, 8. (W., 1807.)

1305. CLAIMANTS, Assistance to.—It is impossible for me to give any authority for the advance of moneys to Mr. Wilson. Were we to do it in his case, we should, on the same principles, be obliged to do it in several others, wherein foreign nations decline or delay doing justice to our citizens. No law of the United States would cover such an act of the executive; and all we can do legally is to give him all the aid which our patronage of his claims with the British court can effect.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 526. (Pa., 1793.)

1306. CLAIMS, Settle just.—Mr. Cutting has a claim against the government. * * * I have only to desire that you will satisfy yourself as to the facts * * * and communicate the same to me, that justice may be done between the public and the claimant.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 445. (Pa., 1792.)

1307. CLARK (George Rogers), Greatness of.—I know the greatness of General Clark's mind and am the more mortified at the cause which obscures it. Had not this unhappily taken place, there was nothing he might not have hoped; could it be surmounted, his lost ground might yet be recovered. No man alive rated him higher than I did, and would again, were he to become what I knew him. We are made to hope he is writing an account of his expeditions north of Ohio. They will be valuable morsels of history, and will justify to the world those who have told them how great he was.—To HARRY INNES. iii, 217. FORD ED., v, 295. (Pa., 1791.)

1308. CLARKE (Daniel), Consul at New Orleans.—I have appointed Mr. Daniel Clarke, at New Orleans, our consul there. His worth and influence will aid you powerfully in the interfering interests of those who go, and who reside there.—To WILLIAM C. CLAIBORNE. FORD ED., viii, 72. (W., July 1801.)

— CLASSICS, Study of the.—See LANGUAGES.

1309. CLAY (Henry), Opposition to Jefferson.—It is true, as you have heard, that a distance has taken place between Mr. Clay and myself. The cause I never could learn, nor imagine. I had always known him to be an able man, and I believe him an honest one. I had looked to his coming into Congress with an entire belief that he would be cordial with the administration, and, even before that, I had always had him in my mind for a high and important vacancy which had been, from time to time, expected, but is only now about to take place. I feel his loss, therefore, with real concern, but it is irremediable from the necessity of harmony and cordiality between those who are to manage the public concerns. Not only his withdrawing from the usual civilities of intercourse with me (which even the federalists with two or three exceptions keep up), but his open hostility in Congress to the administration, leave no doubt of the state of his mind as a fact, although the cause be unknown.—To THOMAS COOPER. v, 183. (M., Sep. 1807.)

1310. CLERGY, Benefit of.—This privilege, originally allowed to the clergy, is now extended to every man, and even to women. It is a right of exemption from capital punishment, for the first offence, in most cases. It is, then, a pardon by the law. In other cases, the Executive gives the pardon. But when laws are made as mild as they should be, both these pardons are absurd. The principle of Beccaria is sound. Let the legislators be merciful, but the executors of the law inexorable.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 263. FORD ED., iv, 168. (P., 1786.)

1311. CLERGY, Public office and.—In the scheme of constitution for Virginia which I prepared in 1783, I observe an abridgment of the right of being elected, which after seventeen years more of experience and reflection, I do not approve. It is the incapacitation of a clergyman from being elected. The clergy, by getting themselves established by law, and ingrafted into the machine of government, have been a very formidable engine against the civil and religious rights of man. They are still so in many countries, and even in some of these United States. Even in 1783, we doubted the stability of our recent measures for reducing them to the footing of other useful callings. It now appears that our means were effectual. The clergy here seem to have relinquished all pretension to privilege, and to stand on a footing with lawyers, physicians, &c. They ought, therefore, to possess the same rights.—To JEREMIAH MOOR. FORD ED., vii, 454. (M., Aug. 1800.)

1312. CLERGY, Support of.—In the ancient feudal times of our good old forefathers, when the seigneur married his daughter, or knighted his son, it was the usage for his vassals to give him a year's rent extra in the name of an aid. I think it as reasonable when our pastor builds a house, that each of his flock should give him an aid of a year's contribution. I enclose mine as a tribute of justice, which of itself indeed is nothing, but as an example, if followed, may become something. In any event, be pleased to accept it as an offering of duty.—To THE REV. MR. HATCH. FORD ED., x, 197. (M., 1821.) See CHURCH, CHURCH AND STATE, MINISTERS, RELIGION.

1313. CLIMATE, American and European.—The comparison of climate between Europe and North America, taking together its corresponding parts, hangs chiefly on three great points. 1. The changes between heat and cold in America are greater and more frequent, and the extremes comprehend a greater scale on the thermometer in America than in Europe. Habit, however, prevents these from affecting us more than the smaller changes of Europe affect the European. But he is greatly affected by ours. 2. Our sky is always clear; that of Europe always cloudy. Hence a greater accumulation of heat here than there, in the same parallel. 3. The changes between wet and dry are much more frequent and sudden in Europe than in America. Though we have double the rain, it falls in half the time. Taking all these together, I prefer much the climate of the United States to that of Europe. I think it a more cheerful one. It is our cloudless sky which has eradicated from our constitutions all disposition to hang ourselves, which we might otherwise have inherited from our English ancestors. During a residence of between six and seven years in Paris, I never, but once, saw the sun shine through a whole day, without being obscured by a cloud in any part of it; and I never saw the moment, in which, viewing the sky through its whole hemisphere, I could say there was not the smallest speck of a cloud in it. I arrived at Monticello, on my return from France, in January; and during only two months' stay there, I observed to my daughters, who had been with me to France, that, twenty odd times within that term, there was not a speck of cloud in the whole atmosphere. Still, I do not wonder that an European should prefer his gray to our azure sky. Habit decides our taste in this, as in most other cases.—To C. F. VOLNEY. iv, 570. (W., 1805.)

1314. CLIMATE, Enjoyment and.—Certainly it is a truth that climate is one of the sources of the greatest sensual enjoyment.—To DR JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 441. FORD ED., viii, 160. (W., 1802.)

1315. CLIMATE, Habit and.—In no case, perhaps, does habit attach our choice or judgment more than in climate. The Canadian glows with delight in his sleigh and snow; the very idea of which gives me the shivers.—To C. F. VOLNEY. iv, 569. (W., 1805.)

1316. CLIMATE, Humidity.—It has been an opinion pretty generally received among philosophers, that the atmosphere of America is more humid than that of Europe. Monsieur de Buffon makes this hypothesis one of the two pillars whereon he builds his system of the degeneracy of animals in America. Having had occasion to controvert this opinion of his, as to the degeneracy of animals there, I expressed a doubt of the fact assumed that our climates are more moist. I did not know of any experiments which might authorize a denial of it. Speaking afterwards on the subject with Dr. Franklin, he mentioned to me the observations he had made on a case of magnets, made for him by Mr. Nairne in London. Of these you will see a detail, in the second volume of the American Philosophical Transactions, in a letter from Dr. Franklin to Mr. Nairne, wherein he recommends to him to take up the principle therein explained, and endeavor to make an hygrometer, which, taking slowly the temperature of the atmosphere, shall give its mean degree of moisture, and enable us to make with more certainty, a comparison between the humidities of different climates. May I presume to trouble you with an inquiry of Mr. Nairne, whether he has executed the Doctor's idea? and if he has, to get him to make for me a couple of the instruments he may have contrived. They should be made of the same piece, and under like circumstances, that sending one to America, I may rely on its indications there, compared with those of the one I shall retain here [Paris]. Being in want of a set of magnets also, I would be glad if he would at the same time send me a set, the case of which should be made as Dr. Franklin describes his to have been, so that I may repeat his experiment.—To MR. VAUGHAN. ii, 82. (P., 1786.)

1317. CLIMATE, Humidity gauge.—I think Mr. Rittenhouse never published an invention of his in this way, which was a very good one. It was of an hygrometer which, like the common ones, was to give the actual moisture of the air. He has two slips of mahogany about five inches long, three-fourths of an inch broad, and one-tenth of an inch thick, the one having the grain running lengthwise, and the other crosswise. These are glued together by their faces, so as to form a piece five inches long, three-fourths of an inch broad, and one-third of an inch thick, which is stuck by its lower end into a little plinth of wood, presenting their edge to the view. The fibres of the wood, you know, are dilated, but not lengthened by moisture. The slip, therefore, whose grain is lengthwise, becomes a standard, retaining always the same precise length. That which has its grain crosswise, dilates with moisture, and contracts for the want of it. If the right hand piece be the cross-grained one, when the air is very moist, it lengthens, and forces its companion to form a kind of interior annulus of a circle on the left. When the air is dry, it contracts, draws its companion to the right, and becomes itself the interior annulus. In order to show this dilation and contraction, an index is fixed on the upper end of two of the slips; a plate of metal or wood is fixed on the upper end of two of the slips; a plate of metal or wood is fastened to the front of the plinth, so as to cover the two slips from the eye. A slit, being nearly the portion of a circle, is cut in this plate, so that the shank of the index may play freely through its whole range. On the edge of the slit is a graduation. The objection to this instrument is, that it is not fit for comparative observations, because no two pieces of wood being of the same texture exactly, no two will yield exactly alike to the same agent. However, it is less objectionable on this account than are most of the substances used. Mr. Rittenhouse had a thought of trying ivory; but I do not know whether he executed it. All these substances not only vary from one another at the same time, but from themselves at different times. All of them, however, have some peculiar advantages, and I think this, on the whole, appeared preferable to any other I had ever seen.—To Mr. VAUGHAN. ii, 83. (P.; 1786.)

1318. CLIMATE, Madeira.—[I am] told that the temperature of Madeira is generally from 55° to 65°, its extreme about 50° and 70°. If I ever change my climate for health, it should be for that Island.—To Dr. HUGH WILLIAMSON. iv, 346. FORD ED., vii, 479. (W., 1801.)

1319. CLIMATE, Old persons and.—I have a great opinion of the favorable influence of genial climates in winter, and especially on old persons.—To Dr. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. FORD ED., viii, 180. (W., 1802.)

1320. CLIMATE, Preference for warm.—I wonder that any human being should remain in a cold country who could find room in a warm one.—To Dr. HUGH WILLIAMSON. iv, 346. FORD ED., vii, 479. (W., 1801.)

1321. ———. I have often wondered that any human being should live in a cold country who can find room in a warm one.—To WILLIAM DUNBAR. iv, 347. FORD ED., vii, 482. (W., Jan. 1801.)

1322. CLIMATE, Sufferings from cold.—I have no doubt but that cold is the source of more suffering to all animal nature than hunger, thirst, sickness, and all the other pains of life and of death itself put together. I live in a temperate climate, and under circumstances which do not expose me often to cold. Yet when I recollect, on one hand, all the sufferings I have had from cold, and, on the other, all my other pains, the former preponderate greatly. What, then, must be the sum of that evil if we take in the vast proportion of men who are obliged to be out in all weather, by land and by sea; all the families of beasts, birds, reptiles, and even the vegetable kingdom! for that, too, has life, and where there is life there may be sensation.—To WILLIAM DUNBAR. iv, 347. FORD ED., vii, 482. (W., Jan. 1801.)

1323. CLIMATE, Theories concerning.—I thank you for your pamphlet on the climate of the west, and have read it with great satisfaction. Although it does not yet establish a satisfactory theory, it is an additional step towards it. Mine was perhaps the first attempt, not to form a theory, but to bring together the few facts then known, and suggest them to public attention. They were written between forty and fifty years ago, before the close of the Revolutionary war, when the western country was a wilderness, untrudged but by the foot of the savage or the hunter. It is now flourishing in population and science, and after a few years more of observation and collection of facts, they will doubtless furnish a theory of solid foundation. Years are requisite for this, steady attention to the thermometer, to the plants growing there, the times of their leafing and flowering, its animal inhabitants, beasts, birds, reptiles, and insects; its prevalent winds, quantities or rain and snow, temperature of fountains, and other indexes of etc. We want this indeed for all the States, and the work should be repeated once or twice in a century, to show the effect of clearing and culture towards changes of climate. My Notes give a very imperfect idea of what our climate was, half a century ago, at this place [Monticello], which being nearly central to the State may be taken for its medium. Latterly, after seven years of close and exact observation, I have prepared an estimate of what it is now, which may some day be added to the former work; and I hope something like this is doing in the other States, which, when all shall be brought together, may produce theories meriting confidence.—To LEWIS M. BECK. vii, 375. (1824.)

1324. CLIMATE OF VIRGINIA.—A change in our [Virginia] climate is taking place very sensibly. Both heats and colds are becoming much more moderate within the memory even of the middle-aged. Snows are less frequent and less deep. They do not often lie, below the mountains, more than, one, two, or three days, and very rarely a week. They are remembered to have been formerly frequent, deep, and of long continuance. The elderly inform me, the earth used to be covered with snow about three months in every year. The rivers, which then seldom failed to freeze over in the course of the winter, scarcely ever do so now.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 327. FORD ED., iii, 185. (1782.)

1325. ———. The change which has taken place in our [Virginia] climate, is one of those facts which all men of years are sensible of, and yet none can prove by regular evidence; they can only appeal to each other's general observation for the fact. I remember when I was a small boy (say sixty years ago), snows were frequent and deep in every winter—to my knee very often, to my waist sometimes—and that they covered the earth long. And I remember while yet young, to have heard from very old men, that in their youth, the winters had been still colder, with deeper and longer snows. In the year 1772, we had a snow two feet deep in the champaign parts of Virginia, and three feet in the counties next below the mountains. That year is still marked in conversation by the designation of "the year of the deep snow." But I know of no regular diaries of the weather very far back. In latter times, they might perhaps be found. While I lived at Washington, I kept a diary, and by recurring to that, I observe that from the winter of 1802-3, to that of 1808-9, inclusive, the average fall of snow of the seven winters was only fourteen and a half inches, and that the ground was covered but sixteen days in each winter on an average of the whole. The maximum in any one winter, during that period, was twenty-one inches fall, and thirty-four days on the ground.—To Dr. CHAPMAN. v, 487. (M., 1809.)

1327. CLINTON (De Witt), Defends Jefferson.—Thomas Jefferson presents his compliments to Mr. Clinton, and his thanks for the pamphlet sent him.* He recollects the having read it at the time with a due sense of his obligation to the author, whose name was surmised, though not absolutely known, and a conviction that he had made the most of his matter. The ground of defence might have been solidly aided by the assurance (which is the absolute fact) that the whole story fathered on Mazzei, was an unfounded falsehood. Dr. Linn, as aware of that, takes care to quote it from a dead man, who is made to quote from one residing in the remotest part of Europe. Equally false was Dr. Linn's other story about Bishop Madison's lawn sleeves, as the Bishop can testify, for certainly Th: J. never saw him in lawn sleeves. Had the Doctor ventured to name time, place, and person, for his third lie (the government without religion), it is probable he might have been convicted on that also. But these are slander and slanderers, whom Th: J. has thought it best to leave to the scourge of public opinion.—To DE WITT CLINTON. v, 80. FORD ED., ix, 59. (W., 1807.)

1328. CLINTON (George), Election as Governor.—It seems probable that Mr. Jay had a majority of the qualified voters, and I think not only that Clinton would have honored himself by declining to accept, and agreeing to take another fair start, but that probably such a conduct would have ensured him a majority on a new election. To retain the office, when it is probable the majority was against him, is dishonorable.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vi, 94. (Pa., June 1792.)

1329. — — — It does not seem possible to defend Clinton as a just or disinterested man, if he does not decline the office [of Governor], of which there is no symptom; and I really apprehend that the cause of republicanism will suffer if its votaries be thrown into schism by embarking in support of this man, and for what? To draw over the anti-federalists who are not numerous enough to be worth drawing over.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 89. (Pa., 1792.)

1330. CLINTON (George), English war ships and.—I congratulate you on your safe arrival with Miss Clinton at New York, and especially on your escape from British violence. This aggression is of a character so distinct from that on the Chesapeake, and of so aggravated a nature, that I consider it as a very material one to be presented with that to the British government. I pray you, therefore, to write me a letter, stating the transaction, and in such form as that it may go to that government.—To VICE-PRESIDENT CLINTON. v, 115. FORD ED., ix, 100. (W., July 1807.)

1331. CLINTON (George), Estrangement from Jefferson.—I already perceive my old friend Clinton, estranging himself from me. No doubt lies are carried to him, as they will be to the two other candidates [for the Presidency], under forms which, however false, he can scarcely question. Yet, I have been equally careful as to him also, never to say a word on this subject.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 247. FORD ED., ix, 177. (W., Feb. 1808.)

1332. CLINTON (George), Mental decay.—It is wonderful to me that old men should not be sensible that their minds keep pace with their bodies in the progress of decay. Our old revolutionary friend Clinton, for example, who was a hero, but never a man of mind, is wonderfully jealous on this head. He tells eternally the stories of his younger days to prove his memory, as if memory and reason were the same faculty. Nothing betrays imbecility so much as the being insensible of it.—To BENJAMIN RUSH. vi, 3. FORD ED., ix, 328. (P.F., 1811.)

— COAST DEFENCE.—See DEFENCE.

1333. COAST LINE, Jurisdiction and.—Governments and juriconsults have been much divided in opinion as to the distance from their sea coasts to which they might reasonably claim a right of prohibiting the commitment of hostilities. The greatest distance, to which any respectable assent among nations has been at any time given, has been the extent of the human sight, estimated at upwards of twenty miles; and the smallest distance, I believe, claimed by any nation whatever, is the utmost range of a cannon ball, usually stated at one sea league. Some intermediate distances have also been insisted on, and that of three sea-leagues has some authority in its favor. The character of our coast, remarkable in considerable parts of it for admitting no vessels of size to pass the shores, would entitle us in reason to as broad a margin of protected navigation as any nation whatever. Not proposing, however, at this time, and without a respectful and friendly communication with the powers interested in this navigation, to fix on the distance to which we may ultimately insist on the right of protection, the President gives instructions to the officers acting under his authority, to consider those heretofore given them as restrained, for the present, to the distance of one sea-league, or three geographical miles, from the sea shore. This distance can admit of no opposition, as it is recognized by treaties between some of the powers with whom we are connected in commerce and navigation, and is as little or less than is claimed by any one of them on their own coasts.*—To E. C. GENET. iv, 75. FORD ED., vi, 440. (G., Nov. 1793.)

1334. — — — I think myself that the limits of our [marine] protection are of great consequence, and would not hesitate the sacrifice of money to obtain them large. I would say, for instance, to Great Britain, "we will pay you for such of these vessels [taken by France] as you choose; only requiring in return that the distance of their capture from shore shall, as between us, be ever considered as within our limits; now say for yourself, which of these vessels you will accept payment for". With France it might not be so easy to purchase distance by pecuniary sacrifices; but if by giving up all further reclamation of the vessels in their hands, they could be led to fix the same limits (say three leagues) I should think it an advantageous purchase.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 434. (M., Oct. 1793.)

* Jefferson wrote to the same effect to Mr. Hammond, the British Minister.—EDITOR.

1335. COAST LINE, Limits of.—The rule of the common law is that wherever you can see from land to land, all the water within the line of sight is in the body of the adjacent country, and within common law jurisdiction. Thus, if in this curvature you can see from a to b, all the water within the line of sight is within common law jurisdiction, and a murder committed at c is to be tried as at common law. Our coast is generally visible, I believe, by the time you get within about twenty-five miles. I suppose that at New York you must be some miles out of the Hook before the opposite shores recede twenty-five miles from each other. The three miles of marine jurisdiction is always to be counted from this line of sight.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 559. FORD ED., viii, 319. (M., 1804.)

1336. COAST LINE, Rivers, Bays and.—For the jurisdiction of the rivers and bays of the United States, the laws of the several States * * * have made provision, and they are, moreover, as being land-locked, within the body of the United States.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iv, 76. FORD ED., vi, 442. (G., 1793.)

1337. COCKADES, Politics and.—Some of the young men, who addressed the President [John Adams] on Monday, mounted the black (or English) cockade. The next day, numbers of the people appeared with the tricolored (or French) cockade. Yesterday being the fast day, the black cockade again appeared, on which the tricolor also showed itself. A fray ensued, the light horse were called in, and the city [Philadelphia] was so filled with confusion, from about 6 to 10 o'clock last night, that it was dangerous going out.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 251. (Pa., May 10, 1798.)

1339. COERCION OF A STATE, The Confederation and.—It has been often said that the decisions of Congress are impotent because the Confederation provides no compulsory power. But when two or more nations enter into compact, it is not usual for them to say what shall be done to the party who infringes it. Decency forbids this, and it is as unnecessary as indecent, because the right of compulsion naturally results to the party injured by the breach. When any one State in the American Union refuses obedience to the Confederation by which they have bound themselves, the rest have a natural right to compel them to obedience. Congress would probably exercise long patience before they would recur to force; but if the case ultimately required it, they would use that recurrence. Should this case ever arise, they will probably coerce by a naval force, as being more easy, less dangerous to liberty, and less likely to produce much bloodshed.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 291. FORD ED., iv, 147. (P., 1786.)

1340. COERCION OF A STATE, Law of Nature and.—The coercive powers supposed to be wanting in the federal head, I am of opinion they possess by the law of nature, which authorizes one party to an agreement to compel the other to performance. A delinquent State makes itself a party against the rest of the confederacy.—To EDWARD RANDOLPH. ii, 211. (P., 1787.)

1341. — — — It has been so often said, as to be generally believed, that Congress have no power by the Confederation to enforce anything, for example, contributions of money. It was not necessary to give them that power expressly, for they have it by the law of nature. When two parties make a compact, there results to each a power of compelling the other to execute it.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 217. FORD ED., iv, 424. (P., Aug. 1787.)

1342. COERCION OF A STATE, Methods of.—Peaceable means should be contrived for the Federal head to enforce compliance on the part of the States.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 267. FORD ED., iv, 445. (P., Sept. 1787.)

1343. COERCION OF A STATE, A navy and.—Compulsion was never so easy as in our case, where a single frigate would soon levy on the commerce of any State the deficiency of its contributions; nor more safe than in the hands of Congress which has always shown that it would wait, as it ought to do, to the last extremities before it would execute any of its powers which are disagreeable.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 218. FORD ED., iv, 424. (P., August 1787.)

1344. COERCION OF A STATE, Necessity of.—There never will be money in the treasury till the confederacy shows its teeth. The States must see the rod; perhaps it must be felt by some of them. I am persuaded all of them would rejoice to see every one obliged to furnish its contributions. It is not the difficulty of furnishing them, which beggars the treasury, but the fear that others will not furnish as much. Every rational citizen must wish to see an effective instrument of coercion, and should fear to see it on any other element than the water. A naval force can never endanger our liberties, nor occasion bloodshed: a land force would do both.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 606. FORD ED., iv, 265. (P., 1786.)

1346. COLES (Edward), Jefferson's secretary.—Mr. Coles, the bearer of public despatches, by an aviso, has lived with me as Secretary, is my wealthy neighbor at Monticello, and worthy of all confidence. His intimate knowledge of our situation has induced us to send him, because he will be a full supplement as to all those things which cannot be detailed in writing.—To JOHN ARMSTRONG. v, 433. (W., March 1809.)

1347. ——. To give you a true description of the state of things here, I must refer you to Mr. Coles, the bearer of this [letter], my Secretary, a most worthy, intelligent and well-informed young man, whom I recommend to your notice. * * * His discretion and fidelity may be relied on.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 432. — COLLEGES Arrangement, of buildings for.—See ACADEMIES.

1348. COLONIES (The American), Beginning of the.—America was conquered, and her settlements made, and firmly established, at the expense of individuals, and not of the British public. Their own blood was spilt in acquiring lands for their settlement, their own fortunes expended in making that settlement effectual; for themselves they fought, for themselves they conquered, and for themselves alone they have right to hold. No shilling was ever issued from the public treasuries of his Majesty, or his ancestors, for their assistance, till of very late times, after the colonies had become established on a firm and permanent footing.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 126. FORD ED., i, 430. (1774.) See RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA, APPENDIX.

1349. COLONIES (The American), The Crown and.—Our forefathers, inhabitants of the island of Great Britain, left their native land to seek on these shores a residence for civil and religious freedom. At the expense of their blood, to the ruin of their fortunes, with the relinquishment of everything quiet and comfortable in life, they effected settlements in the inhospitable wilds of America; and there established civil societies with various forms of constitution. To continue their connection with the friends whom they had left, they arranged themselves by charters of compact under the same common King, who thus completed their powers of full and perfect legislation and became the link of union between the several parts of the empire.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 464. (July 1775.)

1350. ——. That settlement having been thus effected in the wilds of America, the emigrants thought proper to adopt that system of laws under which they had hitherto lived in the mother country, and to continue their union with her, by submitting themselves to the same common sovereign, who was thereby made the central link, connecting the several parts of the empire thus newly multiplied.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 126. 1351. COLONIES (The American), Harassed by the Stuarts.—But not long were the Colonies permitted, however far they thought themselves removed from the hand of oppression, to hold undisturbed the rights acquired at the hazard of their lives and loss of their fortunes. A family of princes was then on the British throne, whose treasonable crimes against their people brought on them, afterwards, the exertion of those sacred and sovereign rights of punishment, reserved in the hands of the people for cases of extreme necessity, and judged by the constitution unsafe to be delegated to any other judicature. While every day brought forth some new and unjustifiable exertion of power over their subjects on that side of the water, it was not to be expected that those here, much less able at the time to oppose the designs of despotism, should be exempted from injury. Accordingly, this country which had been acquired by the lives, the labors, and fortunes of individual adventurers, was by these Princes, several times, parted* out and distributed among the favorites and followers of their fortunes; and, by an assumed right of the Crown alone, was erected into distinct and independent governments; a measure which, it is believed, his Majesty's prudence and understanding would prevent him from imitating at this day; as no exercise of such power of dividing and dismembering a country has ever occurred in his Majesty's realm of England, though now of very ancient standing; nor could it be justified or acquiesced under there, or in any other part of his Majesty's empire.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 127. FORD ED., i, 431. (1774.)

1352. COLONIES (The American), Parliamentary encroachments.—In 1650, the parliament, considering itself as standing in the place of their deposed king, and as having succeeded to all his powers, without as well as within the realm, began to assume a right over the Colonies, passing an act for inhibiting their trade with foreign nations. This succession to the exercise of kingly authority gave the first color for parliamentary interference with the Colonies, and produced that fatal precedent which they continued to follow, after they had retired, in other respects, within their proper functions.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 355. FORD ED., iii, 217. (1782.)

1353. ——. What powers the Parliament might rightfully exercise over us, and whether any, had never been declared either by them or us. They had very early taken the gigantic step of passing the Navigation Act. The Colonies remonstrated violently against it, and one of them, Virginia, when she capitulated to the Commonwealth of England, expressly stipulated for a free

* In 1621, Nova Scotia was granted by James I. to Sir William Alexander. In 1632, Maryland was granted by Charles I. to Lord Baltimore. In 1664, New York was granted by Charles II. to the Duke of York; as also New Jersey, which the Duke of York conveyed again to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret. So also were the Delaware counties, which the same Duke conveyed to Wm. Penn. In 1665, the country including North and South Carolina, Georgia and the Floridas was granted by Charles II. to the Earl of Clarendon, Duke of Albemarle, Earl of Craven, Lord Berkeley, Lord Ashlev, Sir George Carteret, Sir John Coletton, and Sir Wm. Berkeley. In 1681, Pennsylvania was granted by Charles II. to Wm. Penn.—NOTE BY JEFFERSON.

trade. This capitulation, however, was as little regarded as the original right, restored by it, had been. The Navigation Act was reenacted by Charles II., and was enforced. And we had been so long in the habit of seeing them consider us merely as objects for the extension of their commerce, and of submitting to every duty or regulation imposed with that view, that we had ceased to complain of them.—NOTES ON M. SOULÉS'S BOOK. ix, 294. FORD ED., iv, 302. (P., 1786.)

1354. COLONIES (The American), Political relations of.—The settlement of the Colonies was not made by public authority, or at the public expense of England; but by the exertions, and at the expense of individuals. Hence it happened that their constitutions were not formed systematically, but according to the circumstances which happened to exist in each. Hence, too, the principles of the political connection between the old and new countries were never settled. That it would have been advantageous to have settled them, is certain; and, particularly to have provided a body which should decide, in the last resort, all cases wherein both parties were interested. But it is not certain that that right would have been given, or ought to have been given to the Parliament; much less, that it resulted to the Parliament, without having been given to it expressly. Why was it necessary that there should have been a body to decide in the last resort? Because it would have been for the good of both parties. But this reason shows it ought not to have been the Parliament, because that would have exercised it for the good of one party only.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 255. FORD ED., iv, 160. (P., 1786.)

1355. COLONIES (The American), Reconciliation of.—There was * * * a plan of accommodation offered in Parliament, which, though not entirely equal to the terms we had a right to ask, yet differed but in few points from what the General Congress had held out. Had Parliament been disposed sincerely, as we are, to bring about a reconciliation, reasonable men had hoped, that by meeting us on this ground something might have been done. Lord Chatham's Bill, on the one part, and the terms of Congress on the other, would have formed a basis for negotiations, which a spirit of accommodation on both sides might, perhaps, have reconciled. It came recommended, too, from one whose successful experience in the art of government should have insured it some attention from those to whom it was intended. He had shown to the world, that Great Britain with her Colonies united firmly under a just and honest Government formed a power which might bid defiance to the most potent enemies. With a change of Ministers, however, a total change of measures took place. The component parts of the Empire have from that moment been falling asunder, and a total annihilation of its weight in the political scale of the world seems justly to be apprehended.—ADDRESS OF VA. HOUSE OF BURGESSSES TO LORD DUNMORE. FORD ED., i, 458. (1775.)

1357. — — — With what patience could Britain have received articles of treaty from any power on earth, when borne on the point of the bayonet by military plenipotentiaries?—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 479. (July 1775.)

1358. — — — If * * * Great Britain, disjoined from her Colonies, be a match for the most potent nations of Europe, with the Colonies thrown into their scale, they may go on securely. But if they are not assured of this, it would be certainly unwise, by trying the event of another campaign, to risk our accepting a foreign aid, which, perhaps, may not be obtainable, but on condition of everlasting avulsion from Great Britain. This would be thought a hard condition to those who still wish for reunion with their parent country. I am sincerely one of those, and would rather be in dependence on Great Britain, properly limited, than on any nation on earth, or than on no nation. But I am one of those, too, who, rather than submit to the rights of legislating for us, assumed by the British Parliament, and which late experience has shown they will so cruelly exercise, would lend my hand to sink the whole Island in the ocean.—To JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 201. FORD ED., i, 484. (M., August 1775.)

1359. COLONIES (The American), Resistance to Unjust Taxation.—When Parliament proposed to consider us as objects of taxation, all the States took the alarm. Yet so little had we attended to this subject, that our advocates did not know at first on what ground to take their stand. Mr. Dickinson, a lawyer of more ingenuity than sound judgment, and still more timid than ingenious, not daring to question the authority to regulate commerce so as best to answer their own purpose, to which we had long submitted, admitted that authority in its utmost extent. He acknowledged * * * that they could levy duties, internal or external, payable in Great Britain or in the States. He only required that these duties should be bonâ fide for the regulation of commerce, and not to raise a solid revenue. He admitted, therefore, that they might control our commerce, but not tax us. This mysterious system took for a moment in America as well as in Europe. But sounder heads saw in the first moment that he who could put down the loom, could stop the spinning wheel, and he who could stop the spinning wheel could tie the hands which turned it. They saw that this flimsy fabric could not be supported. Who were to be the judges whether duties were imposed with a view to burden and suppress a branch of manufacture or to raise a revenue? If either party, exclusively of the other, it was plain where that would end. If both parties, it was plain where that would end also. They saw, therefore, no sure clew to lead them out of their difficulties but reason and right. They dared to follow them, assured that they alone could find them to defensible ground. The first elements of our reason showed that the members of Parliament could have no power which the people of the several counties had not; that these had naturally a power over their own farms, and collectively over all England. But if they had any power over counties out of England, it must be founded on compact or force. No compact could be shown, and neither party chose to bottom their pretensions on force. It was objected that this annihilated the Navigation Act. True, it does. The Navigation Act, therefore, becomes a proper subject of treaty between the two nations. Or, if Great Britain does not choose to have its basis questioned, let us go on as we have done. Let no new shackles be imposed, and we will continue to submit to the old. We will consider the restrictions on our commerce now actually existing as compensations yielded by us for the protection and privileges we actually enjoy, only trusting that if Great Britain on a revisal of these restrictions, is sensible that some of them are useless to her and oppressive to us, she will repeal them. But on this she shall be free. Place us in the condition we were when the King came to the throne, let us rest so, and we will be satisfied. This was the ground on which all the States very soon found themselves rallied, and that there was no other which could be defended.—NOTES ON M. SOULÉS'S BOOK. ix, 295. FORD ED., iv, 302. (P., 1786.) See TAXATION.

— COLONIES (The American), Restrictions on trade of.—See TRADE.

1360. COLONIES (The American), Separation from England.—It is neither our wish nor our interest to separate from Great Britain. We are willing, on our part, to sacrifice everything which reason can ask to the restoration of that tranquillity for which all must wish. On their part, let them be ready to establish union on a generous plan. Let them name their terms, but let them be just. Accept of every commercial privilege which it is in our power to give, for such things as we can raise for their use, or they make for ours. But let them not think to exclude us from going to other markets to dispose of those commodities which they cannot use, or to supply those wants which they cannot supply. Still less, let it be proposed, that our properties within our own territories shall be taxed or regulated by any power on earth but our own. The God who gave us life, gave us liberty at the same time: the hand of force may destroy, but cannot disjoin them. This, Sir, is our last, our determined resolution. And that you will be pleased to interpose with that efficacy which your earnest endeavors may insure to procure redress of these our great grievances, to quiet the minds of your subjects in British America against any apprehensions of future encroachment, to establish fraternal love and harmony and love through the whole empire, and that that may continue to the latest ages of time, is the fervent prayer of all British America.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

1362. COLONIES (The American), Toryism of George III. and.—The tory education of the King was the first preparation for that change in the British government which that party never ceases to wish. This naturally ensured tory administration during his life. At the moment he came to the throne and cleared his hands of his enemies by the peace of Paris, the assumptions of unwarrantable right over America commenced. They were so signal, and followed one another so close, as to prove they were part of a system, either to reduce it under absolute subjection, and thereby make it an instrument for attempts on Great Britain itself, or to sever it from Britain, so that it might not be a weight in the Whig scale. This latter alternative, however, was not considered as the one which would take place. They knew so little of America, that they thought it unable to encounter the little finger of Great Britain.—NOTES ON M. SOULÉS'S WORK. ix, 299. FORD ED., iv, 307. (P., 1786.) See GEORGE III.

— COLONIES (The American), Tyranny of George III. and.—See TYRANNY.

1363. COLONIES (The American), Union of.—We cannot, my Lord, close with the terms of that Resolution [Lord North's Conciliatory Proposition] because * * * [it] involves the interests of all the other Colonies. We are now represented in General Congress by members approved by this House, where the former union, it is hoped, will be so strongly cemented, that no partial applications can produce the slightest departure from the common cause. We consider ourselves as bound in honor, as well as interest, to share one general fate with our sister Colonies; and should hold ourselves base deserters of that union to which we have acceded, were we to agree on any measures distinct and apart from them.—ADDRESS TO LORD DUNMORE FROM VA. HOUSE OF BURGESSES. FORD ED., i, 457. (1775.)

1364. — — — [Lord North's] proposition * * * is unreasonable and insidious: unreasonable because if we declare we accede to it, we declare, without reservation, we will purchase the favor of Parliament, not knowing at the same time at what price they will please to estimate their favor; it is insidious because any individual Colonies, having bid and bidden again till they find the avidity of the seller too great for all their powers, are then to return into opposition, divided from their sister Colonies, whom the minister will have previously detached by a grant of easier terms, or by an artful procrastination of a definitive answer.—REPLY OF CONGRESS TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 478. (July 1775.)

1365. — — — We will ever be ready to join with our fellow-subjects in every part of the British empire, in executing all those rightful powers which God has given us, for the reestablishment and guaranteeing * * * their constitutional rights, when, where, and by whomsoever invaded.*—RESOLUTION OF ALBEMARLE COUNTY. FORD ED., i, 419. (July 26, 1774.) See COMMITTEES OF CORRESPONDENCE.

— COLONIES (The American), Violations of Charters.—See CHARTERS.

1366. COLONIES, Ancient and Modern.—Ancient nations considered colonies principally as receptacles for a too numerous population, and as natural and useful allies in time of war; but modern nations, viewing commerce as an object of first importance, value colonies chiefly as instruments for the increase of that. This is principally effected by their taking commodities from the mother State, whether raised within herself, or obtained elsewhere in the course of her trade, and furnishing in return colonial productions necessary for her consumption or for her commerce of exchange with other nations. In this way the colonies of Spain, Portugal, France and England, have been chiefly subservient to the advantages of their mother country. In this way, too, in a smaller degree has Denmark derived utility from her American colonies, and so; also, has Holland, except as to the island of St. Eustatius.—TO BARON STAHE. FORD ED., iv, 238. (P., 1786.)

1367. COLONIES, European nations and their.—The habitual violation of the equal rights of the colonist by the dominant (for I will not call them the mother) countries of Europe, the invariable sacrifice of their highest interests to the minor advantages of any individual trade or calling at home, are as immoral in principle as the continuance of them is unwise in practice, after the lessons they have received.—TO CLEMENT CAINE. vi, 13. FORD ED., ix, 329. (M., 1811.)

1368. COLONIZATION (Negro), Africa and.—In the disposition of these unfortunate people, there are two rational objects to be distinctly kept in view. First. The establishment of a colony on the coast of Africa, which may introduce among the aborigines the arts of cultivated life and the blessings of civilization and science. By doing this, we may make to them some retribution for the long course of injuries we have been committing on their population. And considering that these blessings will descend to the "nati natorum et qui nascentur ab illis", we shall in the long run have rendered them perhaps more good than evil. To fulfil this object, the colony of Sierra Leone promises well, and that of Mesurado adds to our prospect of success. Under this view the Colonization Society is to be considered as a missionary society, having in view, however, objects more humane, more justifiable, and less aggressive on the peace of other nations than the others of that appellation. The second object, and the most interesting to us, as coming home to our physical and moral characters, to our happiness and safety, is to provide an asylum to which we can, by degrees, send the whole of that population from among us, and establish them under our patronage and protection, as a separate, free and independent people, in some country and climate friendly to human life and happiness. That any place on the coast of Africa should answer the latter purpose, I have ever deemed entirely impossible. And without repeating the other arguments which have been urged by others, I will appeal to figures only, which admit no controversy.*—TO JARED SPARKS. vii, 332. FORD ED., x, 290. (M., 1824.)

1369. COLONIZATION (Negro), Emancipation and.—There is, I think, a way in which [the removal of the slaves to another country] can be done; that is by emancipating the after-born, leaving them, on due compensation, with their mothers, until their services are worth their maintenance. and then putting them to industrious occupations until a proper age for deportation. This was the result of my reflections on the subject five and forty years ago, and I have never yet been able to conceive any other practicable plan. It was sketched in the "Notes on Virginia". The estimated value of the new-born infant is so low (say twelve dollars and fifty cents) that it would probably be yielded by the owner gratis, and would thus reduce the six hundred millions of dollars, the first head of expense, to thirty-seven millions and a half; leaving only the expenses of nourishment while with the mother, and of transportation.—TO JARED SPARKS. vii, 333. FORD ED., x, 291. (M., 1824.)

1370. COLONIZATION (Negro), Expenses of.—From what fund are these expenses to be furnished? Why not from that of the lands which have been ceded by the very States now needing this relief? And ceded on no consideration, for the most part. but that of the general good of the whole. These cessions already constitute one-fourth of the States of the Union. It may be said that these lands have been sold; are now the property of the citizens composing those States; and the money long ago received and expended. But an equivalent of lands in the territories since acquired may be appropriated to that object, or so much, at least, as may be sufficient; and the object, although more important to the slave States, is highly so to the others also, if they were serious in their arguments on the Missouri question. The slave States, too, if more interested, would also contribute more by their gratuitous liberation, thus taking on themselves alone the first and heaviest item of expense.—To JARED SPARKS. vii. 334. FORD ED., x, 251. (M., 1824.)

* Jefferson then made a calculation showing that it would require six hundred millions of dollars to purchase the slaves, while the cost of transportation, provisions, support in the settlement, &c., would take three hundred millions additional,—an amount which made it "impossible to look at the question a second time".—EDITOR.

* Jefferson's own country.—EDITOR.

1371. COLONIZATION (Negro), San Domingo and.—In the plan sketched in the "Notes on Virginia", no particular place of asylum was specified; because it was thought possible that in the revolutionary state of America, then commenced, events might open to us some one within practicable distance. This has now happened. Santo Domingo has become independent, and with a population of that color only; and if the public papers are to be credited, their Chief offers to pay their passage, to receive them as free citizens, and to provide them employment. This leaves, then, for the general confederacy, no expense but that of nurture with the mother for a few years, and would call, of course, for a very moderate appropriation of the vacant lands. * * * In this way no violation of private right is proposed.—To JARED SPARKS. vii. 334. FORD ED., x, 292. (M., 1824.) See COLONY, SLAVES.

1372. COLONY (Penal), Establishment of.—Questions would arise whether the establishment of a [negro penal] colony* within our limits, and to become a part of our Union, would be desirable to the State of Virginia itself, or to other States—especially those who would be in its vicinity. Could we procure lands beyond the limits of the United States to form a receptacle for these people? On our northern boundary, the country not occupied by British subjects, is the property of Indian nations, whose title would have to be extinguished, with the consent of Great Britain; and the new settlers would be British subjects. It is hardly to be believed that either Great Britain or the Indian proprietors have so disinterested a regard for us, as to be willing to relieve us, by receiving such a colony themselves. * * * On our western and southern frontiers, Spain holds an immense country, the occupancy of which, however, is in the Indian natives, except a few insulated spots possessed by Spanish subjects. It is very questionable, indeed, whether the Indians would sell? whether Spain would be willing to receive these people? and nearly certain that she would not alienate the sovereignty. The same question to ourselves would recur here also, as did in the first case: should we be willing to have such a colony in contact with us? However our present interests may restrain us within our own limits, it is impossible not to look forward to distant times, when our rapid multiplication will expand itself beyond those limits, and cover the whole northern, if not the southern continent, with a people speaking the same language, governed in similar forms, and by similar laws; nor can we contemplate with satisfaction either blot or mixture on that surface. Spain, France, and Portugal hold possessions on the southern continent, as to which I am not well enough informed to say how far they might meet our views. But either there or in the northern continent, should the constituted authorities of Virginia fix their attention, of preference, I will have the dispositions of those powers sounded in the first instance.—To JAMES MONROE. iv. 420. FORD ED., viii, 104. (W., 1801.)

* James Monroe, then Governor of Virginia, wrote to Jefferson asking his good offices towards the establishment of a penal colony in America. A short time before, there had been a negro insurrection in Virginia and the House of Representatives of the State had passed a resolution on the subject.—EDITOR.

1373. COLONY (Penal), Sierra Leone and.—The course of things in the * * * West Indies appears to have given a considerable impulse to the minds of the slaves in * * * the United States. A great disposition to insurgency has manifested itself among them, which, in one instance, in the State of Virginia, broke out into actual insurrection. This was easily suppressed; but many of those concerned (between twenty and thirty, I believe) fell victims to the law. So extensive an execution could not but excite sensibility in the public mind, and beget a regret that the laws had not provided for such cases, some alternative, combining more mildness with equal efficacy. The Legislature of the State * * * took the subject into consideration, and have communicated to me through the Governor of the State, their wish that some place could be provided, out of the limits of the United States, to which slaves guilty of insurgency might be transported; and they have particularly looked to Africa as offering the most desirable receptacle. We might, for this purpose, enter into negotiations with the natives, on some part of the coast, to obtain a settlement; and, by establishing an African company, combine with it commercial operations, which might not only reimburse expenses, but procure profit also. But there being already such an establishment on that coast by the English Sierra Leone Company, made for the express purpose of colonizing civilized blacks to that country, it would seem better, by incorporating our emigrants with theirs, to make one strong, rather than two weak colonies. This would be the more desirable because the blacks settled at Sierra Leone, having chiefly gone from the States, would often receive among those whom we should send, their acquaintances and relatives. The object of this letter is to ask * * * you to enter into conference with such persons, private and public, as would be necessary to give us permission to send thither the persons under contemplation. * * * They are not felons, or common malefactors, but persons guilty of what the safety of society, under actual circumstances, obliges us to treat as a crime, but which their feelings may represent in a far different shape. They will be a valuable acquisition to the settlement, * * * and well calculated to cooperate in the plan of civilization.—To RUFUS KING. iv, 442. FORD ED., viii, 161. (W., 1802.)

1374. — — — The consequences of permitting emancipations to become extensive, unless a condition of emigration be annexed to them, furnish matter of solicitude to the Legislature of Virginia. Although provision for the settlement of emancipated negroes might perhaps be obtained nearer home than Africa, yet it is desirable that we should be free to expatriate this description of people also to the colony of Sierra Leone, if considerations respecting either themselves or us should render it more expedient. I pray you, therefore, to get the same permission extended to the reception of these as well as the [insurgents]. Nor will there be a selection of bad subjects; the emancipations, for the most part, being either of the whole slaves of the master, or of such individuals as have particularly deserved well. The latter are most frequent.—To RUFUS KING. iv, 443. FORD ED., viii, 163. (W., 1802.)

1375. COLONY (Penal), Transportation to.—As the expense of so distant a transportation would be very heavy, and might weigh unfavorably in deciding between the modes of punishment, it is very desirable that it should be lessened as much as is practicable. If the regulations of the place would permit these emigrants to dispose of themselves, as the Germans and others do who come to this country poor, by giving their labor for a certain time to some one who will pay their passage; and if the master of the vessel could be permitted to carry articles of commerce from this country and take back others from that, which might yield him a mercantile profit sufficient to cover the expenses of the voyage, a serious difficulty would be removed.—To RUFUS KING. iv, 443. FORD ED., viii, 162. (W., 1802.)

1376. COLONY (Penal), West Indies and.—The West Indies offer a more probable and practicable retreat for them. Inhabited already by a people of their own race and color; climates congenial with their natural constitution; insulated from the other descriptions of men; nature seems to have formed these islands to become the receptacle of the blacks transplanted into this hemisphere. Whether we could obtain from the European sovereigns of those islands leave to send thither the persons under consideration, I cannot say; but I think it more probable than the former propositions, because of their being already inhabited more or less by the same race. The most promising portion of them is the island of St. Domingo, where the blacks are established into a sovereignty de facto, and have organized themselves under regular laws and government. I should conjecture that their present ruler might be willing * * * to receive over that description which would be exiled for acts deemed criminal by us, but meritorious, perhaps, by him. The possibility that these exiles might stimulate and conduct vindictive or predatory descents on our coasts, and facilitate concert with their brethren remaining here, looks to a state of things between that island and us not probable on a contemplation of our relative strength. * * * Africa would offer a last and undoubted resort, if all others more desirable should fail us. Whenever the Legislature of Virginia shall have brought its mind to a point, so that I may know exactly what to propose to foreign authorities, I will execute their wishes with fidelity and zeal.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 421. FORD ED., viii, 105. (W., 1801.)

1377. COLUMBUS, Portrait of.—While I resided at Paris, knowing that the portraits of Columbus and Americus Vesputius were in the gallery of Medici at Florence, I took measures for engaging a good artist to take and send me copies of them. I considered it as even of some public concern that our country should not be without the portraits of its first discoverers.—To MR. DELAFLAINE. vi, 343. (M., 1814.)

1378. COMMERCE, Agriculture and.—The exercise, by our own citizens, of so much commerce as may suffice to exchange our superfluities for our wants, may be advantageous for the whole. But it does not follow, that with a territory so boundless, it is the interest of the whole to become a mere city of London, to carry on the business of one half the world at the expense of eternal war with the other half. The agricultural capacities of our country constitute its distinguishing feature; and the adapting our policy and pursuits to that, is more likely to make us a numerous and happy people, than the mimicry of an Amsterdam, a Hamburg, or a city of London.—To WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. vii, 6. FORD ED., x, 34. (M., 1816.)

1379. — — — I am sensible of the great interest which Rhode Island justly feels in the prosperity of commerce. It is of vital interest also to States more agricultural, whose produce, without commerce, could not be exchanged.—To THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY. iv, 398. (W., May 1801.)

1380. COMMERCE, Agriculture, manufactures and.—I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends on a due balance between agriculture, manufactures and commerce.—To THOMAS LEIPER. v, 417. FORD ED., ix, 239. (W., 1809.) See MANUFACTURES.

1381. COMMERCE, But no alliance.—Commerce with all nations, alliance with none, should be our motto.—To T. LOMAX. iv, 301. FORD ED., vii, 374. (M., March 1799.)

1382. COMMERCE, Cherish.—As the handmaid of agriculture, commerce will be cherished by me both from principle and duty.—To THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY. iv, 398. (W., May 1801.)

1383. — —. Unconscious of partiality between the different callings of my fellow citizens. I trust that a fair review of my attention to the interests of commerce in particular, in every station of my political life, will afford sufficient proofs of my just estimation of its importance in the social system. What has produced our present difficulties, and what will have produced the impending war, if that is to be our lot? Our efforts to save the rights of commerce and navigation. From these, solely and exclusively, the whole of our present dangers flow.—R. to A. LEESBURG CITIZENS. viii, 161. (1809.)

1384. — —. One imputation in particular has been remarked till it seems as if some at least believe it: that I am an enemy to commerce. They admit me as a friend to agriculture, and suppose me an enemy to the only means of disposing of its produce.—To MAJOR WILLIAM JACKSON. iv, 358. (M., Feb. 1801.)

1385. COMMERCE, Coercion of Europe by.—War is not the best engine for us to resort to; nature has given us one in our commerce, which, if properly managed, will be a better instrument for obliging the interested nations of Europe to treat us with justice. If the commercial regulations had been adopted which our Legislature were at one time proposing, we should at this moment have been standing on such an eminence of safety and respect as ages can never recover. But having wandered from that, our object should now be to get back, with as little loss as possible, and when peace shall be restored to the world, endeavor so to form our commercial regulations as that justice from other nations shall be their mechanical result.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 177. — COMMERCE, The Confederation and.—See CONFEDERATION.

1386. COMMERCE, Control by Congress.—A general disposition is taking place to commit the whole management of our commerce to Congress.* This has been much promoted by the interested policy of England which, it was apparent, could not be counter-worked by the States separately.—To W. CARMICHAEL. i, 393. (P., 1785.)

1387. — —. I am much pleased with the proposition to the States to invest Congress with the regulation of their trade, reserving its revenue to the States. I think it a happy idea, removing the only objection which could have been justly made to the proposition. The time, too, is the present, before the admission of the Western States.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 347. FORD ED., iv, 52. (P., 1785.)

* The Congress of the Confederation. This movement finally resulted in the adoption of the Federal Constitution.—EDITOR.

1388. — —. The late proceedings in America have produced a wonderful sensation in England in our favor. I mean the disposition which seems to be becoming general, to invest Congress with the regulation of our commerce, and, in the meantime, the measures taken to defeat the avidity of the British government grasping at our carrying business. I can add with truth, that it was not till these symptoms appeared in America that I have been able to discover the smallest token of respect towards the United States in any part of Europe.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 413. (P., Sep. 1785.)

1389. — —. Congress have desired to be invested with the whole regulation of their trade, and forever; and to prevent all temptations to abuse the power, and all fears of it, they propose that whatever moneys shall be levied on commerce, either for the purpose of revenue, or by way of forfeitures or penalty, shall go directly into the coffers of the State wherein it is levied, without being touched by Congress. From the present temper of the States, and the conviction which your country [England] has carried home to their minds, that there is no other method of defeating the greedy attempts of other countries to trade with them on equal terms, I think they will add an article for this purpose to their Confederation.—To DAVID HARTLEY. i, 425. FORD ED., iv, 94. (P., 1785.)

1390. — —. The British * * * attempt without disguise to possess themselves of the carriage of our produce, and to prohibit our own vessels from participating of it. This has raised a general indignation in America. The States see, however, that their constitutions have provided no means of counteracting it. They are, therefore, beginning to invest Congress with the absolute power of regulating their commerce, only reserving all revenue arising from it to the State in which it is levied. This will consolidate our Federal building very much, and for this we shall be indebted to the British.—To COUNT VAN HOGENDORP. i, 465. FORD ED., iv, 104. (P., Oct. 1785.)

1391. — —. The determination of the British cabinet to make no equal treaty [of commerce] with us, confirms me in the opinion * * * that the United States must pass a navigation act against Great Britain, and load her manufactures with duties, so as to give a preference to those of other countries; and I hope our Assemblies will wait no longer, but transfer such a power to Congress, at the sessions of this fall.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 486. (P., Nov. 1785.)

1392. — —. I have heard with great pleasure that the [Virginia] Assembly have come to the resolution of giving the regulation of their commerce to the federal head. I will venture to assert, that there is not one of its opposers who, placed on this ground [Europe] would not see the wisdom of this measure. The politics of Europe render it indispensably necessary that with respect to everything external, we be one nation only, firmly hooped together. * * * If it were seen in Europe that all our States could be brought to concur in what the Virginia Assembly has done, it would produce a total revolution in their opinion of us, and respect for us.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 531. FORD ED., iv, 192. (P., February 1786.)

1393. — — — All the States have agreed to the impost. But New York has annexed such conditions that it cannot be accepted. It is thought, therefore, they will grant it unconditionally. But a new difficulty has started up. Three or four States had coupled the grant of the impost with the grant of the supplementary funds, asked by Congress at the same time, declaring that they should come into force only when all the States had granted both. One of these, Pennsylvania, refuses to let the impost come into being alone. We are still to see whether they will persist in this.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 19. (P., 1786.)

1394. COMMERCE, Cultivate.—All the world is becoming commercial. Were it practicable to keep our new empire separated from them, we might indulge ourselves in speculating whether commerce contributes to the happiness or mankind. But we cannot separate ourselves from them. Our citizens have had too full a taste of the comforts furnished by the arts and manufactures to be debarred the use of them. We must, then, in our defence endeavor to share as large a portion as we can of this modern source of wealth and power.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. FORD ED., iii, 422. (A., 1784.)

1395. — — — I am decidedly of opinion we should take no part in European quarrels, but cultivate peace and commerce with all.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 57. (P., 1788.)

1396. COMMERCE, Debt and.—No earthly consideration could induce my consent to contract such a debt as England has by her wars for commerce, to reduce our citizens by taxes to such wretchedness, as that laboring sixteen of the twenty-four hours, they are still unable to afford themselves bread, or barely to earn as much oatmeal or potatoes as will keep soul and body together. And all this to feed the avidity of a few millionary merchants, and to keep up one thousand ships of war for the protection of their commercial speculations.—To WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. vii, 7. FORD ED., x, 35. (M., 1816.)

1397. COMMERCE, Discriminating Duties.—It is true we must expect some inconvenience in practice from the establishment of discriminating duties. But in this, as in so many other cases, we are left to choose between two evils. These inconveniences are nothing when weighed against the loss of wealth and loss of force, which will follow our perseverance in the plan of indiscriminate. When once it shall be perceived that we are either in the system or in the habit of giving equal advantages to those who distinguish our commerce and navigation by duties and prohibitions, as to those who treat both with liberality and justice, liberality and justice will be converted by all into duties and prohibitions. It is not to the moderation and justice of others we are to trust for fair and equal access to market with our productions, or for our due share in the transportation of them; but to our own means of independence, and the firm will to use them. Nor do the inconveniences of discrimination merit consideration. Not one of the nations before mentioned, perhaps not a commercial nation on earth, is without them. In our case, one distinction alone will suffice: that is to say, between nations who favor our productions and navigation, and those who do not favor them. One set of moderate duties, say the present duties, for the first, and a fixed advance on these as to some articles, and prohibitions as to others, for the last.—REPORT ON FOREIGN COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION. vii, 650. 1400. — — — I hope that the policy of our country will settle down with as much navigation and commerce only as our own exchanges will require, and that the disadvantage will be seen of our undertaking to carry on that of other nations. This, indeed, may bring gain to a few individuals, and enable them to call off from our farms more laborers to be converted into lackeys and grooms for them, but it will bring nothing to our country but wars, debt, and dilapidation.—To J. 1402. — — — Our interest will be to throw open the doors of commerce, and to knock off all its shackles, giving perfect freedom to all persons for the vent of whatever they may choose to bring into our ports, and asking the same in theirs.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 412. FORD ED., iii, 279. (1782.)

1405. — —. Instead of embarrassing commerce under piles of regulating laws, duties and prohibitions, could it be relieved from all its shackles in all parts of the world, could every country be employed in producing that which nature has best fitted it to produce, and each be free to exchange with others mutual surpluses for mutual wants the greatest mass possible would then be produced of those things which contribute to human life and human happiness; the numbers of mankind would be increased, and their condition bettered. Would even a single nation begin with the United States this system of free commerce, it would be advisable to begin it with that nation; since it is one by one only that it can be extended to all. Where the circumstances of either party render it expedient to levy a revenue, by way of impost, on commerce, its freedom might be modified, in that particular, by mutual and equivalent measures, preserving it entire in all others.—REPORT ON FOREIGN COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION. vii, 646. 1420. COMMERCE, Pursuit of.—You ask what I think on the expediency of encouraging our States to be commercial? Were I to indulge my own theory, I should wish them to practice neither commerce nor navigation, but to stand, with respect to Europe, precisely on the footing of China. We should thus avoid wars, and all our citizens would be husbandmen. Whenever, indeed, our numbers should so increase as that our produce would overstock the markets of those nations who should come to seek it, the farmers must either employ the surplus of their time in manufactures, or the surplus of our hands must be employed in manufactures, or in navigation. But that day would, I think, be distant, and we should long keep our workmen in Europe, while Europe should be drawing rough materials, and even subsistence from America. But this is theory only, and a theory which the servants of America are not at liberty to follow. Our people have a decided taste for navigation and commerce. They take this from their mother country; and their servants are in duty bound to calculate all their measures on this datum: we wish to do it by throwing open all the doors of commerce, and knocking off its shackles. But as this cannot be done for others, unless they will do it for us, and there is no probability that Europe will do this, I suppose we shall be obliged to adopt a system which may shackle them in our ports, as they do us in theirs.—TO COUNT VAN HOGENDORP. i, 465. FORD ED., iv, 104. (P., 1785.)

1421. COMMERCE, Reciprocity.—Some nations, not yet ripe for free commerce in all its extent, might still be willing to mollify its restrictions and regulations for us, in proportion to the advantages which an intercourse with us might offer. Particularly they may concur with us in reciprocating the duties to be levied on each side, or in compensating any excess of duty by equivalent advantages of another nature. Our commerce is certainly of a character to entitle it to favor in most countries. The commodities we offer are either necessities of life, or materials for manufacture, or convenient subjects of revenue; and we take in exchange, either manufactures, when they have received the last finish of art and industry, or mere luxuries. Such customers may reasonably expect welcome and friendly treatment at every market. Customers, too, whose demands, increasing with their wealth and population, must very shortly give full employment to the whole industry of any nation whatever, in any line of supply they may get into the habit of calling for from it.—REPORT ON FOREIGN COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION. vii. 646. FORD ED., vi, 479. (Dec. 1793.)

1422. COMMERCE, Regulation of.—The interests of commerce require steady regulations.—TO COMTE DE MONTMORIN. ii, 531. (P., 1788.)

1423. COMMERCE, Restrictions on.—The question is, in what way may best be removed, modified or counteracted, the restrictions on the commerce and navigation of the United States? As to commerce, two methods occur. 1. By friendly arrangements with the several nations with whom these restrictions exist: Or, 2, by the separate act of our own legislatures for counter-vailing their effects. There can be no doubt but that of these two, friendly arrangement is the most eligible. * * * Friendly arrangements are preferable with all who will come into them; and we should carry into such arrangements all the liberality and spirit of accommodation which the nature of the case will admit.—REPORT ON FOREIGN COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION. vii, 645-650. FORD ED., vi, 479-483. 1426. 1428. COMMERCE, Swollen.—That the wars of the world have swollen our commerce beyond the wholesome limits of exchanging our own productions for our own wants, and that, for the emolument of a small proportion of our society, who prefer these demoralizing pursuits to labors useful to the whole, the peace of the whole is endangered, * * * are evils more easily to be deplored than remedied.—TO ABBÉ SALIMAN-KIS. v, 516. (M., 1810.)

1429. ——. You have fairly stated the alternatives between which we are to choose: 1, licentious commerce and gambling speculations for a few, with eternal war for the many; or, 2, restricted commerce, peace, and steady occupations for all. If any State in the Union will declare that it prefers separation with the first alternative, to a continuance in union without it, I have no hesitation in saying "let us separate." I would rather the States should withdraw which are for unlimited commerce and war, and confederate with those alone which are for peace and agriculture. I know that every nation in Europe would join in sincere amity with the latter, and hold the former at arm's length, by jealousies, prohibitions, restrictions, vexations and war.—To WILLIAM H. 1431. COMMERCE, War and.—The actual habits of our countrymen attach them to commerce. They will exercise it for themselves. Wars, then, must sometimes be our lot; and all the wise can do, will be to avoid that half of them which would be produced by our own follies, and our own acts of injustice; and to make for the other half the best preparations we can. Of what nature should these be? A land army would be useless for offence, and not the best nor safest instrument of defence. For either of these purposes, the sea is the field on which we should meet an European enemy. On that element it is necessary we should possess some power.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 413. 1434. COMMISSIONS, Adams's Midnight.—Among the midnight appointments of Mr. Adams were commissions to some federal justices of the peace for Alexandria. These were signed and sealed by him but not delivered. I found them on the table of the department of State, on my entrance into office, and I forbade their delivery. Marbury, named in one of them, applied to the Supreme Court for a mandamus to the Secretary of State (Mr. Madison) to deliver the commission intended for him. The Court determined at once that, being an original process, they had no cognizance of it; and, therefore, the question before them was ended. But the Chief Justice went on to lay down what the law would be, had they jurisdiction of the case, to wit: that they should command the delivery. The object was clearly to instruct any other court, having the jurisdiction, what they should do if Marbury should apply to them.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 295. FORD ED., x, 230. (M., 1823.)

1435. COMMISSIONS, Blank.—In matters of government, there can be no question but that a commission sealed and signed with a blank for the name, date, place, &c., is good; because government can in no country be carried on without it. The most vital proceedings of our own government would soon become null were such a construction to prevail, and the argumentum ab inconvenienti, which is one of the great foundations of the law, will undoubtedly sustain the practice, and sanction it by the maxim "qui facit per alium, facit per se." I would not, therefore, give the countenance of the government to so impracticable a construction by issuing a new commission.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 371. (W., 1808.)

1436. COMMISSIONS, Delivery of.—In the case of Marbury and Madison, the Federal judges declared that commissions, signed and sealed by the President, were valid, although not delivered. I deemed delivery essential to complete a deed, which, as long as it remains in the hands of the party, is yet no deed; it is in posse only, but not in esse, and I withheld delivery of the commissions.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 135. FORD ED., x, 142. (P.F., 1819.)

1437. — — — The Constitution, having given to the Judiciary branch no means of compelling the Executive either to deliver a commission, or to make a record of it, shows that it did not intend to give the Judiciary that control over the Executive, but that it should remain in the power of the latter to do it or not.—To GEORGE HAY. v, 84. FORD ED., ix, 53. (W., 1807.)

1438. COMMISSIONS, Signing of.—The delivery of a commission is immaterial. As it may be sent by letter to any one, so it may be delivered by hand to him anywhere. The place of signature by the sovereign is the material thing. Were that to be done in any other jurisdiction than his own, it might draw the validity of the act into question.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 583. FORD ED., vi, 302. (Pa., June 1793.)

1439. COMMISSIONERS, Executive.—To the list may be added the appointment of Gouverneur Morris to negotiate with the court of London, by letter written and signed by General Washington, and David Humphreys to negotiate with Liston by letter. Commissions were not given in form because no ministers had been sent here by those courts. But all the powers were given them, and half the salary (as they were not to display the diplomatic ranks, half-salary was thought sufficient) but they were completely officers on salaries, and no notice given the Senate till afterwards.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. FORD ED., viii, 131. (W., Jan. 1802.)

1440. COMMON LAW, Christianity and.—I was glad to find in your book a formal contradiction of the judiciary usurpation of legislative powers; for such the judges have usurped in their repeated decisions, that Christianity is a part of the common law. The proof of the contrary, which you have adduced, is incontrovertible; to wit, that the common law existed while the Anglo-Saxons were yet Pagans, at a time when they had never heard the name of Christ pronounced, or knew that such a character had ever existed. But it may amuse you, to show when, and by what means, they stole this law in upon us. In a case of quare impedit in the Year Book 34, H. 6, folio 38 (anno 1458.) a question was made, how far the ecclesiastical law was to be respected in a common law court? And Prisot, Chief Justice, gives his opinion in these words: "A tiel leis qu'ils de saint eglise ont en ancien scripture, covient à nous à donner credence; car ceo common ley sur quels tous manners leis sont fondés. Et auxy, Sir, nous sumus obligés de conustre lour ley de saint eglise; et semblablement its sont obligés de conustre nostre ley. Et, Sir, si poit apperer or à nous que l'evesque ad fait come un ordinary fera en tiel cas, adong nous devons cee adjuger bon, ou auterment nemy," &c. See S. C. Fitzh. Abr. Qu. imp. 89, Bro. Abr. Qu. imp. 12. Finch in his first book c. 3, is the first afterwards who quotes this case and mistakes it thus: "To such laws of the church as have warrant in holy scripture, our law giveth credence." And cites Prisot; mistranslating "ancien scripture," into "holy scripture." Whereas Prisot palpably says, "to such laws as those of holy church have in ancient writing, it is proper for us to give credence," to wit, to their ancient written laws. This was in 1613, a century and a half after the dictum of Prisot. Wingate, in 1658, erects this false translation into a maxim of the common law, copying the words of Finch, but citing Prisot, Wing. Max. 3. And Sheppard, title, "Religion," in 1675, copies the same mistranslation, quoting the Y. B. Finch and Wingate. Hale expresses it in these words: "Christianity is parcel of the laws of England." 1 Vent. 293, 3 Keb. 607. But he quotes no authority. By these echoes and re-echoings from one to another, it had become so established in 1728, that in the case of the King vs. Woolston, 2 Stra. 834, the court would not suffer it to be debated, whether to write against Christianity was punishable in the temporal court at common law? Wood, therefore, 409, ventures still to vary the phrase, and say, that all blasphemy and profaneness are offences by the common law; and cites 2 Stra. Then Blackstone, in 1763, iv. 59, repeats the words of Hale, that "Christianity is part of the laws of England," citing Ventris and Strange. And finally, Lord Mansfield, with a little qualification, in Evans' case, in 1767, says, that "the essential principles of revealed religion are part of the common law." Thus ingulphing Bible, Testament and all into the common law, without citing any authority. And thus we find this chain of authorities, hanging link by link, one upon another, and all ultimately on one and the same hook, and that a mistranslation of the words "ancien scripture," used by Prisot. Finch quotes Prisot; Wingate does the same. Sheppard quotes Prisot, Finch and Wingate. Hale cites nobody. The court in Woolston's case, cites Hale. Wood cites Woolston's case. Blackstone quotes Woolston's case and Hale. And Lord Mansfield, like Hale, ventures it on his own authority. Here I might defy the best-read lawyer to produce another scrip of authority for this judiciary forgery; and I might go on further to show, how some of the Anglo-Saxon priests interpolated into the text of Alfred's laws, the 20th, 21st, 22d, and 23d chapters of Exodus, and the 15th, of the Acts of the Apostles, from the 23d to the 29th verses. But this would lead my pen and your patience too far. What a conspiracy this between Church and State!—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 359. (M., 1824.)

1441. — — Those who read Prisot's opinion with a candid view to understand and not to chicanery it, cannot mistake its meaning. The reports in the Year-Books were taken very short. The opinions of the judges were written down sententiously, as notes or memoranda, and not with all the development which they probably used in developing them. Prisot's opinion, to be fully expressed, should be thus paraphrased: "To such laws as those holy church have recorded, and preserved in their ancient books and writings, it is proper for us to give credence; for so is, or so says the Common Law, or law of the land, on which all manner of other laws rest for their authority, or are founded; that is to say, the Common Law, or the law of the land common to us all, and established by the authority of us all, is that from which is derived the authority of all other special and subordinate branches of law, such as the canon law, law merchant, law maritime, law of gavelkind, Borough English, corporation laws, local customs and usages, to all of which the common law requires its judges to permit authority in the special or local cases belonging to them. The evidence of these laws is preserved in their ancient treatises, books and writings, in like manner as our common law itself is known, the text of its original enactments having been long lost, and its substance only preserved in ancient and traditional writings. And if it appears, from their ancient books, writings and records, that the bishop, in this case, according to the rules prescribed by these authorities, has done what an ordinary would have done in such case, then we should adjudge it good, otherwise not." To decide this question, they would have to turn to the ancient writings and records of the canon law, in which they would find evidence of the laws of advowsons, quare impedit, the duties of bishops and ordinaries, for which terms Prisot could never have meant to refer them to the Old or New Testament, les saints scriptures, where surely they would not be found. A license which should permit "ancien scrip- ture," to be translated "holy scripture," annihilates at once all the evidence of language. With such a license, we might reverse the sixth commandment into "Thou shalt not omit murder." It would be the more extraordinary in this case, where the mis-translation was to effect the adoption of the whole code of the Jewish and Christian laws into the text of our statutes, to convert religious offenses into temporal crimes, to make the breach of every religious precept a subject of indictment; to submit the question of idolatry, for example, to the trial of a jury, and to a court, its judgment, to the third and fourth generation of the offender. Do we allow our judges this lumping legislation?—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 381. (M., 1824.)

1442. COMMON LAW, Codification of.

—Whether we should undertake to reduce the common law, our own, and so much of the English statutes as we have adopted, to a text, is a question of transcendent difficulty. It was discussed at the first meeting of the committee of the Revised Code [of Virginia] in 1776, and decided in the negative, by the opinions of Wythe, Mason and myself, against Pendleton and Thomas Lee. Pendleton proposed to take Blackstone for that text, only purging him of what was inapplicable or unsuitable to us. In that case, the meaning of every word of Blackstone would have become a source of litigation, until it had been settled by repeated legal decisions. And to come at that meaning, we should have had produced, on all occasions, that very pile of authorities from which it would be said he drew his conclusion, and which, of course, would explain it, and the terms in which it is couched. Thus we should have retained the same chaos of law lore from which we wished to be emancipated, added to the evils of the uncertainty which a new text and new phrases would have generated. An example of this may be found in the old statutes, and commentaries on them, in Coke's Second Institute, but more remarkably in the Institute of Justinian, and the vast masses explanatory or supplementary of that which fill the libraries of the civilians. We were deterred from the attempt by these considerations, added to which, the bustle of the times did not admit leisure for such an undertaking.—To JOHN TYLER vi, 66. (M., 1812.)

1443. COMMON LAW, The Colonists and.—I deride with you the ordinary doctrine, that we brought with us from England the common law rights. This narrow notion was a favorite in the first moment of rallying to our rights against Great Britain. But it was that of men who felt their rights before they had thought of their explanation. The truth is, that we brought with us the rights of men; of expatriated men. On our arrival here, the question would at once arise, by what law will we govern ourselves? The resolution seems to have been, by that system with which we are familiar, to be altered by ourselves occasionally, and adapted to our new situation. The proofs of this resolution are to be found in the form of the oaths of the judges, 1. Henings Stat. 169. 187: of the Governor, ib. 504; in the act for a provisional government, ib. 372; in the preamble to the laws of 1661-2; the uniform current of opinions and decisions, and in the general recognition of all our statutes, framed on that basis. But the state of the English law at the date of our emigration, constituted the system adopted here. We may doubt, therefore, the propriety of quoting in our courts English authorities subsequent to that adoption; still more the admission of authorities posterior to the Declaration of Independence, or rather to the accession of that King, whose reign. ab initio, was the very tissue of wrongs which rendered the Declaration at length necessary. The reason for it had inception at least as far back as the commencement of his reign. This relation to the beginning of his reign, would add the advantage of getting us rid of all Mansfield's innovations, or civilizations of the Common Law. For, however, I admit the superiority of the civil over the common law code, as a system of perfect justice, yet an incorporation of the two would be like Nebuchadnezzar's image of metals and clay, a thing without cohesion of parts. The only natural improvement of the common law, is through its homogeneous ally, the Chancery, in which new principles are to be examined, concocted and digested. But when, by repeated decisions and modifications, they are rendered pure and certain, they should be transferred by statute to the courts of common law and placed within the pale of juries. The exclusion from the courts of the malign influence of all authorities after the Georgium Sidus became ascendant, would uncanonize Blackstone, whose book, although the most elegant and best digested of our law catalogue, has been perverted more than all others, to the degeneracy of legal science. A student finds there a smattering of everything, and his indolence easily persuades him that if he understands that book, he is master of the whole body of the law. The distinction between these, and those who have drawn their stores from the deep and rich mines of Coke on Littleton, seems well understood even by the unlettered common people who apply the appellation of Blackstone lawyers to these ephemeral insects of the law.*—To JOHN TYLER. vi, 65. (1812.)

sions, their courts have cognizance.* It is complete consolidation. [Judges] Ellsworth and Iredell have openly recognized it. [Bushrod] Washington has squinted at it, and I have no doubt it has been decided to cram it down our throats.—To CHARLES PINCKNEY. FORD ED., vii, 398. (M., Oct. 1799.)

1445. COMMON LAW, Corruption and.—I do verily believe, that if the principle were to prevail, of a Common Law being in force in the United States (which principle possesses the General Government at once of all the powers of the State governments, and reduces us to a single consolidated government), it would become the most corrupt

* The subjoined extracts from Jefferson's ANAS, bear on the assertion of this doctrine in the United States Senate:

—Mr. Dexter, Mr. Hillhouse and Mr. Read insisted [in the Senate] in the fullest and most explicit terms, that the Common Law of England is in force in these States, and may be the rule of adjudication in all cases where the laws of the United States have made no provision. Mr. Livermore seemed to urge the same, though he seemed to think that in criminal cases it might be necessary to adopt by an express law. Mr. Tracy was more reserved on this occasion. He only said that Congress might by a law adopt the provisions of the Common Law on any subjects by a reference to that, without detailing the particulars; as in this bill it was proposed that the marshals should summon juries "according to the practice of the Common Law". THE ANAS. FORD ED., i, 288. (April 1800.)

—Dexter maintained that the Common Law as to crimes is in force in the courts of the United States. Chipman says that the principles of common right are Common Law. And he says the Common Law of England is in force here. There being no law in Vermont for appointing juries which the marshal can follow, he says he may appoint them as provided by the Common Law of England, though that part of the Common Law was never adopted in Vermont. THE ANAS. FORD ED., i, 286. (March 19, 1800.)

3—Heretical doctrines maintained in Senate on the motion against the Aurora * * * that the Common Law authorizes the proceeding proposed against the Aurora, and is in force here. By Read. * * * Tracy says he would not exactly say that the Common Law of England in all its extent is in force here; but common sense, reason and morality, which are the foundations of the Common Law, are in force here and establish a Common Law. He held himself so nearly half way between the Common Law of England and what everybody else has called natural law, and not Common Law, that he could hold to either the one or the other, as he should find expedient. Dexter maintained that the Common Law, as to crimes, is in force in the United States. Chipman says that the principles of common right are Common Law.—THE ANAS. ix, 198. FORD ED., i, 285. (1800.)

4—The jury bill before the Senate. Mr. Read says that, if from any circumstances of inaptitude the marshal cannot appoint a jury analogously with the State juries, the Common Law steps in, and he may name them according to that. And March 12, same bill, Mr. Chipman speaking of the case of Vermont, where a particular mode of naming jurors was in force under a former law of that State, when the law of the United States passed declaring that juries shall be appointed in their courts in the several States in the mode "now" in use in the same State. Vermont has since altered their mode of naming them. Mr. Chipman admits the Federal courts cannot adopt the new mode, but in that case he says their marshal may name them according to the rules of the Common Law. Now observe that that is a part of the Common Law which Vermont had never adopted, but, on the contrary, had made a law of their own, better suited to their circumstances.—THE ANAS. FORD ED., i, 286. (March 11, 1800.)

government on the earth.—To GIDEON GRANGER. iv, 331. FORD ED., vii, 451. (M., Aug. 1800.)

1446. COMMON LAW, Origin of.—The term "common law," although it has more than one meaning, is perfectly definite, secundum subjectam materiem. Its most probable origin was on the conquest of the Heptarchy by Alfred, and the amalgamation of their several codes of law into one, which became common to them all. The authentic text of these enactments has not been preserved; but their substance has been committed to many ancient books and writings, so faithfully as to have been deemed genuine from generation to generation, and obeyed as such by all. We have some fragments of them collected by Lambard, Wilkins and others, but abounding with proofs of their spurious authenticity. Magna Charta is the earliest statute, the text of which has come down to us in an authentic form, and thence downward we have them entire. We do not know exactly when the common law and statute law, the lex scripta et non scripta, began to be contradistinguished, so as to give a second acceptation to the former term; whether before, or after Prisot's day, at which time we know that nearly two centuries and a half of statutes were in preservation. In later times, on the introduction of the chancery branch of law, the term common law began to be used in a third sense, as the correlative of chancery law.—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 382. (M., 1824.)

1447. COMMON LAW, State Laws and.—On the settlement of the colonies now composing the United States, and the settlement of a legislature in each of them, that legislature, in some cases, finding that the enacting a complete code of laws which should reach every transaction needing legislation, would be far beyond their time and abilities, adopted, by an express act of their own, the laws of England as they stood at that date, comprehending the common law, statutes to that period, and the chancery law. In other cases, instead of adopting them by an express statute of their own, they considered themselves as having brought with them, and been, even on their passage, under the constant obligation of the laws of the mother country, and on their arrival they continued to practice them without any act of adoption, which practice or usage is evidence that there was an adoption by general consent. In the case of Connecticut, they did not adopt the common law of England at all as their basis, but declared by an act of their own, that the law of God, as it stood revealed in the Old and New Testaments, should be the basis of their laws, to be subject to such alterations as they should make. In all the cases where the common law, or laws of England, were adopted either expressly or tacitly, the legislatures held of course, and exercised the power of making additions and alterations. As the different States were settled at very different periods, and the adoption for each State was the laws of England as they stood at the moment of the adoption by the State, it is evident that the system as adopted in 1607 by Virginia, was one thing, as by Pennsylvania was another thing, as by Georgia, in 1759, was still a different one. And when to this is added the very diversified modifications of the adopted code, produced by the subsequent laws passed by the legislatures of the different States, the system of common law in force in any one State on the 24th of September, 1789, when Congress assumed the jurisdiction given them by the Constitution, was very different from the systems in force at the same moment in the several other States: that in all of these the common law was in force by virtue of the adoption of the State, express or tacit, and that it was not in force in Connecticut, because they had never adopted it.—OBSERVATIONS ON HARDIN'S CASE. ix, 485. (Nov. 1812.)

1448. COMMON LAW, United States Law and.—Having settled by way of preliminary, to what extent, and by what authority, the common law of England is the law of each of the States, we will proceed to consider how far, and by what authority, it is the law of the United States as a national government. By the Constitution, the General Government has jurisdiction in all cases arising under the Constitution, under the (constitutional) laws of the United States, and under treaties; in all cases, too, of ambassadors, of admiralty jurisdiction, where the United States is a party, between a State or its citizens, or another State or its citizens, or foreign State or its citizens. The General Government, then, had a right to take under their cognizance all these cases, and no others. This might have been done by Congress, by passing a complete code, assuming the whole field of their jurisdiction, and by applying uniformly to every State, without any respect to the laws of that State. But, like the State legislatures, who had been placed before in a similar situation, they felt that it was a work of too much time and difficulty to be undertaken. Observing, therefore, that (except cases of piracy and murder on the high seas) all the cases within the jurisdiction must arise in some of the States, they declared by the act of September, 24, 1789. C. 20 § 34. "that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply." Here, then, Congress adopted for each State the laws of that State; and among the laws so adopted were portions of the common law, greater or less in different States, and in force, not by any innate authority of its own, but by the adoption or enacting of it by the State authority. Now what was the opinion to which this was opposed? Several judges of the General Government declared that "the common law of England is the unwritten law of the United States in their national and federal capacity." A State judge, in a printed work, lays it down as "certainly wrong to say that the judiciary power of the nation can exercise no authority but what depends for its principle on acts of the national legislature." And then, quoting the preamble to the Constitution of the United States, which says that its object is, "to insure domestic tranquillity, promote the general welfare" &c., he adds, that "what is here expressed is the common law of the whole country," and that "whatever is in opposition to it, whether treason, insurrection, sedition, murder, riot, assaults, batteries, thefts or robberies, may be punished as crimes, independent of any act of Congress." And opinions equivalent to these were declared by one party on the floor of Congress. This is the doctrine which the republicans declared heretical. They deny that Congress can pass any law not authorized by the Constitution, and that the judges can act on any law not authorized by Congress, or by the Constitution in very direct terms. If the true doctrine then be, that certain portions of the common and statute law of England be in force in the different States by virtue of the adoption in that State, and in the Federal courts of the same State by virtue of the adoption by Congress of the laws of that State within its limits, then whenever a case is presented to a Federal court, they are to ask themselves the following questions: 1. Is this case within any of the definitions of jurisdiction given by the Constitution to the General Government? If it be decided that it is, then, 2. Has Congress by any positive statute assumed cognizance of this case as permitted them by the Constitution? To determine this question, the judge must first look into the statutes of Congress generally; if he finds it not there, he must look into the laws of the State, as well as that portion of the English code which the State may have adopted, as the acts passed specially by the legislature. If the case be actually found provided for in these laws, another question still remains, viz.: 3. Is the law of the State applicable to the analogous case of the General Government? for it may happen that a law of the State, adapted perfectly to its own organization and local circumstances, may not tally with the different organizations or circumstances of the Federal government. If the difference be such as to defeat the application, it must be considered as a case unprovided for by Congress, and not cognizable in their courts. Just so parts of the common or statute law of England are found by the State judges inapplicable to their State from a difference of circumstances. These differences of circumstances will be shaded off from nothing to direct inconsistency, and it will be only by many decisions on a great variety of cases that the line will at length be drawn. Let us apply these questions to Hardin's case, which is simply this: Congress by an express statute, 1802, c. 13, § 6, have made the murder of an Indian within the territory of the United States, punishable by death. A murder is committed on an Indian in that territory. The murderers fly to Kentucky. They are demanded by the Governor of Indiana of the Governor of Kentucky; under whose authority our officer attempting to take them, they were protected by Hardin and others in arms. 1. Is this case within the jurisdiction of Congress? Answer. Congress having a right "to make all rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States," have declared this to be a case of murder. As they can "make all laws necessary and proper for carrying their power into execution," they can make the protecting a murderer criminal in any part of the United States. 2. Has Congress assumed cognizance of the offence of Hardin? We must first examine whether the act of Congress, 1799. c. 9, § 22, takes in this offence. Then whether the laws of Kentucky, common, statute, or State law, as adopted by Congress comprehend this offence. 3. Whether any difference of organization or other circumstance renders the law of Kentucky inapplicable to this offence, can be decided by those only who are particularly acquainted with that law.—OBSERVATIONS ON HARDIN'S CASE. ix, 486. (Nov. 1812.)

1449. ——. I read the sixth chapter of your book with interest and satisfaction, on the question whether the common law (of England) makes a part of the laws of our General Government. That it makes more or less a part of the laws of the States is, I suppose, an unquestionable fact. Not by birthright, * * * but by adoption. But, as to the General Government, the Virginia Report on the Alien and Sedition laws, has so completely pulverized this pretension that nothing new can be said on it. Still, seeing the judges of the Supreme Court (I recollect, for example, Ellsworth and Story) had been found capable of such paralogism, I was glad to see that the Supreme Court had given it up. In the case of Libel in the United States District Court of Connecticut, the rejection of it was certainly sound; because no law of the General Government had made it an offence. But such a case might, I suppose, be sustained in the State courts which have State laws against libels. Because as to the portions of power within each State assigned to the General Government, the President is as much the Executive of the State, as their particular governor is in relation to State powers.—To MR. GOODENOW. vii, 251. (M., 1822.)

1456. COMPACT, The Federal.—The States in North America which confederated to establish their independence of the Government of Great Britain, of which Virginia was one, became, on that acquisition free and independent States, and as such, authorized to constitute governments, each for itself, in such form as it thought best. They entered into a compact (which is called the Constitution of the United States of America), by which they agreed to unite in a single government as to their relations with each other and with foreign nations, and as to certain other articles particularly specified. They retained at the same time, each to itself the other rights of independent government, comprehending mainly their domestic interests. For the administration of their Federal branch, they agreed to appoint, in conjunction, a distinct set of functionaries, legislative, executive and judiciary, in the manner settled in that compact: while to each, severally, and of course remained its original right of appointing, each for itself, a separate set of functionaries, legislative, executive and judiciary, also for administering the domestic branch of their respective governments. These two sets of officers, each independent of the other, constitute thus a whole of government, for each State separately; the powers ascribed to the one, as specifically made federal, exercisable over the whole, the residuary powers, retained to the other, exercisable exclusively over its particular State, foreign herein, each to the others, as they were before the original compact.—DECLARATION AND PROTEST OF VIRGINIA. ix, 496. 1470. — — — A determination never to do what is wrong, prudence and good humor, will go far towards securing to you the estimation of the world. When I recollect that at fourteen years of age, the whole care and direction of myself was thrown on myself entirely, without a relation or friend qualified to advise or guide me, and recollect the various sorts of bad company with which I associated from time to time, I am astonished I did not turn off with some of them, and become as worthless to society as they were. I had the good fortune to become acquainted very early with some characters of very high standing, and to feel the incessant wish that I could ever become what they were. Under temptations and difficulties, I would ask myself what would Dr. Small, Mr. Wythe, Peyton Randolph do in this situation? What course in it will insure me their approbation? I am certain that this mode of deciding on my conduct, tended more to its correctness than any reasoning powers I possessed. Knowing the even and dignified line they pursued, I could never doubt for a moment which of two courses would be in character for them. Whereas, seeking the same object through a process of moral reasoning, and with the jaundiced eye of youth, I should often have erred. From the circumstances of my position, I was often thrown into the society of horse racers, card players, fox hunters, scientific and professional men, and of dignified men; and many a time have I asked myself, in the enthusiastic moment of the death of a fox, the victory of a favorite horse, the issue of a question eloquently argued at the bar, or in the great council of the nation, well, which of these kinds of reputation should I prefer? That of a horse jockey? a fox hunter? an orator? or the honest advocate of my country's rights? Be assured, my dear Jefferson, that these little returns into ourselves, this self-catchising habit, is not trifling nor useless, but leads to the prudent selection and steady pursuit of what is right.—TO THOMAS JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. v, 388. FORD ED., ix, 231. ing, those Articles were debated which determined the proportion, or quota, of money which each State should furnish to the common treasury, and the manner of voting in Congress. The first of these Articles was expressed in the original draft in these words. "Art. XI. All charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence, or general welfare, and allowed by the United States assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several colonies in proportion to the number of inhabitants of every age, sex, and quality, except Indians not paying taxes, in each Colony. a true account of which, distinguishing the white inhabitants, shall be triennially taken and transmitted to the Assembly of the United States." * * * [Here follows Jefferson's report of the debates, printed in the Appendix to this volume.] These Articles, reported July 12, '76, were debated from day to day, and time to time, for two years, were ratified July 9, '78, by ten States, by New Jersey on the 26th of November of the same year, and by Delaware on the 23d of February following. Maryland alone held off two years more, according to them March 1, '81, and thus closing the obligation.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 26. FORD ED., i, 38. (1821.)

1472. CONFEDERATION, Commerce and.—Congress, by the Confederation, have no original and inherent power over the commerce of the States. But, by the 9th article, we are authorized to enter into treaties of commerce. The moment these treaties are concluded, the jurisdiction of Congress over the commerce of the States springs into existence, and that of the particular States is superseded so far as the articles of the treaty may have taken up the subject. There are two restrictions only, on the exercise of the power of treaty by Congress. 1st. That they shall not, by such treaty, restrain the legislatures of the States from imposing such duties on foreigners as their own people are subject to; nor, 2ndly, from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any particular species of goods. Leaving these two points free, Congress may, by treaty, establish any system of commerce they please; but, as I before observed, it is by treaty alone they can do it. Though they may exercise their other powers by resolution or ordinance, those over commerce can only be exercised by forming a treaty, and this probably by an accidental wording of our Confederation.—TO JAMES MONROE. i, 349. FORD ED., iv, 54. (P., 1785.) See TREATIES.

1473. CONFEDERATION, Congress under the.—Our body [the Confederation Congress] was little numerous, but very contentious. Day after day was wasted on the most unimportant questions. My colleague [John F.] Mercer, was one of those afflicted with the morbid rage of debate, of an ardent mind, prompt imagination, and copious flow of words, who heard with impatience any logic which was not his own. Sitting near me on some occasion of a trifling but wordy debate, he asked how I could sit in silence, hearing so much false reasoning, which a word should refute? I observed to him, that to refute was easy, but to silence was impossible; that in measures brought forward by myself, I took the laboring oar, as was incumbent on me; but that in general, I was willing to listen; that if every sound argument or objection was used by some one or other of the numerous debaters, it was enough; if not, I thought it sufficient to suggest the omission, without going into a repetition of what had been already said by others; that this was a waste and abuse of the time and patience of the House, which could not be justified. And I believe, that if the members of deliberative bodies were to observe this course generally, they would do in a day what takes them a week; and it is really more questionable, than may at first be thought, whether Bonaparte's dumb legislature which said nothing and did much, may not be preferable to one which talks much and does nothing.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 58. FORD ED., i, 81. (1821.) See CONGRESS.

— CONFEDERATION, Debates on Articles.—See APPENDIX.

1474. CONFEDERATION, Defects of.—There are some alterations which experience proves to be wanting. Those are principally three. 1. To establish a general rule for the admission of new States into the Union. * * * 2. The Confederation, in its eighth article, decides that the quota of money, to be contributed by the several States, shall be in proportion to the value of the landed property in the State. Experience has shown it impracticable to come at this value. Congress have, therefore, recommended to the States to agree that their quotas shall be in proportion to the number of their inhabitants, counting five slaves, however, but as equal to three free inhabitants. 3. The Confederation forbids the States individually to enter into treaties of commerce, or of any other nature, with foreign nations; and it authorizes Congress to establish such treaties, with two reservations however, viz., that they shall agree to no treaty which would, 1, restrain the legislatures from imposing such duties on foreigners as matters are subject to; or 2, from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of commodities. Congress may, therefore, be said to have a power to regulate commerce, so far as it can be effected by conventions with other nations, and by conventions which do not infringe the two fundamental reservations before mentioned. But this is too imperfect. Because till a convention be made with any particular nation, the commerce of any one of our States with that nation may be regulated by the State itself, and even when a convention is made, the regulation of commerce is taken out of the hands of the several States only so far as it is covered or provided for by that convention or treaty. But treaties are made in such general terms, that the greater part of the regulations would still result to the legislatures. * * *

The commerce of the States cannot be regulated to the best advantage but by a single body, and no body so proper as Congress.

1475. — —. Its greatest defect is the imperfect manner in which matters of commerce have been provided for.—To E. CARINGTON. ii, 217. FORD ED., iv, 424. (P., 1787.)

1476. — —. The fundamental defect of the Confederation was that Congress was not authorized to act immediately on the people, and by its own officers. Their power was only requisitory, and these requisitions were addressed to the several Legislatures, to be by them carried into execution, without other coercion than the moral principle of duty. This allowed in fact a negative to every Legislature, on every measure proposed by Congress; a negative so frequently exercised in practice as to benumb the action of the Federal Government, and to render it inefficient in its general objects, and more especially in pecuniary and foreign concerns. The want, too, of a separation of the Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary functions, worked disadvantageously in practice. Yet this state of things afforded a happy augury of the future march of our confederacy, when it was seen that the good sense and good dispositions of the people, as soon as they perceived the incompetence of their first compact, instead of leaving its correction to insurrection and civil war, agreed with one voice to elect deputies to a general Convention, who should peaceably meet and agree on such a Constitution as "would ensure peace, justice, liberty, the common defence and general welfare."—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 78. 1477. CONFEDERATION, Distribution of Powers.—To make us one nation as to foreign concerns, and keep us distinct in domestic ones, gives the outline of the proper division of power between the general and particular governments. But, to enable the Federal head to exercise the power given it, to best advantage, it should be organized, as the particular ones are, into Legislative, Executive and Judiciary. The first and last are already separated. The second should also be. When last with Congress, I often proposed to members to do this, by making of the Committees of the States, an Executive Committee during the recess of Congress, and, during its sessions, to appoint a Committee to receive and despatch all executive business, so that Congress itself should meddle only with what should be legislative. But I question if any Congress (much less all successively) can have self-denial enough to go through with this distribution. The distribution, then, should be imposed on them.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 66. FORD ED., iv, 333. (P., Dec. 1786.)

1478. CONFEDERATION, Failure of.—

Our first essay, in America, to establish a federative government had fallen, on trial, very short of its object. During the war of Independence, while the pressure of an external enemy hooped us together, and their enterprises kept us necessarily on the alert, the spirit of the people, excited by danger, was a supplement to the Confederation, and urged them to zealous exertions, whether claimed by that instrument, or not; but, when peace and safety were restored, and every man became engaged in useful and profitable occupation, less attention was paid to the calls of Congress.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 78. FORD ED., i, 107. (1821.)

1479. CONFEDERATION, Financial Embarrassments under.—

Mr. Adams, while residing at the Hague, had a general authority to borrow what sums might be requisite for ordinary and necessary expenses. Interest on the public debt, and the maintenance of the diplomatic establishment in Europe, had been habitually provided in this way. He was now elected Vice-President of the United States, was soon to return to America, and had referred our bankers to me for future counsel on our affairs in their hands. But I had no powers, no instructions, no means, and no familiarity with the subject. It had always been exclusively under his management, except as to occasional and partial deposits in the hands of Mr. Grand, banker in Paris, for special and local purposes. These last had been exhausted for some time, and I had frequently pressed the Treasury Board to replenish this particular deposit, as Mr. Grand now refused to make further advances. They answered candidly that no funds could be obtained until the new government should get into action, and have time to make its arrangements. Mr. Adams had received his appointment to the court of London while engaged at Paris, with Dr. Franklin and myself, in the negotiations under our joint commissions. He had repaired thence to London, without returning to the Hague to take leave of that government. He thought it necessary, however, to do so now, before he should leave Europe, and accordingly went there. I learned of his departure from London by a letter from Mrs. Adams received on the very day on which he would arrive at the Hague. A consultation with him, and some provision for the future was indispensable, while we could yet avail ourselves of his powers; for when they would be gone, we should be without resource. I was daily dunned by a Company who had formerly made a small loan to the United States, the principal of which was now become due; and our bankers in Amsterdam had notified me that the interest on our general debt would be expected in June; that if we failed to pay it, it would be deemed an act of bankruptcy and would effectually destroy the credit of the United States and all future prospect of obtaining money there; that the loan they had been authorized to open, of which a third only was filled, had now ceased to get forward and rendered desperate that hope of resource. I saw that there was not a moment to lose, and set out for the Hague on the second morning after receiving the information of Mr. Adams's journey. * * * Mr. Adams concurred with me at once in opinion that something must be done, and that we ought to risk ourselves on doing it without instructions, to save the credit of the United States. We foresaw that before the new government could be adopted, assembled, establish its financial system, get the money into the Treasury and place it in Europe, considerable time would elapse; that, therefore, we had better provide at once for the years 1788, 1789 and 1790 in order to place our government at its ease, and our credit in security, during that trying interval. We set out * * * for Amsterdam.

I had prepared an estimate showing that:

|---|---------------------|
| There would be necessary for the year '88..... | 531-937-10 Florins |
| There would be necessary for the year '89..... | 538-540 " |
| There would be necessary for the year '90..... | 473-540 " |
| Total..... | 1,544-017-10 " |
| To meet this the bankers had in hand..... | 79-268-2-8 florins |
| And the unsold bonds would yield | 542-800 florins |
| | 622-068-2-8 florins |
| Leaving a deficit of..... | 921-949-7-4 florins |
| We proposed then to borrow a million, yielding..... | 920.000 florins |
| Which would leave a small deficiency of..... | 1,949-7-4 florins |

Mr. Adams accordingly executed 1000 bonds, for 1000 florins each and deposited them in the hands of our bankers, with instructions, however, not to issue them until Congress should ratify the measure. * * * I had the satisfaction to reflect that by this journey our credit was secured, the new government was placed at ease for two years to come and that, as well as myself, relieved from the torment of incessant duns, whose just complaints could not be silenced by any means within our power.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 83. FORD ED., i, 114. (1821.)

1480. CONFEDERATION, Franklin's plan for.—I was absent from Congress from the beginning of January, 1776, to the middle of May. Either just before I left Congress, or immediately on my return to it (I rather think it was the former), Dr. Franklin put into my hands the draft of a plan of Confederation, desiring me to read it, and tell him what I thought of it. I approved it highly. He showed it to others. Some thought as I did; others were revolted at it. We found it could not be passed, and the proposing it to Congress as the subject for any vote whatever would startle many members so much, that they would suspect we had lost sight of reconciliation with Great Britain, and that we should lose much more ground than we should gain by the proposition. Yet, that the idea of a more firm and of union than the undefined one under which we then acted might be suggested and permitted to grow, Dr. Franklin informed Congress that he had sketched the outlines of an instrument which might become necessary at a future day, if the ministry continued pertinacious, and would ask leave for it to lay on the table of Congress, that the members might in the meantime be turning the subject in their minds, and have something more perfect prepared by the time it should become necessary. This was agreed to by the more timid members, only on condition that no entry whatever should be made in the journals of Congress relative to this instrument. This was to continue in force only till a reconciliation with Great Britain. This is all that ever was done or proposed in Congress on the subject of a Confederation before June, 1776, when the proposition was regularly made to Congress, a committee appointed to draw an instrument of Confederation, who accordingly drew one, very considerably differing from the sketch of Dr. Franklin.—NOTES ON M. SOULÉ'S WORK. ix, 303. FORD ED., iv, 310. (P., 1786.)

1481. CONFEDERATION, Jealousy of government under.—Our first federal constitution, or Confederation, as it was called, was framed in the first moments of our separation from England, in the highest point of our jealousies of independence as to her, and as to each other. It formed, therefore, too weak a bond to produce an union of action as to foreign nations. This appeared at once on the establishment of peace, when the pressure of a common enemy which had hooped us together during the war, was taken away. Congress was found to be quite unable to point the action of the several States to a common object. A general desire, therefore, took place of amending the federal constitution.—To C. D. EBELING. FORD ED., vii, 43. (1795.)

1482. CONFEDERATION, Money requisitions and.—Among the debilities of the government of the Confederation, no one was more distinguished or more distressing than the utter impossibility of obtaining, from the States, the moneys necessary for the payment of debts, or even for the ordinary expenses of the government. Some contributed a little, some less, and some nothing, and the last furnished at length an excuse for the first to do nothing also.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 82. FORD ED., i, 114. (1821.)

1483. CONFEDERATION, Perfection of.—The confederation is a wonderfully perfect instrument considering the circumstances under which it was formed.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 285. FORD ED., iv, 141. (P., 1786.)

1484. — — — With all the imperfections of our present government, it is without comparison the best existing, or that ever did exist.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 217. FORD ED., iv, 424. (P., 1787.)

1485. CONFEDERATION, Representation under.—I learn from our delegates that the Confederation is again on the carpet, a great and a necessary work, but I fear almost desperate. The point of representation is what most alarms me, and I fear the great and small colonies are bitterly determined not to cede. Will you be so good as to collect the proposition I formerly made you in private, and try if you can work it into some good to save our union? It was, that any proposition might be negatived by the representatives of a majority of the people of America, or of a majority of the Colonies of America. The former secures the larger; the latter, the smaller Colonies. I have mentioned it to many here [Williamsburg]. The good Whigs, I think, will so far cede their opinions for the sake of the union, and others we are little for.—To JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., ii, 130. (Wg., May 1777.)

1486. CONFEDERATION, State Coercion and.—It has often been said that the decisions of Congress are impotent because the Confederation provides no compulsory power. But when two or more nations enter into compact, it is not usual for them to say what shall be done to the party who infringes it. Decency forbids this, and it is as unnecessary as indecent, because the right of compulsion naturally results to the party injured by the breach. When any one State in the American Union refuses obedience to the confederation by which they have bound themselves, the rest have a natural right to compel them to obedience. Congress would probably exercise long patience before they would recur to force; but if the case ultimately required it, they would use that recurrence. Should this case ever arise, they will probably coerce by a naval force, as being more easy, less dangerous to liberty, and less likely to produce much bloodshed.—To M. DE MEUNIER, ix, 291. FORD ED., iv, 147. (P., 1786.) See COERCION.

1487. CONFEDERATION, The States' Committee.—The Committee of the States, which shall be appointed pursuant to the 9th article of Confederation and perpetual union, to sit in the recess of Congress for transacting the business of the United States, shall possess all the powers which may be exercised by seven States in Congress assembled, except that of sending ambassadors, ministers, envoys, resident-consuls or agents to foreign countries or courts: Establishing rules for deciding what captures on land or water shall be legal, and what manner prizes, taken by land or naval forces in the service of the United States, shall be divided or appropriated: Establishing courts for receiving and determining finally appeals in cases of capture, constituting courts for deciding disputes and differences arising between two or more States: Fixing the standard of weights and measures for the United States: Changing the rate of postage on the papers passing through the post-offices established by Congress, and of repealing or contravening any ordinance or act passed by Congress. No question except for adjourning from day to day shall be determined without the concurrence of nine votes. A chairman to be chosen by the Committee shall preside. The officers of Congress, when required, shall attend on the Committee. The Committee shall keep a journal of their proceedings, to be laid before Congress, and in these journals, which shall be published monthly, and transmitted to the Executives of the several States, shall be entered the yeas and nays of the members, when any one of them shall have desired it before the question be put.—REPORT ON COM. OF THE STATES. FORD ED., iii, 392. (Jan. 1784.)

1489. — —. A Committee [of the States] was appointed who entered on duty on the subsequent adjournment of Congress [in 1784], quarrelled very soon, split, into two parties, abandoned their post, and left the government without any visible head until the next meeting in Congress.* We have since seen the same thing take place in the Directory of France; and I believe it will forever take place in any Executive consisting of a plurality. Our plan best, I believe, combines wisdom and practicability, by providing a plurality of Counsellors, but a single Arbiter for ultimate decision.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 54. FORD ED., i, 75. (1821.)

1490. CONFISCATION, George III. and.—He has incited treasonable insurrections of our fellow citizens, with the allurements of forfeiture and confiscation of our property.†—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

1491. CONFISCATION, Loyalist Refugees and.—The British court had it extremely at heart to procure a restitution of the estates of the refugees who had gone over to their side [in the Revolution]; they proposed it in the first conferences [on the treaty of peace], and insisted on it to the last. Our commissioners, on the other hand, refused it from first to last, urging, 1st, that it was unreasonable to restore the confiscated property of the refugees unless they would reimburse the destruction of the property of our citizens, committed on their part; and 2dly, that it was beyond the powers of the commissioners to stipulate, or of Congress to enforce. On this point, the treaty hung long. It was the subject of a special mission of a confidential agent of the British negotiator from Paris to London. It was still insisted on, on his return, and still protested against, by our commissioners; and when they were urged to agree only, that Congress should recommend to the State Legislatures to restore the estates, &c., of the refugees, they were expressly told that the Legislatures would not regard the recommendation. In proof of this, I subjoin extracts from the letters and journals of Mr. Adams and Dr. Franklin, two of our commissioners, the originals of which are among the records of the Department of State. * * * These prove, beyond all question, that the difference between an express agreement to do a thing, and to recommend it to be done, was well understood by both parties, and that the British negotiators were put on their guard by those on our part, not only that the Legislatures will be free to refuse, but that they probably would refuse. And it is evident from all circumstances, that Mr. Oswald accepted the recommendation merely to have something to oppose to the clamors of the refugees—to keep alive a hope in them that they might yet get their property from the State Legislatures; and that if they should fail in this, they would have ground to demand indemnification from their own government; and he might think it a circumstance of present relief at least, that the question of indemnification by them should be kept out of sight, till time, and events should open it upon the nation insensibly. The same was perfectly understood by the British ministry, and by the members of both Houses in Parliament, as well those who advocated, as those who opposed the treaty; the latter of whom, being out of the secrets of the negotiation, must have formed their judgment on the mere import of the terms. *—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 372. FORD ED., vi, 18. (Pa., May 1792.)

1492. CONFISCATION, Principles Underlying.—It cannot be denied that the state of war strictly permits a nation to seize the property of its enemies found within its own limits, or taken in war, and in whatever form it exists whether in action or possession. This is so perspicuously laid down by one of the most respectable writers on subjects of this kind, that I shall use his words. "Since it is a condition of war, that enemies may be deprived of all their rights, it is reasonable that everything of an enemy's, found among his enemies, should change its owner, and go to the treasury. It is, moreover, usually directed, in all declarations of war, that the goods of enemies, as well those found among us, as those taken in war, shall be confiscated. If we follow the mere right of war, even im- movable property may be sold, and its price carried into the treasury, as is the custom with movable property. But in almost all Europe, it is only notified that their profits, during the war, shall be received by the treasury; and the war being ended, the immovable property itself is restored, by agreement, to the former owner." Bynkersh. Quest. Jur. Pub. L. 1 c. 7. Every nation, indeed, would wish to pursue the latter practice, if under circumstances leaving them their usual resources.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 369. FORD ED., vi, 15. (Pa., May 1792.)

1493. CONFISCATION, The Revolution and.—The circumstances of our war were without example; excluded from all commerce, even with neutral nations, without arms, money, or the means of getting them abroad, we were obliged to avail ourselves of such resources as we found at home. Great Britain, too, did not consider it as an ordinary war, but a rebellion; she did not conduct it according to the rules of war, established by the law of nations, but according to her acts of parliament, made from time to time, to suit circumstances. She would not admit our title even to the strict rights of ordinary war; she cannot then claim from us its liberalities; yet the confiscations of property were by no means universal, and that of debts still less so.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 369. FORD ED., vi, 16. (Pa., May 1792.)

1496. CONGRESS, The Administration and.—I do not mean that any gentleman, relinquishing his own judgment, should implicitly support all the measures of the administration; but that, where he does not disapprove of them, he should not suffer them to go off in sleep, but bring them to the attention of the House, and give them a fair chance. Where he disapproves, he will of course leave them to be brought forward by those who concur in the sentiment. Shall I explain my idea by an example? The classification of the militia was communicated to General Varnum and yourself merely as a proposition which, if you approved, it was trusted you would support. I knew, indeed, that General Varnum was opposed to anything which might break up the present organization of the militia; but when so modified as to avoid this, I thought he might, perhaps, be reconciled to it. 1504. CONGRESS, Attendance.—That every State should be represented in the great council of the nation, is not only the interest of each, but of the whole united, who have a right to be aided by the collective wisdom and information of the whole, in questions which are to decide on their future well-being. I trust that your Excellency will deem it incumbent on you to call an immediate meeting of your [Tennessee's] Legislature, in order to put it in their power to fulfil this high duty, by making special and timely provision for the representation of their State at the ensuing meeting of Congress; to which measures I am bound earnestly to exhort yourself and them. I am not insensible of the personal inconvenience of this special call to the members composing the Legislature of so extensive a State; but neither will I do them the injustice to doubt their being ready to make much greater sacrifices for the common safety, should the course of events still lead to a call for them.—To GOVERNOR SEVIER. v, 421. 1507. CONGRESS, Buildings for.—The United States should be made capable of acquiring and holding in perpetuum such grounds and buildings in and about the place of the session of [the Continental] Congress as may be necessary for the transaction of business by their own body, their committees and officers; each State should be made capable of acquiring and holding in perpetuum such grounds and buildings as they may at any time think proper to acquire and erect for the personal accommodation of their delegates; and all the grounds and buildings * * * should be exempt from taxation.—RESOLVE ON CONTINENTAL CONGRESS. FORD ED., iii, 463. (April 1784?)

1508. CONGRESS, Business Men in.—We want men of business [in Congress].* * * I am convinced it is in the power of any man who understands business, and who will undertake to keep a file of the business before Congress and press it, as he would his own docket in a court, to shorten the sessions a month one year with another, and to save in that way $30,000 a year. An ill-judged modesty prevents those from undertaking it who are equal to it. I really wish you were here.—To CÆSAR A. RODNEY. FORD ED., viii, 187. (W., Dec. 1802.)

1509. CONGRESS, Cabinet Officers in.—An attempt has been made to give further extent to the influence of the executive over the Legislature, by permitting the heads of departments to attend the House and explain their measures viva voce. But it was negatived by a majority of 35 to 11, which gives us some hope of the increase of the republican vote.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iii, 491. FORD ED., vi, 134. (Pa., Nov. 1792.)

1510. CONGRESS, Call for Continental.—We (Patrick Henry, R. H. Lee, Francis R. Lee, Thomas Jefferson, and three or four other members of the Virginia House of Burgesses) * * * agreed to an association, and instructed the committee of correspondence to propose to the corresponding committees of the other Colonies, to appoint deputies to meet in Congress at such place, annually, as should be convenient, to direct from time to time, the measures required by the general interest: and we declared that an attack on any one Colony, should be considered as an attack on the whole. This was in May, 1774. We further recommended to the several counties to elect deputies to meet at Williamsburg, the 1st of August ensuing, to consider the state of the Colony, and particularly to appoint delegates to a general Congress, should that measure be acceded to by the committees of correspondence generally. It was acceded to: Philadelphia was appointed for the place, and the 5th of September for the time of meeting.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 7. FORD ED., i, 11. (1820.)

1511. CONGRESS, Compensation of Members.—You say you did not understand to what proceeding of Congress I alluded as likely to produce a removal of most of the members, and that by a spontaneous movement of the people, unsuggested by the newspapers, which had been silent on it. I alluded to the law giving themselves $1500 a year. There has never been an instant before of so unanimous an opinion of the people, and that through every State in the Union. A very few members of the first order of merit in the House will be reelected; Clay, of Kentucky, by a small majority, and a few others. But the almost entire mass will go out, not only those who supported the law or voted for it, or skulked from the vote, but those who voted against it or opposed it actively, if they took the money; and the examples of refusals to take it were very few.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., x, 63. (M., Sep. 1816.)

1512. — According to the opinion I hazarded to you, we have had almost an entire change in the body of Congress. The unpopularity of the compensation law was completed, by the manner of repealing it as to all the world except themselves. In some States, it is said, every member is changed; in all, many. What opposition there was to the original law, was chiefly from Southern members. Yet many of those have been left out, because they received the advanced wages. I have never known so unanimous a sentiment of disapprobation; and what is more remarkable is, that it was spontaneous. The newspapers were almost entirely silent, and the people not only unled by their leaders, but in opposition to them. I confess I was highly pleased with this proof of the innate good sense, the vigilance, and the determination of the people to act for themselves.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vii, 78. FORD ED., x, 90. (M., 1817.)

— CONGRESS, Under the Confederation.—See 1473.

1513. CONGRESS, The Constitution and.—Congress * * * [is] not a party but merely the creature of the [Federal] compact, and [is] subject, as to its assumptions of power, to the final judgment of those by whom, and for whose use, itself and its powers were all created and modified.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 469. FORD ED., vii, 302. (1798.)

1514. CONGRESS, Constitutional view of Continental.—There is one opinion in your book which I will ask you to reconsider, because it appears to me not entirely accurate, and not likely to do good. Page 362, "Congress [Continental] is not a legislative, but a diplomatic body." Separating into parts the whole sovereignty of our States, some of these parts are yielded to Congress. Upon these I should think them both legislative and executive, and that would have been judiciary also, had not the Confederation required them for certain purposes to appoint a judiciary. It has accordingly been the decision of our courts that the Confederation is a part of the law of the land, and superior in authority to the ordinary laws, because it cannot be altered by the legislature of any one State. I doubt whether they are at all a diplomatic assembly.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 128. (P., 1787.)

1516. CONGRESS, Control over.—It is not from this branch of government [Congress] we have most to fear. Taxes and short elections will keep them right.—To THOMAS RITCHIE. vii, 192. FORD ED., x, 170. (M., 1820.)

1517. CONGRESS, Convening.—I have carefully considered the question whether the President may call Congress to any other place than that to which they have adjourned themselves, and think he cannot have such a right unless it has been given him by the Constitution, or the laws, and that neither of these has given it. The only circumstance which he can alter, as to their meeting is that of time, by calling them at an earlier day than that to which they stand adjourned, but no power to change the place is given. * * * I think * * * Congress must meet in Philadelphia, even if it be in the open fields, to adjourn themselves to some other place.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iv, 73. FORD ED., vi, 436. (M., Oct. 1793.)

1518. CONGRESS, Corruption and.—I told President [Washington] that it was a fact, as certainly known as that he and I were then conversing, that particular members of the Legislature, while those laws [Assumption, Funding, &c.] were on the carpet, had feathered their nests with paper, had then voted for the laws, and constantly since lent all the energy of their talents, and instrumentality of their offices, to the establishment and enlargement of the [Treasury] system.—THE ANAS. ix, 104. FORD ED., i, 177. (Feb. 1792.)

1519. — —. It [is] a cause of just uneasiness, when we [see] a legislature legislating for their own interests, in opposition to those of the people.—THE ANAS. ix, 118. FORD ED., i, 200. (1792.)

1520. — —. The capital employed in paper speculation * * * has furnished effectual means of corrupting such a portion of the Legislature, as turns the balance between the honest voters, which ever way it is directed. This corrupt squadron, deciding the voice of the Legislature, have manifested their dispositions to get rid of the limitations imposed by the Constitution on the general Legislature, limitations, on the faith of which, the States acceded to that instrument.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 361. FORD ED., vi, 3. (Pa., May 1792.)

1521. — —. Of all the mischiefs objected to the system of measures [public debt, paper money] none is so afflicting as the corruption of the Legislature. As it was the earliest of these measures, it became the instrument for producing the rest, and will be the instrument for producing in future a king, lords and commons, or whatever else those who direct it may choose.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 362. FORD ED., vi, 4. (Pa., May 1792.)

1522. — —. Withdrawn such a distance from the eye of their constituents, and these so dispersed as to be inaccessible to public information, and particularly to that of the conduct of their own representatives, they will form the most corrupt government on earth, if the means of their corruption be not prevented.—TO PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 362. FORD ED., vi, 4. (Pa., 1792.)

1523. — —. I told President Washington there was great difference between the little accidental schemes of self-interest, which would take place in every body of men, and influence their votes, and a regular system for forming a corps of interested persons, who should be steadily at the orders of the Treasury.—THE ANAS. ix, 122. FORD ED., i, 205. (1792.)

1524. — —. I indulge myself on one political topic only, that is, in declaring to my countrymen the shameless corruption of a portion of the representatives to the first and second Congresses, and their implicit devotion to the Treasury. I think I do good in this, because it may produce exertions to reform the evil, on the success of which the form of the government is to depend.—TO EDMUND RANDOLPH. iv, 101. FORD ED., vi, 498. (M., Feb. 1794.)

1525. — —. Alexander Hamilton avowed the opinion that man could be governed by one of two motives only, force or interest. Force, he observed, in this country was out of the question; and the interests, therefore, of the members must be laid hold of to keep the Legislature in unison with the Executive. And with grief and shame it must be acknowledged that his machine was not without effect; that even in this, the birth of our government, some members were found sordid enough to bend their duty to their interests, and to look after personal rather than public good.—THE ANAS. ix, 91. FORD ED., i, 160. (1818.)

1526. CONGRESS, Credentials of Members.—We have had hopes till to-day of receiving an authentication of the next year's delegation [to the Continental Congress], but are disappointed. I know not who should have sent it,—the Governor, or President of the convention; but certainly somebody should have done it. What will be the consequence, I know not. We cannot be admitted to take our seat on any precedent, or the spirit of any precedent yet set. According to the standing rules, not only an authentic copy will be required, but it must be entered in the journals verbatim, that it may there appear we have right to sit.—TO JOHN PAGE. FORD ED., ii, 74. (Pa., 1776.)

1527. — —. Some of the newspapers indeed mention that on such a day, such and such gentlemen were appointed to serve for the next year, but could newspaper evidence be received? They could not furnish the form of the appointment.—TO JOHN PAGE. FORD ED., ii, 75. (Pa., 1776.)

— CONGRESS, Debate in.—See 1571.

1528. CONGRESS, Delegates.—Until their admission by their delegates into Congress, any of the said States, after the establishment of their temporary Government, shall have authority to keep a sitting member in Congress, with a right of debating, but not of voting.—WESTERN TERRITORY REPORT. FORD ED., iii, 400. (1784.)

1529. CONGRESS, Election of Members.—An election [of members of Congress] by districts would be best, if it could be general; but while ten States choose either by their legislatures or by a general ticket, it is folly and worse than folly for the other six not to do it. In these ten States the minority is entirely unrepresented; and their majorities not only have the weight of their whole State in their scale, but have the benefit of so much of our minorities as can succeed at a district election. This is, in fact, ensuring to our minorities the appointment of the Government. To state it in another form, it is merely a question whether we will divide the United States into sixteen or one hundred and thirty-seven districts. The latter being more chequered, and representing the people in smaller sections, would be more likely to be an exact representation of their diversified sentiments. But a representation of a part by great, and a part by small sections, would give a result very different from what would be the sentiment of the whole people of the United States, were they assembled together.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 308. FORD ED., vii, 401. (Pa., 1800.)

1530. CONGRESS, Executive influence.

—The republicans complain that the influence and patronage of the Executive are to become so great as to govern the Legislature. They endeavored a few days ago to take away one means of influence by condemning references to the heads of departments. They failed by a majority of five votes. They were more successful in their endeavor to prevent the introduction of a new means of influence, that of admitting the heads of departments to deliberate occasionally in the House in explanation of their measures.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 493. FORD ED., vi, 143. (Pa., 1792.)

1531. CONGRESS, Executive information.—The Secretary of the Treasury [Alexander Hamilton] has been guilty of indecorum to this House, in undertaking to judge of its motives in calling for information which was demandable of him, from the constitution of his office; and in failing to give all the necessary information within his knowledge, relatively to the subjects of the reference made to him of the 19th, January, 1792, and of the 22d November, 1792, during the present session.—GILES TREASURY RESOLUTIONS. FORD ED., vi, 170. (1793.)

1532. CONGRESS, Expenditures and.—The subject of the debates was, whether the representatives of the people were to have no check on the expenditure of the public money, and the Executive to squander it at their will, leaving to the Legislature only the drudgery of furnishing the money. They begin to open their eyes on this to the Eastward, and to suspect they have been hoodwinked.—To EDMUND PENDLETON. iv, 229. FORD ED., vii, 228. (Pa., April 1798.)

1533. CONGRESS, Farmers in.—The only corrective of what is corrupt in our present form of government will be the augmentation of the members in the lower House so as to get a more agricultural representation, which may put that interest above that of the stock-jobbers.—To GEORGE MASON. iii, 209. FORD ED., v, 275. (Pa., 1791.)

1534. CONGRESS, Foreign Powers and.—The Legislature should never show itself in a matter with a foreign nation, but where the case is very serious, and they mean to commit the nation on its issue.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 296. FORD ED., v, 391. (1791.)

1535. CONGRESS, Influencing.—As I never had the desire to influence the members, so neither had I any other means than my friendships, which I valued too highly to risk by usurpation on their freedom of judgment, and the conscientious pursuit of their own sense of duty.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 460. FORD ED., vi, 102. (M., 1792.)

1536. — — — If it has been supposed that I have ever intrigued among the members of the Legislature to defeat the plans of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is contrary to all truth. * * * That I have utterly, in my private conversations, disapproved of the system of the Secretary of the Treasury. I acknowledge and avow; and this was not merely a speculative difference.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 460. FORD ED., vi, 102. (M., 1792.)

— CONGRESS, Instructing Members.—See INSTRUCTIONS.

— CONGRESS, Insult to Members.—See 1572, 1575.

1537. CONGRESS, Intermeddling with.—With the affairs of the Legislature, I never did intermeddle.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 467. FORD ED., vi, 108. (M., 1792.)

1538. — — — When I embarked in the government, it was with a determination to intermeddle not at all with the Legislature.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 460. FORD ED., vi, 102. (M., 1792.)

1539. CONGRESS, Jobbery in.—I have always observed that in questions of expense, where members may hope either for offices or jobs for themselves or their friends, some few will be debauched, and that is sufficient to turn the decision where a majority is, at most, but small.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 103. FORD ED., vi, 503. (M., April 1794.)

1540. CONGRESS, The Judiciary vs.—Were I called upon to decide whether the people had best be omitted in the Legislative or Judiciary department, I would say it is better to leave them out of the Legislature. The execution of the laws is more important than the making them.—To M. L'ABBÉ ARNOND. iii, 82. FORD ED., v, 104. (P., 1789.)

1541. CONGRESS, Lawyers in.—I have much doubted whether, in case of a war, Congress would find it practicable to do their part of the business. That a body containing one hundred lawyers in it, should direct the measures of a war, is, I fear, impossible; and that thus that member of our Constitution, which is its bulwark, will prove to be an impracticable one from its cacoethes loquendi. It may be doubted how far it has the power, but I am sure it has not the resolution to reduce the right of talking to practicable limits.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED., ix, 337. (M., Feb. 1812.)

1542. — — — How can expedition be expected from a body which we have saddled with an hundred lawyers, whose trade is talking.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 466. FORD ED., ix, 521. (M., 1815.) See DEBATE, LAWYERS.

1543. CONGRESS, Leadership in.—I wish sincerely you were back in the Senate; and that you would take the necessary measures to get yourself there. Perhaps, as a preliminary, you should go to our [Virginia] Legislature. * * * A majority of the Senate means well. But Tracy and Bayard are too dexterous for them, and have very much influenced their proceedings. Tracy has been of nearly every committee during the session, and for the most part the chairman, and of course drawer of the reports. Seven federalists voting always in phalanx, and joined by some discontented republicans, some oblique ones, some capricious, have so often made a majority, as to produce very serious embarrassment to the public operations; and very much do I dread the submitting to them, at the next session, any treaty which can be made with either England or Spain, when I consider that five joining the federalists, can defeat a friendly settlement of our affairs.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. v. 4. FORD ED., viii, 435. (W., April 1806.)

1544. ——. The House of Representatives is as well disposed as I ever saw one. The defection of so prominent a leader [John Randolph], threw them into dismay and confusion for a moment; but they soon rallied to their own principles, and let him go off with five or six followers only. One half of these are from Virginia. His late declaration of perpetual opposition to this administration, drew off a few others who at first had joined him, supposing his opposition occasional only, and not systematic. The alarm the House has had from this schism, has produced a rallying together and a harmony, which carelessness and security had begun to endanger. On the whole, this little trial of the firmness of our representatives in their principles, and that of the people also, which is declaring itself in support of their public functionaries, has added much to my confidence in the stability of our government; and to my conviction, that, should things go wrong at any time, the people will set them to rights by the peaceable exercise of their elective rights.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. v. 5. FORD ED., viii, 435. (W., April 1806.)

1545. ——. There never was a time when the services of those who possess talents, integrity, firmness, and sound judgment, were more wanted in Congress. Some one of that description is particularly wanted to take the lead in the House of Representatives, to consider the business of the nation as his own business, to take it up as if he were singly charged with it, and carry it through. I do not mean that any gentleman, relinquishing his own judgment, should implicitly support all the measures of the administration; but that, where he does not disapprove of them, he should not suffer them to go off in sleep, but bring them to the attention of the House, and give them a fair chance. Where he disapproves, he will of course leave them to be brought forward by those who concur in the sentiment.—To MR. BIDWELL. v. 15. (W., 1806.)

1546. ——. Mr. T. M. Randolph is, I believe, determined to retire from Congress, and it is strongly his wish, and that of all here, that you should take his place. Never did the calls of patriotism more loudly assail you than at this moment. After excepting the Federalists who will be twenty-seven, and the little band of schismatics, who will be three or four (all tongue), is as well-disposed House of Representatives is as well-disposed a body of men as I ever saw collected. But there is no one whose talents and standing, taken together, have weight enough to give him the lead. The consequence is, that there is no one who will undertake to do the public business, and it remains undone. Were you here, the whole would rally round you in an instant, and willingly cooperate in whatever is for the public good. Nor would it require you to undertake drudgery in the House. There are enough, able and willing to do that. A rallying point is all that is wanting. Let me beseech you, then, to offer yourself.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. v. 48. FORD ED., ix, 32. (W., 1807.)

1547. CONGRESS, Legislation and.—Whatever of the enumerated objects [in the Constitution] is proper for a law, Congress may make the law.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 506. FORD ED., viii, 248. (M., 1803.)

— CONGRESS, Long speeches in.—See 1571 and 1579.

1548. CONGRESS, Majority.—What [you ask] has led Congress to determine that the concurrence of seven votes is requisite in questions which, by the Confederation, are submitted to the decision of a majority of the United States, in Congress assembled? The ninth article of Confederation, section six, evidently establishes three orders of questions in Congress. 1. The greater ones, which relate to making peace or war, alliances, coinage, requisitions for money, raising military force, or appointing its commander-in-chief. 2. The lesser ones, which comprehend all other matters submitted by the Confederation to the federal head. 3. The single question of adjourning from day to day. This gradation of questions is distinctly characterized by the article. In proportion to the magnitude of these questions, a greater concurrence of the voices composing the Union was thought necessary. Three degrees of concurrence, well distinguished by substantial circumstances, offered themselves to notice. 1. A concurrence of a majority of the people of the Union. It was thought that this would be ensured by requiring the voices of nine States; because according to the loose estimates which had been made of the inhabitants, and the proportion of them which were free, it was believed that even the nine smallest would include a majority of the free citizens of the Union. The voices, therefore, of nine States were required in the greater questions. 2. A concurrence of the majority of the States. Seven constitute that majority. This number, therefore, was required in the lesser questions. 3. A concurrence of the majority of Congress, that is to say, of the States actually present in it. As there is no Congress, when there are not seven States present, this concurrence could never be of less than four States. But these might happen to be the four smallest, which would not include one-ninth part of the free citizens of the Union. This kind of majority, therefore, was entrusted with nothing but the power of adjourning themselves from day to day. Here, then, are three kinds of majorities. 1. Of the people. 2. Of the States. 3. Of the Congress; each of which is entrusted to a certain length.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 244. FORD ED., iv, 148. (P., 1786.)

1549. CONGRESS, Messages to.—The first communication to the next Congress will be, like all subsequent ones, by me sage, to which no answer will be expected.—To NATHANIEL MACON. iv, 39^c. FORD ED., viii, 52. (W., May 1801.)

1550. — —. The circumstances under which we find ourselves placed rendering inconvenient the mode heretofore practiced of making, by personal address, the first communications between the Legislative and Executive branches, I have adopted that by message, as used on all subsequent occasions through the session. In doing this, I have had principal regard to the convenience of the Legislature, to the economy of their time, to their relief from the embarrassment of immediate answers on subjects not yet fully before them, and to the benefits thence resulting to the public affairs. Trusting that a procedure founded on these motives will meet their approbation, I beg leave through you, Sir, to communicate the enclosed message, with the documents accompanying it, to the honorable the Senate, * * *. —To THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE. iv, 423. FORD ED., viii, 108. (W., Dec. 1801.)

1551. — —. By sending a message, instead of making a speech, * * * I have prevented the bloody conflict to which the making an answer would have committed them. They consequently were able to set into real business at once, without losing ten or twelve days in combating an answer.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 426. FORD ED., viii, 127. (W., 1801.)

1552. CONGRESS, Mutiny against.—The conduct of [the Federation] Congress was marked with indignation and firmness. They received no propositions from the mutineers. They came to the resolutions which may be seen in the journals of June the 21st, 1783, then adjourned regularly, and went through the body of the mutineers to their respective lodgings. The measures taken by Dickinson, the President of Pennsylvania, for punishing this insult, not being satisfactory to Congress, they assembled, nine days after, at Princeton, in Jersey. The people of Pennsylvania sent petitions declaring their indignation at what passed, their devotion to the federal head, and their dispositions to protect it, and praying them to return; the Legislature, as soon as assembled, did the same thing; the Executive, whose irresolution had been so exceptionable, made apologies. But Congress was now removed; and, to the opinion that this example was proper, other causes were now added, sufficient to prevent their return to

Philadelphia.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 258. FORD ED., iv, 163. (Pa., 1786.)

1553. CONGRESS, Non-attendance.—It is now above a fortnight since Congress should have met, and six States only appear. We have some hopes of Rhode Island coming in to-day, but when two more will be added seems as insusceptible of calculation as when the next earthquake will happen.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 347. (A., Dec. 1783.)

1554. — —. I am sorry to say that I see no immediate prospect of making up nine States [requisite to ratify the definitive treaty of peace with Great Britain], so careless are either the States or their delegates to their particular interests, as well as the general good which would require that they be all constantly and fully represented in Congress.—To GOVERNOR BENJ. HARRISON. FORD ED., iii, 350. (A., Dec. 1783.)

1555. — —. We have never yet had more than seven States [in attendance], and very seldom that a Maryland is scarcely ever present, and we are now without a hope of its attending till February. Consequently, having six States only, we do nothing. Expresses and letters are gone forth to hasten on the absent States, that we may have nine for a ratification of the definitive treaty. Jersey perhaps may come in, and if Beresford will not come to Congress, Congress must go to him to do this one act.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 371. (A., Jan. 1, 1784.)

1556. — —. We have but nine States present, seven of which are represented by only two members each. There are fourteen gentlemen, then, any one of whom differing from the rest, stops our proceeding on questions requiring the concurrence of nine States. * * * It is my expectation that after having tried several of these questions successively, and finding it impossible to obtain a single determination, Congress will find it necessary to adjourn till the Spring, first informing the States that they adjourn because from the inattendance of members their business cannot be done, recommending to them to instruct and enable their members to come on at the day appointed, and that they constantly keep three at least with Congress while it shall be sitting. I believe if we had thirteen States present represented by three members each, we could clear off our business in two or three months, and hereafter a session of two or three months in the year could suffice.—To GOVERNOR BENJ. HARRISON. FORD ED., iii, 379. (A., Jan. 1784.)

1557. — —. We cannot make up a Congress at all. There are eight States in town, six of which are represented by two members only. Of these, two members of different States are confined by the gout, so that we cannot make a House. We have not sat above three days, I believe, in as many weeks. Admonition after admonition has been sent to the States, to no effect. We have sent one to-day. If it fails, it seems as well we should all retire. There have never been nine States on the floor but for the ratification of the treaty [of peace with England] and a day or two after.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 399. (A., Feb. 20, 1784.)

1558. — — — We have only nine States present, eight of which are represented by two members each and, of course, on all great questions not only an unanimity of States but of members is necessary, an unanimity which can never be obtained on a matter of any importance. The consequence is that we are wasting our time and labor in vain efforts to do business. Nothing less than the presence of thirteen States, represented by an odd number of delegates, will enable us to get forward a single capital point.—To GEORGE WASHINGTON. FORD ED., iii, 420. (A., 1784.)

1559. — — — Delaware and South Carolina, we lost within these two days by the expiration of their powers. The other absent States are New York, Maryland and Georgia. We have done nothing, and can do nothing in this condition, but waste our time, temper, and spirits, in debating things for days and weeks and then losing them by the negative of one or two individuals.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 426. (A., 1784.)

1560. CONGRESS, Opportunity and.—Congress is the great commanding theatre of this nation, and the threshold to whatever department of office a man is qualified to enter.—To WILLIAM WIRT. v, 233. (W., 1808.)

1561. CONGRESS, Opposition in.—You now see the composition of our public bodies, and how essential system and plan are for conducting our affairs wisely with so bitter a party in opposition to us, who look not at all to what is best for the public, but how they may thwart whatever we may propose, though they should thereby sink their country.—To CÆSAR A. RODNEY. FORD ED., viii, 296. (W., 1804.)

1562. CONGRESS, Parliament and.—There is a difference between the British Parliament and our Congress. The former is a legislature, an inquest and a council for the king. The latter is, by the Constitution, a legislature and an inquest, but not a council.—THE ANAS. ix, 113. FORD ED., i, 190. (1792.)

1563. CONGRESS, Partisan.—I had hoped that the proceedings of this session of Congress would have rallied the great body of our citizens at once to one opinion. But the inveteracy of their quondam leaders has been able by intermingling the grossest lies and misrepresentations to check the effect in some small degree until they shall be exposed. The great sources and authors of these are in Congress. Besides the slanders in their speeches, such letters have been written to their constituents as I shall forbear to qualify by the proper terms.—To CÆSAR A. RODNEY. FORD ED., viii, 147. (W., April 1802.)

1564. — — — And what is our resource for the preservation of the Constitution? Reason and argument? You might as well reason and argue with the marble columns encircling them. The representatives chosen by ourselves? They are joined in the combination, some from incorrect views of government, some from corrupt ones, sufficient voting together to outnumber the sound parts; and with majorities only of one, two, or three, bold enough to go forward in defiance.—To W. B. GILES. vii, 427. FORD ED., x, 355. (M., 1825.)

1565. CONGRESS, The People and.—I look for our safety to the broad representation of the people [in Congress]. It will be more difficult for corrupt views to lay hold of so large a mass.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 455. (Pa., 1792.)

1566. — — — The only hope of safety hangs now on the numerous representation which is to come forward the ensuing year. Some of the new members will be, probably, either in principle or interest, with the present majority, but it is expected that the great mass will form an accession to the republican party. They will not be able to undo all which the two preceding Legislatures, and especially the first, have done. Public faith and right will oppose this. But some parts of the system may be rightfully reformed, a liberation from the rest unremittingly pursued as fast as right will permit, and the door shut in future against similar commitments of the nation.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 362. FORD ED., vi, 4. (Pa., May 1792.)

1567. CONGRESS, Power over papers.—At a meeting of the cabinet the subject [of discussion] was the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 27, to appoint a committee to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair, with power to call for such persons, papers and records as may be necessary to assist their inquiries. The President [Washington] said he had called us to consult, merely because it was the first example, and he wished that so far as it should become a precedent, it should be rightly conducted. He neither acknowledged nor denied, nor even doubted the propriety of what the House were doing, for he had not thought upon it, nor was acquainted with subjects of this kind. He could readily conceive there might be papers of so secret a nature as that they ought not to be given up. [The cabinet was not then ready to give their opinions, but another meeting was held two days later when] we had all considered and were of one mind: 1. That the House was an inquest, and, therefore, might institute inquiries. 2. That it might call for papers generally. 3. That the Executive ought to communicate such papers as the public good would permit, and ought to refuse those, the disclosure of which would injure the public. Consequently, [they] were to exercise discretion. 4. That neither the Committee nor the House had a right to call on the head of a Department, who and whose papers were under the President alone; but that the Committee should instruct their Chairman to move the House to address the President. * * * Hamilton agreed with us in all these points except as to the power of the House to call on the heads of Departments. He observed, that as to his Department, the act constituting it had made it subject to Congress in some points, but he thought himself not so far subject, as to be obliged to produce all papers they might call for. They might demand secrets of a very mischievous nature. * * * I observed here a difference between the British Parliament and our Congress, that the former was a legislature, an inquest, and a council for the King. The latter was, by the Constitution, a legislature and an inquest but not a council. [It was] finally agreed, to speak [separately] to the members of the Committee, and bring them by persuasion into the right channel. It was agreed in this case, that there was not a paper which might not be properly produced, that copies only should be sent, with an assurance, that if they should desire it, a clerk should attend with the originals to be verified by themselves.—THE ANAS. ix, 112. FORD ED., i, 189. (April 1792.)

1568. CONGRESS, Prayer in.—I enclose you (to amuse your curiosity) the form of the prayer substituted in the room of the prayer for the King by Mr. Duché, chaplain to the Congress. I think by making it so general as to take in conventions, assemblies, &c., it might be used instead of that for the Parliament.—To JOHN PAGE. FORD ED., ii, 75. (Pa., 1776.)

1569. CONGRESS, Precedence.—As the United States in Congress assembled, represent the sovereignty of the whole Union, their body collectively, and their President individually, should on all occasions have precedence of all other bodies and persons.—CONGRESS RESOLUTION. FORD ED., iii, 464. (1784?)

1570. — — — During the recess of Congress the Committee of the States, being left to pursue the same objects and under the same circumstances, their body, their members and their President, should respectively be placed on the same footing with the body, the members, and the President of Congress.—CONGRESS RESOLUTION. FORD ED., iii, 464. (April 1784?)

1571. CONGRESS, Previous question in.—I observe the House is endeavoring to remedy the eternal protraction of debate by sitting up all night, or by the use of the previous question. Both will subject them to the most serious inconvenience. The latter may be turned upon themselves by a trick of their adversaries. I have thought that such a rule as the following would be more effectual and less inconvenient: "Resolved, that at [VIII.] o'clock in the evening (whenever the House shall be in session at that hour) it shall be the duty of the Speaker to declare that hour arrived, whereupon all debate shall cease. 'f there be then before the House a main question for the reading or passing of a bill, resolution or order, such main question shall immediately be put by the Speaker, and decided by yeas and nays. If the question before the House be secondary, as for amendment, commitment, postponement, adjournment of the debate or question, laying on the table, reading papers, or a previous question, such secondary (or any other which may delay the main question) shall stand ipso facto discharged, and the main question shall then be before the House, and shall be immediately put and decided by yeas and nays. But a motion for adjournment of the House, may once and once only, take place of the main question, and if decided in the negative, the main question shall then be put as before. Should any question of order arise, it shall be decided by the Speaker instanter, and without debate or appeal; and questions of privilege arising, shall be postponed till the main question be decided. Messages from the President or Senate may be received but not acted on till after the decision of the main question. But this rule shall be suspended during the [three] last days of the session of Congress." No doubt this, on investigation, will be found to need amendment; but I think the principle of it better adapted to meet the evil than any other which has occurred to me.—To J. W. EPPES. v, 491. FORD ED., ix, 268. (M., 1810.)

1572. CONGRESS, Privilege.—Delegates to Congress ought to be invested in the place where they may be sitting with such privileges and immunities as will cover them from molestation and disturbance, and leave them in freedom and tranquillity to apply their whole time and attention to the objects of their delegation. * * * Long experience has led the civilized nations of Europe to an ascertainment of those principles and immunities, which may enable the representatives of an independent nation, exercising high functions within another, to do the same unawed and undisturbed, and, therefore, the privileges and immunities annexed by the law and usage of nations to such characters should be allowed to the Congress of the United States collectively, and to their members individually, by the laws of the States in and adjacent to which they may be sitting, and should be secured in their continuance by sufficient sanctions.—RESOLVE ON CONTINENTAL CONGRESS. FORD ED., iii, 463. (April 1784?)

1573. — — — In December, 1795, the House of Representatives committed two persons of the names of Randall and Whitney, for attempting to corrupt the integrity of certain members, which they considered as a contempt and breach of the privileges of the House; and the facts being proved. Whitney was detained in confinement a fortnight, and Randall three weeks, and was reprimanded by the Speaker. In March, 1796, the House of Representatives voted a challenge given to a member of their House, to be a breach of the privileges of the House: but satisfactory apologies and acknowledgments being made, no further proceedings were had. The editor of the Aurora having in his paper of February 19, 1800, inserted some paragraphs defamatory to the Senate, and failed in his appearance, he was ordered to be committed. In debating the legality of this order, it was insisted in support of it, that every man, by the law of nature, and every body of men, possesses the right of self-defence; that all public functionaries are essentially invested with the powers of self-preservation; that they have an inherent right to do all acts necessary to keep themselves in a condition to discharge the trusts confided to them; that whenever authorities are given, the means of carrying them into execution are given by necessary implication; that thus we see the British Parliament exercise the right of punishing contempts; all the State Legislatures exercise the same power; and every Court does the same; that if we have it not, we sit at the mercy of every intruder who may enter our doors or gallery, and by noise and tumult render proceeding in business impracticable; that if our tranquillity is to be perpetually disturbed by newspaper defamation, it will not be possible to exercise our functions with the requisite coolness and deliberation; and that we must, therefore, have a power to punish these disturbers of our peace and proceedings. To this it was answered, that the Parliament and Courts of England have cognizance of contempts by the express provisions of their law; that the State Legislatures have equal authority, because their powers are plenary; they represent their constituents completely, and possess all their powers, except such as their Constitutions have expressly denied them; that the Courts of the several States have the same powers by the laws of their States, and those of the Federal Government by the same State laws, adopted in each State by a law of Congress; that none of these bodies, therefore, derive those powers from natural or necessary right, but from express law; that Congress have no such natural or necessary power, nor any powers but such as are given them by the Constitution; that that has given them directly exemption from personal arrest, exemption from question elsewhere for what is said in the House, and power over their own members and proceedings; for these, no further law is necessary, the Constitution being the law; that, moreover, by that article of the Constitution which authorizes them "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in them," they may provide by law for an undisturbed exercise of their functions, e. g. for the punishment of contempts, of affrays, or tumults in their presence, &c.; but, till the law be made, it does not exist; and does not exist, from their own neglect; that in the meantime, however, they are not unprotected, the ordinary magistrates and courts of law being open and competent to punish all unjustifiable disturbances or defamations, and even their own sergeant, who may appoint deputies ad libitum to aid him (3 Grey, 59. 147, 255), is equal to the smallest disturbances; that, in requiring a previous law, the Constitution has regard to the inviolability of the citizen as well as of the member; as, should one House, in the regular form of a bill, aim at too broad privileges, it may be checked by the other, and both by the President; and also as, the law being promulgated, the citizen will know how to avoid offence. But, if one branch may assume its own privileges without control; if it may do it on the spur of the occasion, conceal the law in its own breast, and after the fact committed make its sentence both the law and the judgment on that fact; if the offence is to be kept undefined, and to be declared only ex re nata, and according to the passions of the moment, and there be no limitation either in the manner or measure of the punishment, the condition of the citizen will be perilous indeed. Which of these doctrines is to prevail, time will decide. Where there is no fixed law, the judgment on any particular case is the law of that single case only, and dies with it. When a new and even similar case arises, the judgment which is to make, and, at the same time, apply, the law, is open to question and consideration, as are all new laws. Perhaps Congress, in the meantime, in their care for the safety of the citizen, as well as that for their own protection, may declare by law what is necessary and proper to enable them to carry into execution the powers vested in them, and thereby hang up a rule for the inspection of all, which may direct the conduct of the citizen, and, at the same time, test the judgments they shall themselves pronounce in their own case.—PARLIAMENTARY MANUAL, ix, 9.

1574. — —. It was probably from this view* of the encroaching character of privilege, that the framers of our Constitution, in their care to provide that the laws shall bind equally on all, and especially that those who make them shall not be exempt themselves from their operation, have only privileged "Senators and Representatives" themselves from the single act of arrest in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same, and from being questioned in any other place for any speech or debate in either House.—PARLIAMENTARY MANUAL, ix, 8.

1575. — —. J. Randolph * * * used an unguarded word in his first speech [on the bill suspending intercourse with France], applying the word "ragamuffin" to the common soldiery. He took it back of his own accord, and very handsomely, the next day, when he had occasion to reply. Still, in the evening of the second day, he was jostled, and his coat pulled at the theatre by two officers of the Navy, who repeated the word "ragamuffin." His friends present supported him spiritedly, so that nothing further followed. Conceiving, and, as I think justly, that the House of Representatives (not having passed a law on the subject) could not punish the offenders, he wrote a letter to the President, who laid it before the House. * * * He has conducted himself with great propriety, and I have no doubt will come out with increase of reputation, being determined himself to oppose the interposition of the House when they have no law for it.—To MARY JEFFERSON EPPES. FORD ED., vii, 404. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

1576. CONGRESS, Public Opinion and.—I think it a duty in those entrusted with the administration of their affairs to conform themselves to the decided choice of their constituents.—To JOHN JAY. i, 404. FORD ED., iv, 89. (P., 1785.)

1577. CONGRESS, Qualifications of Members.—You ask my opinion on the question, whether the States can add any qualifications to those which the Constitution has prescribed for their members of Congress? It is a question I had never before reflected on; yet had taken up an off-hand opinion, agreeing with your first, that they could not; that to add new qualifications to those of the Constitution, would be as much an alteration as to detract from them. And so I think the House of Representatives decided in some case; I believe that of a member from Baltimore. But your letter having induced me to look into the Constitution, and to consider the question a little, I am again in your predicament, of doubting the correctness of my first opinion. Had the Constitution been silent, nobody can doubt but that the right to prescribe all the qualifications and disqualifications of those they would send to represent them, would have belonged to the State. So also the Constitution might have prescribed the whole, and excluded all others. It seems to have preferred the middle way. It has exercised the power in part, by declaring some disqualifications, to wit, those of not being twenty-five years of age, of not having been a citizen seven years, and of not being an inhabitant of the State at the time of election. But it does not declare, itself, that the member shall not be a lunatic, a pauper, a convict of treason, of murder, of felony, or other infamous crime, or a non-resident of his district; nor does it prohibit to the State the power of declaring these, or any other disqualifications which its particular circumstances may call for; and these may be different in different States. Of course, then, by the tenth amendment, the power is reserved to the State. If, wherever the Constitution assumes a single power out of many which belong to the same subject, we should consider it as assuming the whole, it would vest the General Government with a mass of power never contemplated. On the contrary, the assumption of particular powers seems an exclusion of all not assumed. This reasoning appears to me to be sound; but, on so recent a change of view, caution requires us not to be too confident, and that we admit this to be one of the doubtful questions on which honest men may differ with the purest motives; and the more readily, as we find we have differed from ourselves on it.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vi, 309. FORD ED., ix, 451. (M., 1814.)

1578. ———. I have always thought that where the line of demarcation between the powers of the General and the State governments was doubtfully or indistinctly drawn, it would be prudent and praiseworthy in both parties, never to approach it but under the most urgent necessity. Is the necessity now urgent, to declare that no non-resident of his district shall be eligible as a member of Congress? It seems to me that, in practice, the partialities of the people are a sufficient security against such an election; and that if, in any instance, they should ever choose a non-resident, it must be one of such eminent merit and qualifications, as would make it a good, rather than an evil; and that, in any event, the examples will be so rare, as never to amount to a serious evil. If the case then be neither clear nor urgent, would it not be better to let it lie undisturbed? Perhaps its decision may never be called for. But if it be indispensable to establish this disqualification now, would it not be better to declare such others, at the same time, as may be proper?—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vi, 310. FORD ED., ix, 452. (M., Jan. 1814.)

1579. CONGRESS, Reconsideration.—“How far” [you ask] “is it permitted to bring on the reconsideration of a question which Congress has once determined?” The first Congress which met, being composed mostly of persons who had been members of the legislatures of their respective States, it was natural for them to adopt those rules in their proceedings to which they had been accustomed in their legislative houses; and the more so, as there happened to be nearly the same, as having been copied from the same original, those of the British Parliament. One of these rules of proceeding was, that “a question, once determined, cannot be proposed a second time in the same session.” Congress, during the first session, in the autumn of 1774, observed this rule strictly. But before their meeting in the spring of the following year, the war had broken out. They found themselves at the head of that war, in an Executive as well as Legislative capacity. They found that a rule, wise and necessary for a legislative body, did not suit an executive one, which, being governed by events, must change their purposes, as those change. Besides, their session was likely then to become of equal duration with the war; and a rule, which should render their legislation immutable during all that period could not be submitted to. They, therefore, renounced it in practice, and have ever since continued to reconsider their questions freely. The only restraint as yet provided against the abuse of this permission to reconsider, is that when a question has been decided, it cannot be proposed for reconsideration but by some one who voted in favor of the former decision, and declares that he has since changed his opinion.—ANSWERS to M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 246. FORD ED., iv, 149. (P., 1786.)

1580. CONGRESS, Reform and.—They [new Congress] will not be able to undo all which the two preceding Legislatures, and especially the first, have done. Public faith and right will oppose this. But some parts of the system may be rightfully reformed, a liberation from the rest unremittingly pursued as fast as right will permit, and the door shut in future against similar commitments of the nation.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 362. FORD ED., vi, 4. (Pa., 1792.)

1581. — —. The representatives of the people in Congress are alone competent to judge of the general disposition of the people, and to what precise point of reformation they are ready to go.—To MR. RUTHERFORD. iii, 499. (Pa., 1792.)

1582. — —. The session of the first Congress, convened since republicanism has recovered its ascendancy, * * * will pretty completely fulfil all the desires of the people. They have reduced the army and navy to what is barely necessary. They are disarming executive patronage and preponderance, by putting down one-half the offices of the United States, which are no longer necessary. These economies have enabled them to suppress all the internal taxes, and still to make such provision for the payment of their public debt as to discharge that in eighteen years. They have lopped off a parasite limb, planted by their predecessors on their judiciary for party purposes, and they are opening the doors of hospitality to the fugitives from the oppressions of other countries.—To GENERAL KOSCUSKO. iv, 430. (W., April 1802.)

1583. CONGRESS, Republicanism and.—In the General Government, the House of Representatives is mainly republican; * * * as elected by the people directly.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vi, 607. FORD ED., x, 30. (M., 1816.)

1584. CONGRESS, Rules for.—No person to read printed papers. Every Colony present, unless divided, to be counted. No person to vote unless present when the question is put. No person to walk while the question is putting. Every person to sit while not speaking. Orders of day at 12 o'clock. Amendments first proposed to be first put. Committees or officers to be named before ballot. Call of the House every morning; absentees to be noted and returned to Convention. No members to be absent without leave of the House, or written order of Convention on pain of being returned to Convention.*—NOTES OF RULES FOR CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 60. (1776.)

1585. CONGRESS, Salaries of Members.—Our [financial] distresses ask notice [by the Virginia Legislature]. I had been from home four months, and had expended $1200 before I received one farthing. By the last post we received about seven weeks' allowance. In the meantime, some of us had had the mortification to have our horses turned out of the livery stable for want of money. There is really no standing this. The supply gives us no relief because it was mortgaged. We are trying to get something more effectual from the treasury, having sent on express to inform them of our predicament.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 404. (A., Feb. 1784.) See 1511.

1586. CONGRESS, Sessions of.—Each house of Congress possesses the natural right of governing itself, and, consequently, of fixing its own times and places of meeting, so far as it has not been abridged by the law of those who employ them, that is to say, by the Constitution.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii, 496. 1589. — —. Congress separate in two ways only, to wit, by adjournment or dissolution by the efflux of their time. What then constitutes a session with them? A dissolution certainly closes one session, and the meeting of the new Congress begins another. The Constitution authorizes the President, "on extraordinary occasions, to convene both Houses, or either of them." If convened by the President's proclamation, this must begin a new session, and of course determine the preceding one to have been a session. So, if it meets under the clause of the Constitution, which says, "the Congress shall assemble, at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day," this must begin a new session. For even if the last adjournment was to this day, the act of adjournment is merged in the higher authority of the Constitution, and the meeting will be under that, and not under their adjournment. So far we have fixed landmarks for determining sessions. In other cases, it is declared by the joint vote authorizing the President of the Senate and the Speaker to close the session on a fixed day.—PARLIAMENTARY MANUAL. ix, 79.

1590. CONGRESS, Size of.—Our present federal limits are not too large for good government, nor will the increase of votes in Congress produce any ill effect. On the contrary, it will drown the little divisions at 1591. CONGRESS, State representation in.—I am captivated by the compromise [in the Federal Constitution] of the opposite claims of the great and little States, of the latter to equal, and the former to proportional influence.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 329. FORD ED., iv, 475. (P., 1787.)

1592. CONGRESS, Stock-jobbers in.—Too many stock-jobbers and King-jobbers have come into our Legislature, or rather too many of our Legislature have become stock-jobbers and King-jobbers.—To GENERAL LAFAYETTE. iii, 450. FORD ED., vi, 78. (Pa., 1792.)

1593. ——. I told President Washington that my wish was to see both Houses of Congress cleansed of all persons interested in the bank or public stocks; and that a pure Legislature being given us, I should always be ready to acquiesce under their determinations, even if contrary to my own opinions; for that I subscribe to the principle, that the will of the majority, honestly expressed, should give law.—ANAS. ix, 131. FORD ED., i, 215. (Feb. 1793.)

1594. CONGRESS, Taxation and.—I like the power given the Legislature [in the Federal Constitution] to levy taxes, and for that reason solely approve of the greater House being chosen by the people directly. For though I think a House chosen by them will be very illy qualified to legislate for the Union, for foreign nations, &c., yet this evil does not weigh against the good of preserving inviolate the fundamental principle that the people are not to be taxed but by representatives chosen immediately by themselves.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 328. 1595. 1598. ——. I observe that the House of Representatives are sensible of the ill effects of the long speeches in their house on their proceedings. But they have a worse effect in the disgust they excite among the people, and the disposition they are producing to transfer their confidence from the Legislature to the Executive branch, which would soon sap our Constitution. These speeches, therefore, are less and less read, and if continued will soon cease to be read at all.—To JOHN WAYLES EPPES. v, 490. FORD ED., ix, 267. (M., 1810.) See DEBATE.

1599. CONGRESS, Voting in.—I am much pleased with the substitution [in the Federal Constitution] of the method of voting by persons, instead of that of voting by States.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 329. FORD ED., iv, 475. (P., 1787.)

They seemed still to be exactly where their forefathers were when they schismatized from the covenant of works, and to consider as dangerous heresies all innovations, good or bad. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 480. FORD ED., viii, 224. (W., April 1803.)

1623. CONSCIENCE, Liberty of.—It behooves every man who values liberty of conscience for himself, to resist invasions of it in the case of others; or their case may, by change of circumstances, become his own. It behooves him, too, in his own case, to give no example of concession, betraying the common right of independent opinion, by answering questions of faith, which the laws have left between God and himself.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 480. FORD ED., viii, 224. April 1803.)

1624. — —. This blessed country of free inquiry and belief has surrendered its creed and conscience to neither kings nor priests.—To DR. BENJAMIN WATERHOUSE. vii, 253. FORD ED., x, 220. (M., 1822.)

1625. CONSCIENCE, Moral laws and.—The true fountains of evidence [are] the head and heart of every rational and honest man, It is there nature has written her moral laws, and where every man may read them for himself.—FRENCH TREATIES OPINION. vii, 613. FORD ED., vi, 221. (1793.)

1626. CONSCIENCE, Office and.—If their conscience urges them [federalists] to take an active and zealous part in opposition, it ought also to urge them to retire from a post which they could not conscientiously conduct with fidelity to the trust reposed in them.—To JOHN PAGE. v, 136. FORD ED., ix, 119. (W., 1807.)

1627. CONSCIENCE, Rights of.—The error seems not sufficiently eradicated, that the operations of the mind, as well as the acts of the body, are subject to the coercion of the laws. But our rulers can have no authority over such natural rights, only as we have submitted to them. The rights of conscience we never submitted, we could not submit. We are answerable for them to our God.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 400. FORD ED., iii, 263. (1782.)

1628. — —. A right to take the side which every man's conscience approves in a civil contest is too precious a right, and too favorable to the preservation of liberty, not to be protected by all its well informed friends. The Assembly of Virginia have given sanction to this right in several of their laws, discriminating honorably those who took side against us, before the Declaration of Independence, from those who remained among us, and strove to injure us by their treacheries.—To MRS. SPROWLE. FORD ED., iv, 66. (P., 1785.)

1629. — —. No provision in our Constitution ought to be dearer to man than that which protects the rights of conscience against the enterprises of the civil authority. It has not left the religion of its citizens under the power of its public functionaries, were it possible that any of these should consider a conquest over the conscience of men either attainable or applicable to any desirable purpose.—R. To A. NEW LONDON METHODISTS. viii, 147. (1809.)

1630. — —. The restoration of the rights of conscience [in the Revised Code of Virginia] relieved the people from taxation for the support of a religion not theirs: for the [Church of England] Establishment was truly of the religion of the rich, the dissenting sects being entirely composed of the less wealthy people.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 49. FORD ED., i, 69. (1821.)

1631. CONSTANTINOPLE, The Key of Asia.—Constantinople is the Key of Asia. Who shall have it? is the question.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 267. FORD ED., iv, 444. (P., 1787.) See TURKS.

1632. CONSTITUTION, Definition of a.—A constitution, ex vi termini, means "an act above the powers of the ordinary legislature." Constitutio, constitutum, statutum, lex, are convertible terms. "Constitutio dicitur jus quod a principe conditur." Constitutum quod ab imperatoribus rescriptum statutumve est." "Statutum, idem quod lex." (Calvini Lexicon juridicum.) Constitution and statute were originally terms of the* civil law, and from thence introduced by ecclesiastics into the English law. Thus in the statute 25 Hen. viii, c. 19, § 1, "Constitutions and ordinances" are used as synonymous. The term constitution has many other significations in physics and politics; but in jurisprudence, whenever it is applied to any act of the legislature, it invariably means a statute, law, or ordinance.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 365. FORD ED., iii, 227. (1782.)

1633. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Acceptance of.—I am glad to hear that the new Constitution is received with favor. I sincerely wish that the nine first conventions may receive, and the four last reject it. The former will receive it finally, while the latter will oblige them to offer a declaration of rights in order to complete the Union. We shall thus have all its good, and cure its principal defect.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., v. 5. (P., Feb. 1788.)

1634. ——. I wish with all my soul that the nine first conventions may accept the new Constitution, because this will secure to us the good it contains which I think great and important. But I equally wish that the four latest conventions, whichever they may be, may refuse to accede to it till a declaration of rights be annexed. This would probably command the offer of such a declaration, and thus give to the whole fabric, perhaps, as much perfection as any one of that kind ever had.—To A. DONALD. ii, 355. (P., Feb. 1788.)

1635. ——. I am glad to hear that our new Constitution is pretty sure of being accepted by States enough to secure the good it contains, and to meet such opposition in some others as to give us hopes it will be accommodated to them by the amendment of its most glaring faults, particularly the want of a declaration of rights.—To WILLIAM RUTLEDGE. ii, 350. FORD ED., v. 4. (P., Feb. 1788.)

1636. ——. I learn with great pleasure the progress of the new Constitution. Indeed I have presumed it would gain on the public mind, as I confess it has on my own. At first, though I saw that the great mass and groundwork were good, I disliked many appendages. Reflection and discussion have cleared off most of these.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 404. FORD ED., v. 19. (P., May 1788.)

1637. ——. My first wish was that nine States would adopt it in order to ensure what was good in it, and that the others might, by holding off, produce the necessary amendments. But the plan of Massachusetts is far preferable, and will, I hope, be followed by those who are yet to decide.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 404. FORD ED., v. 20. (P., May 1788.)

1638. ——. It will be easier to get the assent of nine States to correct what is wrong in the way pointed out by the Constitution itself, than to get thirteen to concur in a new convention and another plan of confederation. I therefore sincerely pray that the remaining States may accept it, as Massachusetts has done, with standing instructions to their delegates to press for amendments till they are obtained. They cannot fail of being obtained when the delegates of eight States shall be under such perpetual instructions.—To T. LEE SHIPPEN. ii, 415. (P., June 1788.)

ing, religion and monopolies.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 445. FORD ED., v. 45. (P., July 1788.)

1640. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Action by the States.—With respect to the new government, nine or ten States will probably have accepted by the end of this month. The others may oppose it. Virginia, I think, will be of this number. Besides other objections of less moment, she will insist on annexing a bill of rights to the new Constitution, i. e. a bill wherein the government shall declare that, 1. Religion shall be free. 2. Printing presses free. 3. Trials by jury preserved in all cases. 4. No monopolies in commerce. 5. No standing army. Upon receiving this bill of rights, she will probably depart from her other objections, and the bill is so much to the interest of all the States, that I presume they will offer it, and thus our Constitution be amended, and our Union closed by the end of the present year. In this way, there will have been opposition enough to do good, and not enough to do harm.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. ii, 356. (P., Feb. 1788.)

1641. ——. At first, I wished that when nine States should have accepted the Constitution, so as to ensure us what is good in it, the other four might hold off till the want of the bill of rights, at least, might be supplied. But I am now convinced that the plan of Massachusetts is the better, that is, to accept, and to amend afterwards. If the States which were to decide after her, should all do the same, it is impossible but they must obtain the essential amendments. It will be more difficult if we lose this instrument, to recover what is good in it, than to correct what is bad, after we shall have adopted it. It has, therefore, my hearty prayers.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 399. FORD ED., v. 25. (P., May 1788.)

1642. ——. The conduct of Massachusetts has been noble. She accepted the Constitution, but voted that it should stand as a perpetual instruction to her delegates, to endeavor to obtain such and such reformatations; and the minority, though very strong both in numbers and abilities, declared virutim and seriatim, that acknowledging the principle that the majority must give the law, they would now support the new Constitution with their tongues, and with their blood, if necessary.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 398. FORD ED., v. 24. (P., 1788.)

1643. ——. I congratulate you on the accession of your State [South Carolina] to the new Federal Constitution. I expect to hear daily that my own has followed the good example. Our government needed bracing. Still, we must take care not to run from one extreme to another; not to brace too high.—To E. RUTLEDGE. ii, 435. FORD ED., v. 41. (P., July 1788.)

1644. ——. In New York, two-thirds of the State were against it [the new Constitution], and certainly, if they had been called to the decision in any other stage of the business, they would have rejected it; but before they put it to the vote, they would certainly have heard that eleven States had joined in it, and they would find it safer to go with those eleven, than put themselves into opposition, with Rhode Island only.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 465. (P., Aug. 1788.)

1645. ——. No news from North Carolina; but in such a case no news is good news, as an unfavorable decision of the 12th State would have flown like an electrical shock through America and Europe.—To MR. SHIPPEN. ii, 484. (P., Sep. 1788.)

1646. ——. I have seen with infinite pleasure our new Constitution accepted by eleven States, not rejected by the twelfth; and that the thirteenth happens to be a State of the least importance. It is true, that the minorities in most of the accepting States have been very respectable; so much so as to render it prudent, were it not otherwise reasonable, to make some sacrifice to them. I am in hopes that the annexation of a bill of rights to the Constitution will alone draw over so great a proportion of the minorities, as to leave little danger in the opposition of the residue; and that this annexation may be made by Congress and the Assemblies, without calling a convention which might endanger the most valuable parts of the system.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 56. (P., Dec. 1788.)

1647. ——. The Virginia Assembly, furiously anti-federal, have passed a bill rendering every person holding any Federal office incapable of holding at the same time any State office. This is a declaration of war against the new Constitution.—To WILLIAM SHORT. ii, 576. (P., Feb. 1789.)

1648. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Adopt and amend.—Were I in America, I would advocate it warmly till nine [States] should have adopted and then as warmly take the other side to convince the remaining four that they ought not to come into it till the declaration of rights is annexed to it. By this means we should secure all the good of it, and procure so respectable an opposition as would induce the accepting States to offer a bill of rights. This would be the happiest turn the thing could take.—To WILLIAM STEPHENS SMITH. FORD ED., v, 2. (P., Feb. 1788.)

1649. ——. Under this hope [that the necessary amendments will be made] I look forward to the general adoption of the new Constitution with anxiety, as necessary for us under our present circumstances.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 375. FORD ED., v, 8. (P., May 1788.)

1650. ——. I see in this instrument a great deal of good. The consolidation of our government, a just representation, an administration of some permanence, and other features of great value will be gained by it. There are, indeed, some faults which revolted me a good deal in the first moment; but we must be contented to travel on towards perfection, step by step. We must be contented with the ground which this Constitution will gain for us, and hope that a favorable moment will come for correcting what is amiss in it.—To COMTE DE MOUSTIER. ii, 388. FORD ED., v, 11. (P., May 1788.)

1651. ——. I should deprecate with you, indeed, the meeting of a new convention. I hope they will adopt the mode of amendment by Congress and the Assemblies, in which case I should not fear any dangerous innovation in the plan. But the minorities are too respectable not to be entitled to some sacrifice of opinion in the majority; especially, when a great proportion of them would be contented with a bill of rights.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 506. FORD ED., v, 53. (P., Nov. 1788.)

1652. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Amendments to.—We must be contented to accept of its good, and to cure what is evil in it hereafter. It seems necessary for our happiness at home; I am sure it is so for our respectability abroad.—To JOHN BROWN. ii, 397. FORD ED., v, 19. (P., May 1788.)

1653. ——. There are two amendments only which I am anxious for: 1. A bill of rights, which it is so much the interest of all to have, that I conceive it must be yielded. The first amendment proposed by Massachusetts* will in some degree answer this end, but not so well. It will do too much in some instances, and too little in others. It will cripple the Federal Government in some cases where it ought to be free, and not restrain it in some others where restraint would be right. The 2d amendment which appears to me essential is the restoring the principle of necessary rotation, particularly to the Senate and Presidency, but most of all to the last. * * * Of the correction of this article, however, I entertain no present hope, because I find it has scarcely excited an objection in America. And if it does not take place ere long, it assuredly never will.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 404. FORD ED., v, 20. (P., May 1788.)

1654. ——. Though I approve of the mass, I would wish to see some amendments, further than those which have been proposed, fixing it more surely on a republican basis. * * * To secure the ground we gain, and gain what more we can, is the wisest course.—To GEORGE MASON. iii, 147. FORD ED., v, 183. (N.Y., 1790.)

1655. ——. It is too early to think of a declaratory act as yet, but the time is approaching and not distant. Two elections more will give us a solid majority in the House of Representatives, and a sufficient one in the Senate. As soon as it can be depended on, we must have "A Declaration of the Principles of the Constitution," in nature of a Declaration of Rights, in all the points in which it has been violated.—To P. N. NICHOLAS. iv, 327. FORD ED., vii, 439. (Pa., April 1800.)

* The 1st amendment of Massachusetts was: "That it explicitly declare that all powers, not expressly delegated by the aforesaid Constitution, are reserved to the several States, to be by them exercised."—EDITOR.

1856. ——. How the good [in the new Constitution] should be secured and the ill brought to right was the difficulty. To refer it back to a new Convention might endanger the loss of the whole. My first idea was that the nine States, first acting, should accept it unconditionally, and thus secure what in it was good and that the four last should accept on the previous condition, that certain amendments should be agreed to; but a better course was devised of accepting the whole and trusting that the good sense and honest intentions of our citizens would make the alterations which should be deemed necessary. Accordingly, all accepted, six without objection and seven with recommendations of specified amendments.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 79. FORD ED., i, 109. (1821.)

1857. ——. Let us go on perfecting the Constitution by adding, by way of amendment, those forms which time and trial show are still wanting.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 506. FORD ED., viii, 248. (M., 1803.)

1858. ——. The States are now so numerous that I despair of ever seeing another amendment to the Constitution, although the innovations of time will certainly call, and now already call, for some.—To GEORGE HAY. FORD ED., x, 265. (M., 1823.)

1859. ——. Those who formerly usurped the name of federalists, which in fact, they never were, have now openly abandoned it, and are as openly marching by the road of construction, in a direct line to that consolidation which was always their real object. They, almost to a man, are in possession of one branch of the government, and appear to be very strong in yours. The three great questions of amendment now before you, will give the measure of their strength. I mean, 1st, the limitation of the term of the Presidential service; 2nd, the placing the choice of President effectually in the hands of the people; 3rd, the giving to Congress the power of internal improvement, on condition that each State's federal proportion of the moneys so expended shall be employed within the State. The friends of consolidation would rather take these powers by construction than accept them by direct investiture of the States. Yet, as to internal improvement particularly, there is probably not a State in the Union which would not grant the power on the condition proposed, or which would grant it without that. * * * If I can see these three great amendments prevail, I shall consider it as a renewed extension of the term of our lease, shall live in more confidence and die in more hope.—To ROBERT J. GARNETT. vii, 336. FORD ED., x, 294. (M., Feb. 1824.)

1860. ——. The real friends of the Constitution in its federal form, if they wish it to be immortal, should be attentive, by amendments, to make it keep pace with the advance of the age in science and experience. Instead of this, the European governments have resisted reformation, until the people, seeing no other resource, undertake it themselves by force, their only weapon, and work it out through blood, desolation and long-continued anarchy. Here it will be by large fragments breaking off, and refusing reunion, but on condition of amendment, or perhaps permanently.—To ROBERT J. GARNETT. vii, 336. FORD ED., x, 295. (M., 1824.)

1861. ——. I have read with pleasure and satisfaction the very able and eloquent speech you have been so kind as to send me on the amendment of the Constitution, proposed by Mr. McDuffie, and concur with much of its contents.—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 437. FORD ED., x, 385. (M., April 1826.)

1862. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Approval of.—I like much the general idea of framing a government which should go on of itself, peaceably, without needing continual recurrence to the State Legislatures. I like the organization of the government into Legislative, Judiciary and Executive. I like the power given the Legislature to levy taxes, and for that reason solely, I approve of the greater House being chosen by the people directly. For though I think a House chosen by them will be very illy qualified to legislate for the Union, for foreign nations, &c., yet this evil does not weigh against the good of preserving inviolate the fundamental principle that the people are not to be taxed but by representatives chosen immediately by themselves. I am captivated by the compromise of the opposite claims of the great and little States, of the latter to equal, and the former to proportional influence. I am much pleased, too, with the substitution of the method of voting by persons instead of that of voting by States; and I like the negative given to the Executive, conjointly with a third of either House; although I should have liked it better, had the Judiciary been associated for that purpose, or invested separately with a similar power. There are other good things of less moment.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 328. FORD ED., iv, 475. (P., Dec. 20, 1787.)

1863. ——. It is a good canvas, on which some strokes only want retouching.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 445. FORD ED., v, 45. (P., July 1788.)

1864. ——. I approved, from the first moment, of the great mass of what is in the new Constitution; the consolidation of the government; the organization into Executive, Legislative, and Judiciary; the subdivision of the Legislative; the happy compromise of interests between the great and little States, by the different manner of voting in the different Houses; the voting by persons instead of States; the qualified negative on laws given to the Executive, which, however, I should have liked better if associated with the Judiciary also as in New York; and the power of taxation. I thought at first that the latter might have been limited. A little reflection soon convinced me it ought not to be.—To F. HOPKINSON. ii, 586. FORD ED., v, 76. (P., March 1789.)

1665. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Compromises of.—The Constitution was a matter of compromise; a capitulation between conflicting interests and opinions.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 37. FORD ED., x, 46. (M., 1816.)

— CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Construction and.—See CENTRALIZATION.

1666. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Construction of.—I told the President [Washington] * * * that they [the Hamilton members of the Legislature] had chained it [the Treasury system] about our necks for a great length of time, and, in order to keep the game in their hands had, from time to time, aided in making such legislative constructions of the Constitution, as made it a very different thing from what the people thought they had submitted to.—THE ANAS. ix, 104. FORD ED., i, 177. (Feb. 1792.)

1667. ——. Our peculiar security is in the possession of a written Constitution. Let us not make it a blank paper by construction. I say the same as to the opinion of those who consider the grant of the treaty-making power as boundless. If it is, then we have no Constitution. If it has bounds, they can be no others than the definitions of the powers which that instrument gives. It specifies and delineates the operations permitted to the Federal Government, and gives all the powers necessary to carry these into execution. Whatever of these enumerated objects is proper for a law, Congress may make the law; whatever is proper to be executed by way of a treaty, the President and Senate may enter into the treaty; whatever is to be done by a judicial sentence, the Judges may pass the sentence. Nothing is more likely than that their enumeration of powers is defective. This is the ordinary case of all human works. Let us then go on perfecting it, by adding, by way of amendment to the Constitution those powers which time and trial show are still wanting.—TO WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 505. FORD ED., viii, 247. (M., Sep. 1803.)

1668. ——. When an instrument admits two constructions, the one safe the other dangerous; the one precise, the other indefinite, I prefer that which is safe and precise. I had rather ask an enlargement of power from the nation, where it is found necessary, than to assume it by a construction which would make our powers boundless.—TO WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 506. FORD ED., viii, 247. (M., 1803.)

1669. ——. Strained constructions * * * loosen all the bands of the Constitution.—TO GEORGE TICKNOR. FORD ED., x, 81. (1817.)

1670. ——. In denying the right they [the Supreme Court] usurp of exclusively explaining the Constitution, I go further than you do, if I understand rightly your quotation from the Federalist, of an opinion that

"the judiciary is the last resort in relation to the other departments of the government, but not in relation to the rights of the parties to the compact under which the judiciary is derived." If this opinion be sound, then indeed is our Constitution a complete felo de se. For intending to establish three departments, co-ordinate and independent, that they might check and balance one another, it has given, according to this opinion, to one of them alone, the right to prescribe rules for the government of the others, and to that one, too, which is unelected by and independent of the nation. For experience has already shown that the impeachment it has provided is not even a scare-crow; that such opinions as the one you combat, sent cautiously out, as you observe also, by detachment, not belonging to the case often, but sought for out of it, as if to rally the public opinion beforehand to their views, and to indicate the line they are to walk in, have been so quietly passed over as never to have excited animadversion, even in a speech of any one of the body entrusted with impeachment. The Constitution, on this hypothesis, is a mere thing of wax in the hands of the judiciary, which they may twist and shape into any form they please. * * * My construction of the Constitution is very different from that you quote. It is that each department is truly independent of the others, and has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the Constitution in the cases submitted to its action; and especially, where it is to act ultimately and without appeal.—TO SPENCER ROANE. vii, 134. FORD ED., x, 140. (P.F., 1819.)

1671. ——. Each of the three departments has equally the right to decide for itself what is its duty under the Constitution, without any regard to what the others may have decided for themselves under a similar question.—TO SPENCER ROANE. vii, 136. FORD ED., x, 142. (P.F., 1819.)

1672. ——. My construction of the Constitution is * * * that each department is truly independent of the others, and has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the Constitution in the cases submitted to its action; and especially, where it is to act ultimately and without appeal. I will explain myself by examples, which, having occurred while I was in office, are better known to me, and the principles which governed them. A Legislature had passed the Sedition law. The Federal courts had subjected certain individuals to its penalties of fine and imprisonment. On coming into office, I released these individuals by the power of pardon committed to executive discretion, which could never be more properly exercised than where citizens were suffering without the authority of law, or, which was equivalent, under a law unauthorized by the Constitution, and therefore null. In the case of Marbury vs. Madison, the Federal judges declared that commissions, signed and sealed by the President, were valid, although not delivered. I deemed delivery essential to complete a deed, which, as long as it remains in the hands of the party, is as yet no deed, it is in posse only, but not in esse, and I withheld delivery of the commissions. They cannot issue a mandamus to the President or Legislature, or to any of their officers.* When the British treaty of — arrived, without any provision against the impressment of our seamen, I determined not to ratify it. The Senate thought I should ask their advice. I thought that would be a mockery of them, when I was predetermined against following it, should they advise its ratification. The Constitution had made their advice necessary to confirm a treaty, but not to reject it. This has been blamed by some; but I have never doubted its soundness. In the cases of two persons, antennati, under exactly similar circumstances, the Federal court had determined that one of them (Duane) was not a citizen; the House of Representatives nevertheless determined that the other (Smith, of South Carolina) was a citizen, and admitted him to his seat in their body. Duane was a republican, and Smith a federalist, and these decisions were made during the federal ascendancy. These are examples of my position, that each of the three departments has equally the right to decide for itself what is its duty under the Constitution, without any regard to what the others may have decided for themselves under a similar question.—To SPENCER ROANE vii, 135. FORD ED., x, 141. (P.F., 1819.)

1673. —. The judges are practicing on the Constitution by inferences, analogies, and sophisms, as they would on an ordinary law. They do not seem aware that it is not even a constitution, formed by a single authority, and subject to a single superintendence and control; but that it is a compact of many independent powers, every single one of which claims an equal right to understand it, and to require its observance. However strong the cord of compact may be, there is a point of tension at which it will break. A few such doctrinal decisions, as barefaced as that of the Cohens, happening to bear immediately on two or three of the large States, may induce them to join in arresting the march of government, and in arousing the co-States to pay some attention to what is passing, to bring back the compact to its original principles, or to modify it legitimately by the express consent of the parties themselves, and not by the usurpation of their created agents. They imagine they can lead us into a consolidate government, while their road leads directly to its dissolution.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 403. (M., 1825.) See 1684.

1674. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Disapproval of.—How do you like our new Constitution? I confess there are things in it which stagger all my dispositions to subscribe to what such an assembly has proposed.

* Jefferson adds this note: "The Constitution controlling the common law in this particular."—EDITOR.

The House of Federal representatives will not be adequate to the management of affairs, either foreign or federal. Their President seems a bad edition of a Polish king. He may be elected from four years to four years for life. Reason and experience prove to us that a chief magistrate, so continuable, is an officer for life. When one or two generations shall have proved that this is an office for life, it becomes on every occasion worthy of intrigue, of bribery, of force, and even of foreign interference. It will be of great consequence to France and England to have America governed by a Galloman, or an Angloman. Once in office, and possessing the military force of the Union, without the aid or check of a council, he would not be easily dethroned even if the people could be induced to withdraw their votes from him. I wish that at the end of four years they had made him forever ineligible a second time. Indeed, I think all the good of this new Constitution might have been couched in three or four new articles, to be added to the good, old and venerable fabric, which should have been preserved even as a religious relique.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 316. (P., Nov. 13, 1789.)

1675. —. There are very good articles in it, and very bad. I do not know which preponderate.—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 318. FORD ED., iv, 466. (P., Nov. 1789.)

1676. —. I dislike, and greatly dislike, the abandonment in every instance, of the necessity of rotation in office, and most particularly in the case of the President. Experience concurs with reason in concluding that the first magistrate will always be re-elected, if the Constitution permits it. He is then an officer for life. This once observed, it becomes of so much consequence to certain nations to have a friend or a foe at the head of our affairs, that they will interfere with money and with arms. A Galloman, or an Angloman will be supported by the nation he befriends. If once elected, and at a second or third election outvoted by one or two votes, he will pretend false votes, foul play, hold possession of the reins of government, be supported by the States voting for him, especially if they are the central ones, lying in a compact body themselves, and separating their opponents; and they will be aided by one nation of Europe, while the majority are aided by another. The election of a President of America, some years hence will be much more interesting to certain nations of Europe than ever the election of a King of Poland was. Reflect on all the instances in history, ancient and modern, of elective monarchies, and say if they do not give foundation for my fears. The Roman Emperors, the Popes, while they were of any importance; the German Emperors, till they became hereditary in practice; the Kings of Poland; the Deys of the Ottoman Dependencies. It may be said that if elections are to be attended with these disorders, the seldomer they are renewed the better. But experience shows that the only way to prevent disorder is to render them uninteresting by frequent changes. An incapacity to be elected a second time would have been the only effectual preventive. The power of removing him every fourth year by the vote of the people, is a power which will not be exercised. The King of Poland is removable every day by the Diet, yet he is never removed. Smaller objections are, the appeal in fact as well as law, and the binding all persons, legislative, executive, and judiciary by oath to maintain that Constitution. I do not pretend to decide what would be the best method of procuring the establishment of the manifold good things in this Constitution, and of getting rid of the bad. Whether by adopting it, in hopes of future amendment; or after it has been duly weighed and canvassed by the people, after seeing the parts they generally dislike, and those they generally approve, to say to them: "We see now what you wish. Send together your deputies again, let them frame a constitution for you, omitting what you have condemned, and establishing the powers you approve. Even these will be a great addition to the energy of your government." At all events, I hope you will not be discouraged from other trials, if the present one should fail of its full effect. I have thus told you freely what I like and dislike; merely as a matter of curiosity, for I know your own judgment has been formed on all these points after having heard everything which could be urged on them. * * * After all, it is my principle that the will of the majority should always prevail. If they approve the proposed convention in all its parts, I shall concur in it cheerfully, in hopes that they will amend it whenever they shall find it works wrong.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 330. FORD ED., iv, 477. (P., December 20, 1787.)

1677. — —. As to the new Constitution, I find myself nearly a neutral. There is a great mass of good in it, in a very desirable form; but there is also to me a bitter pill or two.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 334. FORD ED., iv, 481. (P., Dec. 1787.)

1678. — —. I was much pleased with many and essential parts of this instrument from the beginning. But I thought I saw in it many faults, great and small. What I have read and reflected has brought me over from several of my objections of the first moment, and to acquiesce under some others. Two only remain of essential consideration, to wit, the want of a bill of rights, and the expunging the principle of necessary rotation in the offices of President and Senator.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 398. FORD ED., v, 25. (P., May 1788.)

terminable by the laws of the land. I disapproved, also, the perpetual re-eligibility of the President. To these points of disapprobation I adhere. My first wish was that the nine first conventions might accept the Constitution, as the means of securing to us the great mass of good it contained; and that the four last might reject it, as the means of obtaining amendments. But I was corrected in this wish the moment I saw the much better plan of Massachusetts, and which had never occurred to me. With respect to the declaration of rights, I suppose the majority of the United States are of my opinion; for, I apprehend, all the anti-federalists, and a very respectable proportion of the federalists, think that such a declaration should now be annexed. The enlightened part of Europe have given us the greatest credit for inventing this instrument of security for the rights of the people, and have not been a little surprised to see us so soon give it up. With respect to the re-eligibility of the President, I find myself differing from the majority of my countrymen; for I think there are but three States out of the eleven which have desired an alteration of this. And, indeed, since the thing is established, I would wish it not to be altered during the life of our great leader, whose executive talents are superior to those I believe, of any man in the world, and who, alone, by the authority of his name, and the confidence reposed in his perfect integrity, is fully qualified to put the new government so under way, as to secure it against the efforts of opposition. But, having derived from our error all the good there was in it, I hope we shall correct it, the moment we can no longer have the same name at the helm. * * * These, my opinions, I wrote within a few hours after I had read the Constitution, to one or two friends in America.—To F. HOPKINSON. ii, 586. FORD ED., v, 76. (P., March 1789.)

1680. — —. I received a copy [of the new Federal Constitution] early in November [1787] and read and contemplated its provisions with great satisfaction. As not a member of the Convention, however, nor probably a single citizen of the Union had approved it in all its parts, so I, too, found articles which I thought objectionable. The absence of express declarations ensuring freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of the person under the uninterrupted protection of the habeas corpus, and trial by jury in civil as well as in criminal cases excited my jealousy; and the re-eligibility of the President for life I quite disapproved. I expressed freely in letters to my friends and most particularly to Mr Madison and General Washington my approbations and objections.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 79. FORD ED., i, 108. (1821.)

1. The first step in the process of the investigation is the identification of the problem. This is done by the investigator who is responsible for the study. The investigator must first identify the problem that is being studied. This is done by the investigator who is responsible for the study. The investigator must first identify the problem that is being studied.

The first of these is the fact that the Journal of the American Medical Association has been the only one of the major medical journals to publish a special section on the topic of "The Role of the Physician in the Community."
 This section, which is published

1981, CONSTITUTIONAL FOUNDATION OF THE the Constitution of the United States

That "all powers not delegated to the United States, by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people." [XIIth Amendment.] To take a single step beyond the boundaries thus specifically drawn around the powers of Congress, is to take possession of a boundless field of power, no longer susceptible of any definition.—NATIONAL BANK OPINION. vii, 556. FORD ED., v, 285. (1791.)

— CONSTITUTION (The Federal), General Welfare clause of.—See GENERAL WELFARE CLAUSE.

1682. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Infractions of.—If on [one] infraction [of the Constitution] we build a second, on that second a third, &c., any one of the powers in the Constitution may be made to comprehend every power of government.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 450. FORD ED., viii, 175. (1802.)

1683. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Intention of.—We ought always to presume that the real intention [of the Constitution] which is alone consistent with the Constitution.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 449. FORD ED., viii, 174. ((1802.)) — CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Internal Improvements and.—See INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

1684. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Interpretation of.—Where a phrase is susceptible of two meanings, we ought certainly to adopt that which will bring upon us the fewest inconveniences.—OPINION ON APPORTIONMENT BILL. vii, 599. FORD ED., v, 498. (1792.)

1685. — — —. The Constitution * * * was meant to be republican, and we believe it to be republican according to every candid interpretation. Yet we have seen it so interpreted and administered, as to be truly what the French have called, a monarchie masquée.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 338. FORD ED., vii, 464. (W., Dec. 1800.)

1686. — — —. The Constitution on which our Union rests, shall be administered by me according to the safe and honest meaning contemplated by the plain understanding of the people of the United States, at the time of its adoption,—a meaning to be found in the explanations of those who advocated, not those who opposed it, and who opposed it merely lest the construction should be applied which they denounced as possible.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iv, 387. (W., March 1801.)

1687. — — —. The Constitution is a compact of many independent powers, every single one of which claims an equal right to understand it, and to require its observance.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 404. (M., 1825.)

1688. — — —. The Constitution of the United States is a compact of independent nations, subject to the rules acknowledged in similar cases, as well that of amendment provided within itself, as, in case of abuse, the justly dreaded but unavoidable ultima ratio gentium.—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 437. FORD ED., x, 385. (M., 1826.)

1689. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Jefferson and.—One passage in the paper you enclosed me must be corrected. It is the following: "And all say it was yourself more than any other individual that planned and established the Constitution." I was in Europe when the Constitution was planned, and never saw it till after it was established. On receiving it, I wrote strongly to Mr. Madison, urging the want of provision for the freedom of religion, freedom of the press, trial by jury, habeas corpus, and substitution of militia for a standing army, and an express reservation to the State of all rights not specifically granted to the Union. He accordingly moved in the first session of Congress for these amendments, which were agreed to and ratified by the States as they now stand. This is all the hand I had in what related to the Constitution.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 441. FORD ED., viii, 159. (W., 1802.)

1690. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Jurisdiction of.—It may be impracticable to lay down any general formula of words which shall decide at once and with precision in every case, this limit of jurisdiction. But there are two canons which will guide us safely in most of the cases. 1st. The capital and leading object of the Constitution was to leave with the States all authorities which respected their own citizens only, and to transfer to the United States those which respected citizens of foreign or other States; to make us several as to ourselves, but one as to all others. In the latter case, then, constructions should lean to the general jurisdiction, if the words will bear it, and in favor of the States in the former, if possible to be so construed. And, indeed, between citizens and citizens of the same State and under their own laws, I know but a single case in which a jurisdiction is given to the General Government. That is where anything but gold or silver is made a lawful tender, or the obligation of contracts is any otherwise impaired. The separate legislatures had so often abused that power that the citizens themselves chose to trust it to the general rather than to their own special authorities. 2d. On every question of construction, carry ourselves back to the time when the Constitution was adopted, recollect the spirit manifested in the debates, and instead of trying what meaning may be squeezed out of the text, or invented against it, conform to the probable one in which it was passed.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 296. FORD ED., x, 230. (M., 1823.)

1691. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Model for France.—Ours [Constitution] has been professedly their model, in which such changes are made as a difference of circumstances rendered necessary, and some others neither necessary nor advantageous, but into which men will ever run, when versed in theory and new in the practice of the government, when acquainted with man only as they see him in their books, and not in the world.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 98. FORD ED., v, 109. (P., Aug. 1789.)

1692. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Monarchizing.—I am opposed to the monarchizing its features by the forms of its administration, with a view to conciliate a first transition to a President and Senate for life, and from that to an hereditary tenure of these offices, and thus to worm out the elective principle.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.)

1693. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Necessity for.—Our new Constitution has succeeded beyond what I apprehended it would have done. I did not at first believe that eleven States out of thirteen would have consented to a plan consolidating themselves as much into one. A change in their dispositions, which had taken place since I left them, had rendered this consolidation necessary, that is to say, had called for a federal government which could walk upon its own legs, without leaning for support on the State Legislatures. A sense of necessity, and a submission to it, is to me a new and consolatory proof that whenever the people are well-informed, they can be trusted with their own government; that whenever things get so far wrong as to attract their notice, they may be relied on to set them to rights.—To DR. PRICE. ii, 553. (P., 1789.) See 1648.

1694. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Preservation of.—The preservation of the Federal Constitution is all we need contend for.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 314. FORD ED., v, 409. (Pa., 1791.)

1695. — — —. The preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad, I deem [one of] the essential principles of our government, and consequently [one of] those which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 4. (1801.)

1696. — — —. I do, with sincere zeal, wish an inviolable preservation of our present Federal Constitution according to the true sense in which it was adopted by the States; that in which it was advocated by its friends, and not that which its enemies apprehended, who therefore became its enemies.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.)

1697. — — —. May you and your contemporaries meet them [attacks on the Constitution] with the same determination and effect, as your father and his did the Alien and Sedition laws, and preserve inviolate a constitution, which, cherished in all its chastity and purity, will prove in the end a blessing to all the nations of the earth.—To MR. NICHOLAS. vii, 230. (M., 1821.)

1698. — — —. To preserve the republican forms and principles of our Constitution, and cleave to the salutary distribution of powers which that has established, * * * are the two sheet anchors of our Union. If driven from either we shall be in danger of foundering.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 298. FORD ED., x, 232. (M., 1823.)

1699. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Principles of.—The principle of the Constitution is that of a separation of Legislative, Executive and Judiciary functions, except in cases specified. If this principle be not expressed in direct terms, it is clearly the spirit of the Constitution, and it ought to be so commented and acted on by every friend of free government.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 161. FORD ED., vii, 108. (M., Jan. 1797.)

1700. — — —. The leading principle of our Constitution is the independence of the Legislative, Executive and Judiciary of one another.—To GEORGE HAY. v, 103. FORD ED., ix, 60. (W., 1807.)

1701. — — —. The adored principles of our Constitution.—To JEDEDIAH MORSE. vii, 235. FORD ED., x, 205. (M., 1822.)

1702. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Republican opposition to.—Our first federal constitution, or Confederation, as it was called, was framed in the first moments of our separation from England, in the highest point of our jealousies of independence as to her, and as to each other. It formed, therefore, too weak a bond to produce a union of action as to foreign nations. This appeared at once on the establishment of peace, when the pressure of a common enemy which had hooped us together during the war, was taken away. Congress was found to be quite unable to point the action of the several States to a common object. A general desire, therefore, took place of amending the federal constitution. This was opposed by some of those who wished for monarchy, to wit, the refugees, now returned; the old tories, and the timid whigs who prefer tranquillity to freedom, hoping monarchy might be the remedy if a state of complete anarchy could be brought on. A convention, however, being decided on, some of the monarchs got elected, with a hope of introducing an English constitution, when they found that the great body of the delegates were strongly for adhering to republicanism, and for giving due strength to their government under that form, they then directed their efforts to the assimilation of all the parts of the new government to the English constitution as nearly as was attainable. In this they were not altogether without success; inasmuch that the monarchical features of the new Constitution produced a violent opposition to it from the most zealous republicans in the several States. For this reason, and because they also thought it carried the principle of a consolidation of the States farther than was requisite for the purpose of producing a union of action as to foreign powers, it is still doubted by some whether a majority of the people of the United States were not against adopting it. However it was carried through all the assemblies of the States, though by very small majorities in the larger States.—To C. D. EBELING. FORD ED., vii, 45. (1795.)

1703. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Reverence for.—With the House of Representatives of Vermont I join cordially in admiring and revering the Constitution of the United States,—the result of the collected wisdom of our country.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iv, 418. (W., 1801.)

1704. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Safety in.—Our national Constitution, the ark of our safety, and grand palladium of our peace and happiness.—R. to A. MASSACHUSETTS CITIZENS. viii, 160. (1800.)

1705. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Security in.—A constitution has been acquired, which, though neither of us thinks perfect, yet both consider as competent to render our fellow citizens the happiest and the securest on whom the sun has ever shone.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 227. FORD ED., ix, 429. (M., 1813.)

1706. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Self-government and.—No constitution was ever before so well calculated as ours for extensive empire and self-government.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 444. (M., April 1809.)

1707. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Theory of.—The true theory of our Constitution is surely the wisest and best, that the States are independent as to everything within themselves, and united as to everything respecting foreign affairs. Let the General Government be reduced to foreign concerns only, and let our affairs be disentangled from those of all other nations, except as to commerce, which the merchants will manage the better, the more they are left free to manage for themselves, and our General Government may be reduced to a very simple organization, and a very inexpensive one; a few plain duties to be performed by a few servants.—To GIDEON GRANGER. iv, 331. FORD ED., vii, 451. (M., 1800.)

1708. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Value of.—Much has been gained by the new Constitution; for the former was terminating in anarchy, as necessarily consequent to inefficiency.—To GEORGE MASON. iii, 148. FORD ED., v, 183. (N.Y., 1790.)

1709. CONSTITUTION (The Federal), Wisdom of.—The Constitution * * * is unquestionably the wisest ever yet presented to men, and some of the accommodations of interest which it has adopted are greatly pleasing to me, who have had occasions of seeing how difficult those interests were to accommodate.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 12. FORD ED., v, 80. (P., March 1789.)

1710. CONSTITUTION (French), Advice of Jefferson on.—I wish you success in your meeting [of the Notables]. I should form better hopes of it, if it were divided into two houses instead of seven. Keeping the good model of your neighboring country [England] before your eyes, you may get on, step by step, towards a good constitution. Though that model is not perfect, yet, as it would unite more suffrages than any new one which could be proposed, it is better to make that the object. If every advance is to be purchased by filling the royal coffers with gold, it will be gold well employed.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. ii, 131. (P., 1787.)

1711. CONSTITUTION (French), Amelioration of.—If the Etats Generaux, when they assemble, do not aim at too much, they may begin a good constitution. There are three articles which they may easily obtain; 1, their own meeting, periodically; 2, the exclusive right of taxation; 3, the right of registering laws, and proposing amendments to them, as exercised now by the parliaments. This last would be readily approved by the court, on account of their hostility against the parliaments, and would lead immediately to the origination of laws. The second has been already solemnly avowed by the King; and it is well understood there would be no opposition to the first. If they push at much more, all may fail.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 506. FORD ED., v, 54. (P., Nov. 1788.)

1712. CONSTITUTION (French), Amendments contemplated.—No plan [of a constitution] is yet reported; but the leading members [of the National Assembly] (with some small differences of opinion) have in contemplation the following: The Executive power in a hereditary King, with a negative on laws, and power to dissolve the legislature; to be considerably restrained in the making of treaties, and limited in his expenses. The Legislative is a House of Representatives. They propose a Senate also, chosen on the plan of our Federal Senate by the Provincial Assemblies, but to be for life, of a certain age (they talk of forty years), and certain wealth (four or five hundred guineas a year), but to have no other power against the laws but to remonstrate against them to the Representatives, who will then determine their fate by a simple majority. This, you will readily perceive, is a mere council of revision, like that of New York, which, in order to be something, must form an alliance with the King, to avail themselves of his veto. The alliance will be useful to both, and to the nation. The Representatives to be chosen every two or three years. The Judiciary system is less prepared than any other part of the plan; however, they will abolish the parliaments, and establish an order of judges and justices, general and provincial, a good deal like ours, with trial by jury in criminal cases certainly, perhaps also in civil. The provinces will have Assemblies for their provincial government, and the cities a municipal body for municipal government, all founded on the basis of popular election. These subordinate governments, though completely dependent on the general one, will be entrusted with almost the whole of the details which our State governments exercise. They will have their own judiciary, final in all but great cases; the Executive business will principally pass through their hands, and a certain local legislature will be allowed them. In short, ours has been professedly their model, in which such changes are made as a difference of circumstances rendered necessary, and some others, neither necessary nor advantageous, but into which men will ever run, when versed in theory and new in the practice of government, when acquainted with man only as they see him in their books, and not in the world.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 97. FORD ED., v, 108. (P., Aug. 1789.)

1713. CONSTITUTION (French), Amendments demanded.—The [National] Assembly * * * proceeded to arrange the order in which they would take up the heads of their constitution as follows: First, and as preliminary to the whole, a general Declaration of the Rights of Man. Then, specifically, the Principles of the Monarchy; Rights of the Nation; Rights of the King; Rights of the Citizens; organization and rights of the National Assembly; forms necessary for the enactment of Laws; organization and functions of the Provincial and Municipal Assemblies; duties and limits of the Judiciary power; functions and duties of the Military power. A Declaration of the Rights of Man, as the preliminary of their work, was accordingly prepared and proposed by the Marquis de Lafayette.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 96. FORD ED., i, 132. (1821.)

1714. CONSTITUTION (French), Cooperation of Jefferson invited.—The Assembly appointed a committee for the "reduction of a projet" of a constitution, at the head of which was the Archbishop of Bordeaux. I received from him, as chairman of the committee, a letter of July 20th [1789], requesting me to attend and assist at their deliberations; but I excused myself, on the obvious considerations that my mission was to the King as Chief Magistrate of the nation, that my duties were limited to the concerns of my own country, and forbade me to intermeddle with the internal transactions of that in which I had been received under a specific character only.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 103. FORD ED., i, 143. (1821.)

1715. CONSTITUTION (French), Divergent views on.—The plan of a constitution was discussed in sections, and so reported from time to time, as agreed to by the committee. The first respected the general frame of the government; and that this should be formed into three departments, Executive, Legislative and Judiciary, was generally agreed. But when they proceeded to subordinate developments, many and various shades of opinion came into conflict, and schism, strongly marked, broke the Patriots into fragments of very discordant principles. The first question: Whether there should be a King? met with no open opposition; and it was readily agreed that the government of France should be monarchical and hereditary. Shall the King have a negative on the laws? Shall that negative be absolute or suspensive only? Shall there be two Chambers of Legislation, or one only? If two, shall one of them be hereditary? or for life? or for a fixed term? and named by the King? or elected by the people? These questions found strong differences of opinion, and produced repulsive combinations among the Patriots. The Aristocracy was cemented by a common principle of preserving the ancient régime, or whatever should be nearest to it. Making this their polar star, they moved in phalanx, gave preponderance on every question to the minorities of the Patriots, and always to those who advocated the least change. The features of the new constitution were thus assuming a fearful aspect, and great alarm was produced among the honest Patriots by these dissensions in their ranks.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 103. FORD ED., i, 144. (1821.)

— CONSTITUTION (French), Jefferson's Bill of Rights for.—See BILL OF RIGHTS.

1716. CONSTITUTION (French), Jefferson, Patriots and.—The features of the new Constitution were thus assuming a fearful aspect, and great alarm was produced among the honest Patriots in their ranks. In this uneasy state of things, I received one day a note from the Marquis de Lafayette, informing me that he should bring a party of six or eight friends to ask a dinner of me the next day. * * * When they arrived, they were Lafayette himself, Duport, Barnave, Alexander La Meth, Blacon, Mounier, Maubourg and Dagout. These were leading Patriots, of honest but differing opinions, sensible of the necessity of effecting a coalition by mutual sacrifices, knowing each other, and not afraid, therefore, to unbosom themselves mutually. This last was a material principle in the selection. With this view, the Marquis had invited the conference, and had fixed the time and place inadvertently as to the embarrassment under which it might place me. The cloth being removed, wine set on the table, after the American manner, the Marquis introduced the objects of the conference, by summarily reminding them of the state of things in the Assembly, the course which the principles of the Constitution were taking, and the inevitable result unless checked by more concord among the Patriots themselves. He observed, that although he also had his opinion, he was ready to sacrifice it to that of his brethren of the same cause; but that a common opinion must now be formed, or the Aristocracy would carry everything and that, whatever they should now agree on, he, at the head of the National force, would maintain. The discussions began at the hour of four and were continued till ten o'clock in the evening; during which time I was a silent witness to a coolness and candor of argument, unusual in the conflicts of political opinion; to a logical reasoning and chaste eloquence, disfigured by no gaudy tinsel of rhetoric or declamation, and truly worthy of being placed in parallel with the finest dialogues of antiquity, as handed to us by Xenophon, by Plato and Cicero. The result was an agreement that the King should have a suspensive veto on the laws, that the legislature should be composed of a single body only, and that to be chosen by the people. This Concordat decided the fate of the Constitution. The Patriots all rallied to the principles thus settled, carried every question agreeably to them, and reduced the Aristocracy to insignificance and impotence.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 104. FORD ED., i, 144. (1821.)

1717. CONSTITUTION (French), Montmorin, Jefferson and.—But duties of exculpation were now incumbent on me. I waited on Count Montmorin the next morning, and explained to him with truth and candor how it had happened that my house had been made the scene of conferences of such a character. He told me he already knew everything which had passed, that so far from taking umbrage at the use of my house on that occasion, he earnestly wished I would habitually assist at such conferences, being sure that I should be useful in moderating the warmer spirits, and promoting a wholesome and practicable reformation only. I told him I knew too well the duties I owed to the King, to the nation and to my own country, to take any part in councils concerning their internal government, and that I should persevere, with care, in the character of a neutral and passive spectator, with wishes only and very sincere ones, that those measures might prevail which would be for the greatest good of the nation. I have no doubts, indeed, that this conference was previously known and approved by this honest minister, who was in confidence and communication with the Patriots, and wished for a reasonable reform of the Constitution.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 105. FORD ED., i, 146. (1821.)

1718. CONSTITUTION (French), Necessity for.—Nor should we wonder at the pressure, [for a fixed constitution] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * the [French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review the weight of their taxes, and the inequality of their distribution; the oppressions of the tithes, the tailles, the corvées, the gabelles, the farms and barriers; the shackles on commerce by monopolies; on industry by guilds and corporations; on the freedom of conscience, of thought, and of speech; on the freedom of the press by the Censure; and of the person by Lettres de Cachet; the cruelty of the Criminal code generally; the atrocities of the Rack; the venality of the judges, and their partialities to the rich; the monopoly of Military honors by the Noblesse; the enormous expenses of the Queen, the Princes and the Court; the prodigalities of pensions; and the riches, luxury, indolence and immorality of the Clergy. Surely under such a mass of misrule and oppression, a people might justly press for a thorough reformation, and might even dismount their roughshod riders, and leave them to walk on their own legs.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.)

1719. CONSTITUTION (Great Britain's), Root of.—I think your book has deduced the constitution of the English nation from its rightful root, the Anglo-Saxon. It is really wonderful that so many able and learned men should have failed in their attempts to define it with correctness. No wonder, then, that [Thomas] Paine, who thought more than he read, should have credited the great authorities who have declared, that the will of parliament is the constitution of England. So Marbois, before the French Revolution, observed to me, that the Almanac Royal was the constitution of France. Your derivation of it from the Anglo-Saxons, seems to be made on legitimate principles. Having driven out the former inhabitants of that part of the island called England, they become aborigines as to you, and your lineal ancestors. They, doubtless, had a constitution; and although they have not left it in a written formula, to the precise text of which you may always appeal, yet they have left fragments of their history and laws, from which it may be inferred with considerable certainty. What ever their history and laws show to have been practiced with approbation, we may presume was permitted by their constitution; whatever was not so practiced, was not permitted. And, although this constitution was violated and set at naught by Norman force, yet force cannot change right. A perpetual claim was kept up by the nation, by their perpetual demand of a restoration of their Saxon laws; which shows they were never relinquished by the will of the nation. In the pullings and haulings for these ancient rights, between the nation, and its kings of the races of Plantagenets, Tudors and Stuarts, there was sometimes gain, and sometimes loss, until the final re-conquest of their rights from the Stuarts. The destitution and expulsion of this race broke the thread of pretended inheritance, extinguished all regal usurpations, and the nation reentered into all its rights; and although in their Bill of Rights they specifically reclaimed some only, yet the omission of the others was no renunciation of the right to assume their exercise also, whenever occasion should occur. The new King received no rights or powers, but those expressly granted to him. It has ever appeared to me, that the difference between the whig and the tory of England is, that the whig deduces his rights from the Anglo-Saxon source and the tory from the Norman. And Hume, the great apostle of toryism, says, in so many words (note AA to chapter 42), that, in the reign of the Stuarts, "it was the people who encroached upon the sovereign, not the sovereign who attempted, as is pretended, to usurp upon the people." This supposes the Norman usurpations to be rights in his successors. And again (C. 159), "the commons established a principle, which is noble in itself, and seems specious, but is belied by all history and experience, that the people are the origin of all just power." And where else will this degenerate son of science, this traitor to his fellow men, find the origin of just powers, if not in the majority of the society? Will it be in the minority? Or in an individual of that minority? Our Revolution commenced on more favorable ground. It presented us an album on which we were to write what we pleased. We had no occasion to search into musty records, to hunt up royal parchments, or to investigate the laws and institutions of a semi-barbarous ancestry. We appealed to those of nature, and found them engraved on our hearts. Yet, we did not avail ourselves of all the advantages of our position. We had never been permitted to exercise self-government. When forced to assume it, we were novices in its science. Its principles and forms had entered little into our former education. We established some, although not all its important principles.—TO JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 355. (M., 1824.)

1720. CONSTITUTION (Spanish), Proposed.—The Constitution proposed has one feature which I like much; that which provides that when the three coordinate branches differ in their construction of the Constitution, the opinion of two branches shall overrule the third. Our Constitution has not sufficiently solved this difficulty.—TO VALENTINE DE FORONDA. v, 473. (M., 1809.)

1721. CONSTITUTION (Spanish), State Church.—There are parts of the new Constitution of Spain in which you would expect, of course, that we should not concur. One of these is the intolerance of all but the Catholic religion; and no security provided against the reestablishment of an Inquisition, the exclusive judge of Catholic opinions, and authorized to proscribe and punish those it shall deem anti-Catholic.—TO CHEVALIER DE ONIS. vi, 342. (M., 1814.)

1722. CONSTITUTION (Spanish), Suffrage.—There is one provision [in the new Constitution of Spain] which will immortalize its inventors. It is that which, after a certain epoch, disfranchises every citizen who cannot read and write. This is new, and is the fruitful germ of the improvement of everything good, and the correction of everything imperfect in the present Constitution. This will give you an enlightened people, and an energetic public opinion which will control and enchain the aristocratic spirit of the government.—TO CHEVALIER DE ONIS. vi, 342. (M., 1814.)

1723. ——. In the Constitution of Spain, as proposed by the late Cortes, there was a principle entirely new to me, * * * that no person, born after that day, should ever acquire the rights of citizenship until he could read and write. It is impossible sufficiently to estimate the wisdom of this provision. Of all those which have been thought of for securing fidelity in the administration of the government, constant ralliance to the principles of the Constitution, and progressive amendments with the progressive advances of the human mind, or changes in human affairs, it is the most effectual. Enlighten the people generally, and tyranny and oppressions of body and mind will vanish like evil spirits at the dawn of day. Although I do not, with some enthusiasts, believe that the human condition will ever advance to such a state of perfection as that there shall no longer be pain or vice in the world, yet I believe it susceptible of much improvement, and most of all, in matters of government and religion; and that the diffusion of knowledge among the people is to be the instrument by which it is to be effected. The Constitution of the Cortes had defects enough; but when I saw in it this amendatory provision, I was satisfied all would come right in time, under its salutary operation.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 592. FORD ED., x, 24. (M., 1816.)

1724. CONSTITUTIONS (American), Amending.—Happily for us, that when we find our constitutions defective and insufficient to secure the happiness of our people, we can assemble with all the coolness of philosophers, and set them to rights, while every other nation on earth must have recourse to arms to amend or to restore their constitutions.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. ii, 264. (P., Sep. 1787.)

1725. ——. Had our former Constitution been unalterable (pardon the absurdity of the hypothesis), we must have gone to ruin with our eyes open.—To BENJAMIN VAUGHAN. v, 334. (P., 1791.)

1726. ——. Whatever be the Constitution, great care must be taken to provide a mode of amendment, when experience or change of circumstances shall have manifested that any part of it is unadapted to the good of the nation. In some of our States it requires a new authority from the whole people, acting by their representatives, chosen for this express purpose, and assembled in convention. This is found too difficult for remedying the imperfections which experience develops from time to time in an organization of the first impression. A greater facility of amendment is certainly requisite to maintain it in a course of action accommodated to the times and changes through which we are ever passing.—To A. CORAY. vii, 323. (M., 1823.)

1727. CONSTITUTIONS (American), Best of all Constitutions.—The worst of the American constitutions is better than the best which ever existed before in any other country, and they are wonderfully perfect for a first essay. Yet, every human essay must have defects.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. ii, 175. FORD ED., iv, 403. (P., 1787.)

1728. CONSTITUTIONS (American), Characteristics of.—Our Revolution * * * presented us an album on which we were free to write what we pleased. * * * Yet we did not avail ourselves of all the advantages of our position. We had never been permitted to exercise self-government. When forced to assume it, we were novices in its science. Its principles and forms had entered little into our former education. We established, however, some although not all its important principles. The constitutions of most of our States assert that all power is inherent in the people; that they may exercise it by themselves, in all cases to which they think themselves competent (as in electing their functionaries executive and legislative, and deciding by a jury of themselves, in all judiciary cases in which any fact is involved), or they may act by representatives, freely and equally chosen; that it is their right and duty to be at all times armed; that they are entitled to freedom of person, freedom of religion, freedom of property, and freedom of the press. In the structure of our legislatures, we think experience has proved the benefit of subjecting questions to two separate bodies of deliberants; but in constituting these, natural right has been mistaken some making one of these bodies, and some both, the representatives of property instead of persons; whereas the double deliberation might be as well obtained without any violation of true principle, either by requiring a greater age in one of the bodies, or by electing a proper number of representatives of persons, dividing them by lots into two chambers, and renewing the division at frequent intervals, in order to break up all cabals.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 356. (M., 1824.)

1729. CONSTITUTIONS (American), English Constitution and.—The first principle of a good government is, certainly, a distribution of its powers into executive, judiciary and legislative, and a subdivision of the latter into two or three branches. It is a good step gained, when it is proved that the English Constitution, acknowledged to be better than all which have preceded it, is only better in proportion as it has approached nearer to this distribution of powers. From this, the last step is easy, to show by a comparison of our constitutions with that of England, how much more perfect they are.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 282. FORD ED., iv, 454. (P., 1787.)

1730. CONSTITUTIONS (American), Happiness under.—It is a misfortune that our countrymen do not sufficiently know the value of their constitutions, and how much happier they are rendered by them than any other people on earth by the governments under which they live.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 282. FORD ED., iv, 455. (P., 1787.)

1731. CONSTITUTIONS (American), Permanent.—A permanent constitution must be the work of quiet, leisure, much inquiry, and great deliberation.—To A. CORAY. vii, 320. (M., 1823.)

1732. CONSTITUTIONS (American), Principles of.—There are certain principles in which our constitutions all agree, and which all cherish as vitally essential to the protection of the life, liberty, property, and safety of the citizen. 1. Freedom of religion, restricted only from acts of trespass on that of others. 2. Freedom of person, securing every one from imprisonment, or other bodily restraint, but by the laws of the land. This is effected by the law of habeas corpus. 3. Trial by jury, the best of all safe-guards for the person, the property, and the fame of every individual. 4. The exclusive right of legislation and taxation in the representatives of the people. 5. Freedom of the press, subject only to liability for personal injuries.—To A. CORAY. vii, 323. (M., 1823.)

1733. CONSTITUTIONS (American), Revision of.—Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence, and deem them like the ark of the covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human, and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. I knew that age well: I belonged to it, and labored with it. It deserved well of its country. It was very like the present, but without the experience of the present; and forty years of experience in government is worth a century of book-reading; and this they would say themselves, were they to rise from the dead. I am certainly not an advocate for frequent and untried changes in laws and constitutions. I think moderate imperfections had better be borne with; because, when once known, we accommodate ourselves to them and find practical means of correcting their ill effects. But I know, also, that laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also, and keep pace with the times. We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him when a boy, as civilized society to remain ever under the regimen of their barbarous ancestors. It is this preposterous idea which has lately deluged Europe in blood. Their monarchs, instead of wisely yielding to the gradual change of circumstances, of favoring progressive accommodation to progressive improvement, have clung to old abuses, entrenched themselves behind steady habits, and obliged their subjects to seek through blood and violence rash and ruinous innovations, which, had they been referred to the peaceful deliberations and collected wisdom of the nation, would have been put into acceptable and salutary forms. Let us follow no such examples, nor weakly believe that one generation is not as capable as another of taking care of itself, and of ordering its own affairs. Let us [Virginia], as our sister States have done, avail ourselves of our reason and experience, to correct the crude essays of our first and unexperienced, although wise, virtuous, and well meaning councils. And lastly, let us provide in our Constitution for its revision at stated periods. What these periods should be, nature herself indicates. By the European tables of mortality, of the adults living at any one moment of time, a majority will be dead in about nineteen years. At the end of that period then, a new majority is come into place; or, in other words, a new generation. Each generation is as independent of the one preceding as that was of all which has gone before. It has, then, like them, a right to choose for itself the form of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness; consequently, to accommodate to the circumstances in which it finds itself, that received from its predecessors; and it is for the peace and good of mankind, that a solemn opportunity of doing this every nineteen or twenty years, should be provided by the Constitution; so that it may be handed on, with periodical repairs, from generation to generation, to the end of time, if anything human can so long endure. It is now forty years since the Constitution of Virginia was formed. The same tables inform us, that, within that period, two-thirds of the adults then living are now dead. Have, then, the remaining third, even if they had the wish, the right to hold in obedience to their will, and to laws heretofore made by them, the other two-thirds, who, with themselves, compose the present mass of adults? If they have not, who has? The dead? But the dead have no rights. They are nothing; and nothing can not own something. Where there is no substance, there can be no accident. This corporeal globe, and everything upon it, belong to its present corporeal inhabitants, during their generation. They alone have a right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone, and to declare the law of that direction; and this declaration can only be made by their majority. That majority, then, has a right to depute representatives to a convention, and to make the constitution what they think will be the best for themselves. . . . If this avenue be shut to the call of sufferance, it will make itself heard through that of force, and we shall go on, as other nations are doing, in the endless circle of oppression, rebellion, reformation; and oppression, rebellion, reformation, again; and so on forever.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL, vii, 14. FORD ED., x, 42. (M., 1816.)

1734. CONSTITUTIONS (American), Written.—Though written constitutions may be violated in moments of passion or delusion, yet they furnish a text to which those who are watchful may again rally and recall the people. They fix, too, for the people the principles of their political creed.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 441. FORD ED., viii, 159. (W., 1802.)

1735. — — — Virginia was not only the first of the American States, but the first nation in the world, at least within the records of history, which, peaceably by its wise men, formed on free deliberation a constitution of government for itself, and deposited it in writing among their archives, always ready and open to the appeal of every citizen.—To JOHN HAMBLEN PLEASANTS. vii, 344. FORD ED., x, 302. (M., 1824.)

1736. ——. Virginia was not only the first of the States, but I believe I may say, the first of the nations of the earth, which assembled its wise men peaceably together to form a fundamental constitution, to commit it to writing and place it among their archives, where everyone should be free to appeal to its text. But this act was very imperfect. The other States, as they proceeded successively to the same work, made successive improvements: and several of them, still further corrected by experience, have, by conventions, still further amended their first forms. Virginia has gone on so far with its premiere ebauche; but is now proposing a convention for amendment.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 357. (M., 1824.)

1737. CONSTRUCTION OF THE CONSTITUTION.—Our peculiar security is in the possession of a written Constitution. Let us not make it a blank paper by construction.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 506. FORD ED., viii, 247. (M., 1803.) See 1666.

1738. CONSTRUCTION OF INSTRUMENTS.—When an instrument admits two constructions, the one safe, the other dangerous, the one precise, the other indefinite, I prefer that which is safe and precise.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 506. FORD ED., viii, 247. (M., 1803.)

1739. CONSULAR CONVENTION, History of French.—In 1784 a convention was entered into between Dr. Franklin and the Count de Vergennes concerning consuls. It contained many things absolutely inadmissible by the laws of the several States, and inconsistent with their genius and character. Dr. Franklin not being a lawyer, and the project offered by the Count de Vergennes being a copy of the conventions which were established between France and the despotic States on the continent (for with England they never had one), he seems to have supposed it a formula established by universal experience, and not to have suspected that it might contain matters, inconsistent with the principles of a free people. He returned to America soon after the signature of it. Congress received it with the deepest concern. They honored Dr. Franklin, they were attached to the French nation; but they could not relinquish fundamental principles. They declined ratifying it, and sent it back with new powers and instructions to Mr. Jefferson, who succeeded Dr. Franklin at Paris. The most objectionable matters were the privileges and exemptions given to the consuls, and their powers over persons of the nation, establishing a jurisdiction independent of that of the nation in which it was exercised, and uncontrollable by it. The French government valued these because they then apprehended a very extensive emigration from France to the United States, which this convention enabled them to control. It was, therefore, with the utmost reluctance, and inch by inch, that they could be induced to relinquish those conditions. The following changes, however, were effected by the convention of 1788: The clauses of the convention of 1784, clothing consuls with the privileges of the laws of nations, were struck out, and they were expressly subjected in their persons and property, to the laws of the land. The giving the right of sanctuary to their houses was reduced to a protection of their chancery room and its papers. Their coercive power over passengers were taken away; and those whom they might have termed deserters of their nation, were restrained to deserted seamen only. The clause allowing them to arrest and send back vessels was struck out, and instead of it they were allowed to exercise a police over the ships of their nation generally. So was that which declared the indelibility of the character of subject, and the explanation and extension of the eleventh article of the treaty of amity. The innovations in the laws of evidence were done away; and the convention, from being perpetual, was limited to twelve years. Although strong endeavors were made to do away some other disagreeable articles, yet it was found that more could not be done without disturbing the good humor, which Congress wished so much to preserve, and the limitation obtained for the continuance of the convention insured our getting finally rid of the whole. Congress, therefore, satisfied with having so far amended their situation, ratified the convention of 1788 without hesitation.*—To MR. WINGATE. ix, 462. (1803.)

1740. ——. A consular convention had been agreed on in 1784, between Dr. Franklin and the French government, containing several articles, so entirely inconsistent with the laws of the several States, and the general spirit of our citizens, that Congress withheld their ratification, and sent it back to me with instructions to get those articles expunged, or modified, so as to render them compatible with our laws. The Minister unwillingly released us from these concessions, which, indeed, authorized the exercise of powers very offensive in a free State. After much discussion, the convention was reformed in a considerable degree, and was signed by the Count Montmorin and myself, on the 14th of November, 1788; not, indeed, such as I would have wished, but such as could be obtained with good humor and friendship.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 85. FORD ED., i, 117. (1821.)

1741. CONSULS, The Confederation and.—As the States have renounced the separate power of making treaties with foreign nations, they cannot separately receive a consul; and as Congress have, by the confederation, no immediate jurisdiction over com-

* This convention is the basis of our consular system, which is practically the same as Jefferson arranged it.—EDITOR.

merce, as they have only a power of bringing that jurisdiction into existence by entering into a treaty, till such treaty be entered into, Congress themselves cannot receive a consul. Till a treaty, then, there exists no power in any part of our government, federal or particular, to admit a consul among us. * * * Nothing less than a new article, to be agreed to by all the States, would enable Congress, or the particular States, to receive him.—To DAVID HARTLEY. i, 426. FORD ED., iv, 96. (P., 1785.)

1742. CONSULS, Creation of.—A consul is the creature of a treaty. No nation without an agreement, can place an officer in another country, with any powers or jurisdiction whatever.—To DAVID HARTLEY. i, 426. FORD ED., iv, 96. (P., 1785.)

1743. ——. A consul is the creature of a convention altogether; without this he must be unknown. and his jurisdiction unacknowledged by the laws of the country in which he is placed. The will of the sovereign in most countries can give a jurisdiction by a simple order. With us, the Confederation admitting Congress to make treaties with foreign powers, they can by treaty or convention, provide for the admission and jurisdiction of consuls and the Confederation, and whatever is done under it, being paramount to the laws of the States, this establishes the power of the consuls. But without a convention, the laws of the States cannot take any notice of a consul, nor permit him to exercise any jurisdiction.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 17. (P., 1786.)

1744. CONSULS, Excluded.—With respect to the placing consuls in the British [West India] Islands, we are so far from being permitted that a common mercantile factor is not permitted by their laws.—To MR COXE. iv, 69. (1793.)

1745. CONSULS, Inutility of.—As to ourselves, we do not find the institution of consuls very necessary. Its history commences in times of barbarism, and might well have ended with them. During these, they were perhaps useful, and may still be so in countries not yet emerged from that condition. But all civilized nations at this day, understand so well the advantages of commerce, that they provide protection and encouragement for merchant strangers and vessels coming among them. So extensive, too, have commercial connections now become, that every mercantile house has correspondents in almost every port. They address their vessels to these correspondents, who are found to take better care of their interests, and to obtain more effectually the protection of the laws of the country for them, than the consul of their nation can. He is generally a foreigner, unpossessed of the little details of knowledge of greatest use to them. He makes national questions of all the difficulties which arise; the correspondent prevents them. We carry on commerce with good success in all parts of the world; yet we have not a consul in a single port, nor a complaint for the want of one, except from the persons who wish to be consuls themselves. Though these considerations may not be strong enough to establish the absolute inutility of consuls, they may make us less anxious to extend their privileges and jurisdictions, so as to render them objects of jealousy and irritation in the places of their residence. That the government [of France] thinks them useful, is sufficient reason for us to give them all the functions and facilities which our circumstances will admit. Instead, therefore, of declining, every article [in the consular convention] which will be useless to us, we accede to everyone which will not be inconvenient. Had this nation alone been concerned, our desire to gratify them, might have tempted us to press still harder on the laws and opinions of our country. But your Excellency knows, that we stand engaged in treaties with some nations, which will give them occasion to claim whatever privileges we yield to any other. This renders circumspection more necessary.—To COUNT DE MONTMORIN. ii, 420. (P., 1788.)

1746. CONSULS, Law of Nations and.—The law of nations does not of itself extend to consuls at all. They are not of the diplomatic class of characters, to which alone that law extends of right. Convention, indeed, may give it to them, and sometimes has done so; but in that case, the convention can be produced. In ours with France, it is expressly declared that consuls shall not have the privileges of that law, and we have no convention with any other nation. * * * Independently of law, consuls are to be considered as distinguished foreigners, dignified by a commission from their sovereign, and specially recommended by him to the respect of the nation with whom they reside. They are subject to the laws of the land, indeed, precisely as other foreigners are, a convention, where there is one, making a part of the laws of the land; but if at any time, their conduct should render it necessary to assert the authority of the laws over them, the rigor of those laws should be tempered by our respect for their sovereign, as far as the case will admit. This moderate and respectful treatment towards foreign consuls, it is my duty to recommend and press on our citizens, because I ask it for their good towards our own consuls, from the people with whom they reside.—To T. NEWTON. iii, 295. (1791.)

1747. CONSULS, Market Reports and.—It would be useful if the consuls could forward directly to me, from time to time, the prices current of their place, and any other circumstance which it might be interesting to make known to our merchants without delay.—CIRCULAR TO CONSULS. iii, 430. (Pa., 1792.)

1748. CONSULS, Native Citizens for.—With respect to the consular appointments it is a duty on me to add some observations, which my situation here has enabled me to make. I think it was in the spring of 1784, that Congress (harassed by multiplied applications of foreigners, of whom nothing was known but on their own information, or on that of others as unknown as themselves) came to a resolution, that the interest of America would not permit the naming any person, not a citizen, to the office of consul, vice-consul, agent or commissary. This was intended as a general answer to that swarm of foreign pretenders. It appears to me, that it will be best still to preserve a part of this regulation. Native citizens, on several valuable accounts, are preferable to aliens, and to citizens alien-born. They possess our language, know our laws, customs, and commerce; have, generally, acquaintance in the United States; give better satisfaction, and are more to be relied on in point of fidelity. Their disadvantages are an imperfect acquaintance with the language of this country, and an ignorance of the organization of its judicial and executive powers, and consequent awkwardness, whenever application to either of these is necessary, as it frequently is. But it happens that in some of the principal ports of France, there is not a single American (as in Marseilles, L'Orient, and Havre), in others but one (as in Nantes and Rouen), and in Bordeaux only, are there two or three. Fortunately for the present moment, most of these are worthy of appointments. But we should look forward to future times, when there may happen to be no native citizens in a port, but such as, being bankrupt, have taken asylum in France from their creditors, or young ephemeral adventurers in commerce, without substance or conduct, or other descriptions, which might disgrace the consular office, without protecting our commerce. To avail ourselves of our good native citizens, when we have one in a port, and when there are none, to have yet some person to attend to our affairs, it appears to me advisable, to declare by a standing law that no person but a native citizen shall be capable of the office of consul, and that the consul's presence in his port shall suspend, for the time, the functions of the vice-consul. This is the rule of 1784, restrained to the office of consul, and to native citizens. The establishing this, by a standing law, will guard against the effect of particular applications, and will shut the door against such applications.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 494. (P., 1788.)

1749. ——. The office of vice-consul may be given to the best subject in the port, whether citizen or alien; and that of consul be kept open for any native citizen of superior qualifications, who might come afterwards to establish himself in the port. The functions of the vice-consul would become dormant during the presence of his principal, come into activity again on his departure, and thus spare us and them the painful operation of revoking and reviving their commissions perpetually. Add to this that during the presence of the consul, the vice-consul would not be merely useless, but would be a valuable counsellor to his principal, new in the office, the language, laws and customs of the country. Every consul and vice-consul should be restrained in his jurisdiction to the port for which he is named, and the territory nearer to that than to any other consular or vice-consular port, and no idea be permitted to arise that the grade of consul gives a right to any authority whatever over a vice-consul, or draws on any dependence.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 496. (P., 1788.)

1750. ——. The determination to appoint natives only is generally proper, but not always. These places are for the most part of little consequence to the public; and if they can be made resources of profit to our ex-military worthies, they are so far advantageous. You and I, however, know that one of these novices, knowing nothing of the laws, or authorities of his port, nor speaking a word of its language, is of no more account than the fifth wheel of a coach.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 552. (M., 1816.)

1751. CONSULS. Punished.—One of Genet's consuls* has committed a pretty serious deed at Boston, by going with an armed force taken from a French frigate in the harbor, and rescuing a vessel out of the hands of the marshal who had arrested her by process from a court of justice; in another instance, he kept off the marshal by an armed force from serving a process on a vessel. He is ordered, consequently, to be arrested himself, prosecuted and punished for the rescue, and his exequatur will be revoked.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 52. FORD ED., vi, 401. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

1752. ——. The President is informed * * * that M. Duplaine, consul of France at Boston, has * * * rescued a vessel from the officer of the court of justice, by process from which she was under arrest in his custody; and that he has in like manner, with an armed force, opposed and prevented the officer, charged with process from a court against another vessel, from serving that process. This daring violation of the laws requires the more attention, as it is by a foreigner clothed with a public character, arrogating an unfounded right to Admiralty jurisdiction, and probably meaning to assert it by this act of force. By the law of nations, consuls are not diplomatic characters, and have no immunities whatever against the laws of the land. To put this altogether out of dispute, a clause was inserted in our consular convention with France, making them amenable to the laws of the land, as other inhabitants. Consequently, M. Duplaine is liable to arrest, imprisonment, and other punishments, even capital, as other foreign subjects resident here. * * * You will immediately institute such a prosecution against him as the laws will warrant.—To CHRISTOPHER GORE. iv, 55. FORD ED., vi, 404. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

1753. ——. If there be any doubt as to the character of his offence, whether of a higher or a lower grade, it will be best to prosecute for that which will admit the least doubt, because an acquittal, though it might be founded on the opinion that the grade of offence with which he is charged is higher than his act would support, yet it might be construed by the uninformed to be a judiciary decision against his amenability to the law, or perhaps in favor of the jurisdictions these consuls [Genet's appointments] are assuming. The process, therefore, should be of the surest kind, and all the proceedings well grounded.—To CHRISTOPHER GORE. iv, 55. FORD ED., vi, 405. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

1754. ——. If an arrest * * * be the first step, it should be so managed as to leave room neither for escape nor rescue. It should be attended with every mark of respect, consistent with safe custody, and his confinement as mild and comfortable also, as that would permit. These are the distinctions to which a consul is entitled, that is to say, of a particular decorum of deportment towards him, indicative of respect to the sovereign whose officer he is.—To CHRISTOPHER GORE. iv, 55. FORD ED., vi, 405. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

1755. CONSULS, Reception of.—We are very far from admitting your principle, that the government on their side has no other right, on the presentation of a consular commission, than to certify that, having examined it, they find it according to rule. The governments of both nations have a right, and that of yours has exercised it as to us, of considering the character of the person appointed; the place for which he is appointed, and other material circumstances; and of taking precautions as to his conduct, if necessary; and this does not defeat the general object of the convention, which, in stipulating that consuls shall be promoted on both sides, could not mean to supersede reasonable objections to particular persons, who might at the moment be obnoxious to the nation to which they were sent, or whose conduct might render them so at any time hereafter. In fact, every foreign agent depends on the double will of the two governments, of that which sends him, and of that which is to permit the exercise of his functions within their territory; and when either of these wills is refused or withdrawn, his authority to act within that territory becomes incomplete.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 90. FORD ED., vi, 463. (Pa., Dec. 1793.)

1756. ——. By what member of the government the right of giving or withdrawing permission is to be exercised here, is a question on which no foreign agent can be permitted to make himself the umpire. It is sufficient for him, under our government, that he is informed of it by the Executive.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 90. FORD ED., vi, 463. (Pa., Dec. 1793.)

1757. CONSULS, Uniform for.—The consuls and vice-consuls of the United States are free to wear the uniform of their navy, if they choose to do so. This is a deep blue coat with red facings, lining and cuffs, the cuffs slashed and a standing collar; a red waistcoat (laced or not at the election of the wearer) and blue breeches; yellow buttons with a foul anchor, and black cockades and small swords.—To THE CONSULS OF THE U. S. iii, 187. (1790.)

1758. CONSULS, Usurpation of Jurisdiction by.—I have it in charge, from the President of the United States, to give notice to all the consuls and vice-consuls of France, that if any of them * * * shall assume any jurisdiction not expressly given by the convention between France and the United States, the exequatur of the consul so transgressing will be immediately revoked, and his person submitted to such prosecutions and punishments as the laws may prescribe for the case.—CIRCULAR TO FRENCH CONSULS. FORD ED., vi, 417. (Sep. 1793.)

1759. ——. We learn * * * that the [French] consul of New York, in the first instance, and yourself in a subsequent one, forbade an officer of justice to serve the process with which he was charged from his court, on the British brig William Tell, taken by a French armed vessel, within a mile of our shores, * * * and that you had even given orders to the French squadron there to protect the vessel against any person who should attempt to take her from their custody. If this opposition were founded, * * * on the indulgence of the letters before cited [with respect to the William Tell], it was extending that to a case not within their purview; and even had it been precisely the case to which they were to be applied, is it possible to imagine you might assert it, within the body of the country, by force of arms? I forbear to make the observations which such a measure must suggest, and cannot but believe that a moment's reflection will evince to you the depth of the error committed in this opposition to an officer of justice, and in the means proposed to be resorted to in support of it. I am, therefore, charged to declare to you expressly, that the President expects and requires, that the officer of justice be not obstructed, in freely and peaceably serving the process of his court; and that, in the meantime, the vessel and her cargo be not suffered to depart, till the judiciary, if it will undertake it, or himself, if not, shall decide whether the seizure has been within the limits of our protection.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 68. FORD ED., vi, 421. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

1760. ——. With respect to the usurpation of admiralty jurisdiction by the consuls of France, within these States, the honor and rights of the States themselves were sufficient motives for the Executive to take measures to prevent its continuance, as soon as they were apprised of it. They have been led, by particular considerations, to await the effect of these measures, believing they would be sufficient; but finding at length they were not, such others have been lately taken, as can no longer fail to suppress this irregularity completely.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iv, 66. FORD ED., vi, 424. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

1761. CONTENTION, Horror of.—There may be people to whose tempers and dispositions contention is pleasing and who, therefore, wish a continuance of confusion, but to me it is of all states but one the most horrid.—To JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 200. FORD ED., i, 482. (M., 1775.)

1762. CONTENTMENT, Wisdom of.—It is wise and well to be contented with the good things which the Master of the feast places before us, and to be thankful for what we have, rather than thoughtful about what we have not.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. vii, 53. FORD ED., x, 71. (M., 1817.)

— CONTINENTAL CONGRESS.—See CONGRESS.

1763. CONTRABAND OF WAR, Abusive Seizures.—We believe the practice of seizing what is called contraband of war, is an abusive practice, not founded in natural right. War between two nations cannot diminish the rights of the rest of the world remaining at peace. The doctrine that the rights of nations remaining quietly under the exercise of moral and social duties, are to give way to the convenience of those who prefer plundering and murdering one another, is a monstrous doctrine; and ought to yield to the more rational law, that "the wrongs which two nations endeavor to inflict on each other, must not infringe on the rights or conveniences of those remaining at peace".—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 410. FORD ED., viii, 90. (M., 1801.)

1764. CONTRABAND OF WAR, National Law and.—What is contraband by the law of nature? Either everything which may aid or comfort an enemy or nothing. Either all commerce which would accommodate him is unlawful, or none is. The difference between articles of one or another description, is a difference in degree only. No line between them can be drawn. Either all intercourse must cease between neutrals and belligerents, or all be permitted. Can the world hesitate to say which shall be the rule? Shall two nations turning tigers, break up in one instant the peaceable relations of the whole world? Reason and nature clearly pronounce that the neutral is to go on in the enjoyment of all its rights, that its commerce remains free, not subject to the jurisdiction of another, nor consequently its vessels to search, or to inquiries whether their contents are the property of an enemy, or are of those which have been called contraband of war.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 410. FORD ED., viii, 90. (M., 1801.)

1765. CONTRABAND OF WAR, Naval Stores and.—I have had a consultation with Mr. Madison on the application of the British vessel of war for stores. We are both of opinion that if by this term he meant sea stores only, or even munitions de bouche, or provisions generally, there can be no objection to their taking them, or indeed anything except contraband of war. But what should be deemed contraband of war in this case we are not agreed. He thinks that as the English deem naval stores to be contraband, and as such take them from our vessels at sea, we ought to retaliate their own definition on them. I think we ought to act on the opinion that they are not contraband; because by treaties between all the nations (I think) having treaties with another they are agreed not to be contraband; even England herself, with every nation but ours, makes them non-contraband, and the only treaty making them contraband (Jay's) is now expired. We ought, then, at once to rally with all the other nations on the ground that they are non-contraband; and if England treats them as contraband in our ships, instead of admitting it by retaliation, let us contest it on its true ground. Mr. Madison thinks France might complain of this; but I think not, as we shall permit both nations equally to take naval stores; or at least such articles of them as may be used for peaceable as well as warlike purposes; this being the true line.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 455. (June 1806.)

1766. CONTRABAND OF WAR, Provisions and.—Certainly provisions are not allowed by the consent of nations, to be contraband but where everything is so, as in the case of a blockaded town, with which all intercourse is forbidden.—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 270. (M., 1823.)

1767. CONTRACTS, Abiding by.—To preserve the faith of the nation by an exact discharge of its debts and contracts * * * [is one of] the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 21. FORD ED., viii, 187. (Dec. 1802.)

1768. CONTRACTS, Congressmen and.—I am averse to giving contracts of any kind to members of the Legislature.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 50. (W., 1807.)

1769. CONTRACTS, Impairment of.—Between citizens and citizens of the same State, and under their own laws, I know but a single case in which a jurisdiction is given to the General Government. That is, where anything but gold or silver is made a lawful tender, or the obligation of contracts is any otherwise impaired. The separate legislatures had so often abused that power, that the citizens themselves chose to trust it to the general rather than to their own special authorities.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 296. FORD ED., x, 231. (M., 1823.)

1770. CONTRACTS, Liberation from.—There are circumstances which sometimes excuse the non-performance of contracts between man and man; so are there also between nation and nation. When performance, for instance, becomes impossible, non-performance is not immoral; so if performance becomes self-destructive to the party, the law of self-preservation overrules the laws of obligation in others.—FRENCH TREATIES OPINION. vii, 613. FORD ED., vi, 220. (1793.)

1771. — Reason, which gives the right of self-liberation from a contract in certain cases, has subjected it to certain just limitations. The danger which absolves us must be great, inevitable and imminent.—FRENCH TREATIES OPINION. vii, 614. FORD ED., vi, 221. (1793.)

1772. ——. Obligation is not suspended till the danger is become real, and the moment of it so imminent, that we can no longer avoid decision without forever losing the opportunity to do it.—FRENCH TREATIES OPINION. vii, 615. FORD ED., vi, 222. (1793.)

1773. CONTRACTS, Possibilities and.—If possibilities would void contracts, there never could be a valid contract, for possibilities hang over everything.—FRENCH TREATIES OPINION. vii, 614. FORD ED., vi, 222. (1793.)

1774. CONTROVERSY, Aversion to.—Having an insuperable aversion to be drawn into controversy in the public papers, I must request not to be quoted.—TO JOSEPH DELAPLAINE. vii, 21. FORD ED., x, 56. (M., 1816.)

1775. CONTROVERSY, Avoiding.—So many persons have of late found an interest or a passion gratified by imputing to me sayings and writings which I never said or wrote, or by endeavoring to draw me into newspapers to harass me personally, that I have found it necessary for my quiet and my other pursuits to leave them in full possession of the field, and not to take the trouble of contradicting them even in private conversation.—TO ALEXANDER WHITE. iv, 201. FORD ED., vii, 174. (M., 1797.)

1776. CONTROVERSY, Declining.—As to myself, I shall take no part in any discussions. I leave others to judge of what I have done, and to give me exactly the place which they shall think I have occupied. Marshall has written libels on one side; others, I suppose, will be written on the other side; and the world will sift both and separate the truth as well as they can.—TO JOHN ADAMS. vi, 127. FORD ED., ix, 388. (M., 1813.)

1777. CONVENT, Entering a.—And Madame Cosway in a convent! I knew that to much goodness of heart she joined enthusiasm and religion; but I thought that very enthusiasm would have prevented her from shutting up her adoration of the God of the universe within the walls of a cloister; that she would rather have sought the mountain top.—TO MRS. CHURCH. FORD ED., vi, 455. (G., 1793.)

1778. CONVENTION (Federal), Call for.—The want of some authority which should procure justice to the public creditors, and an observance of treaties with foreign nations, produced the call of a convention of the States at Annapolis.*—THE ANAS. ix, 89. FORD ED., i, 158. (1818.)

1779. ——. All the States have come into the Virginia proposition for a commercial convention, the deputies of which are to agree on the form of an article giving to Congress the regulation of their commerce. Maryland alone has not named deputies, conceiving that Congress might as well propose the article. They are, however, for giving the power, and will, therefore, either nominate deputies to the convention, or accede to their measures.—TO M. DE LAFAYETTE. ii, 21. (P., 1786.)

1780. CONVENTION (Federal), Character of.—It is really an assembly of demi-gods.*—TO JOHN ADAMS. ii, 260. (P., 1787.)

1782. ——. A more able assembly never sat in America.—TO C. W. F. DUMAS. ii, 264. (P., 1787.)

1783. CONVENTION (Federal), Publicity and.—I am sorry the Federal Convention began their deliberations by so abominable a precedent as that of tying up the tongues of their members. Nothing can justify this example but the innocence of their intentions; and ignorance of the value of public discussions.—TO JOHN ADAMS. ii, 260. (P., 1787.)

1784. CONVENTION (Federal), Reform and.—I remain in hopes of great and good effects from the decision of the Assembly over which you are presiding.—TO GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 250. (P., Aug. 1787.)

1785. ——. I look to the Federal Convention for an amendment of our Federal affairs.—TO BENJAMIN HAWKINS. ii, 220. FORD ED., iv, 426. (P., 1787.)

1786. CONVENTION (Federal), Representation in.—I find by the public papers that your commercial convention [at Annapolis] failed in point of representation. If it should produce a full meeting in May, and a broader reformation, it will still be well.—TO JAMES MADISON. ii, 65. FORD ED., iv, 332. (P., Dec. 1786.)

1787. CONVENTION, National Republican.—If * * * the [Federal] government should expire on the 3d of March by the loss of its head, there is no regular provision for reorganizing it, nor any authority but in the people themselves. They may authorize a convention to reorganize, and even amend the machine.—TO BENJAMIN SMITH BARTON. iv, 353. FORD ED., vii, 490. (W., Feb. 14, 1801.)

1788. ——. The Federalists in Congress were completely alarmed at the resource for which we declared, to wit, a convention to reorganize the government, and to amend it. The very word convention gives them the horrors, as in the present democratical spirit of America, they fear they should lose some of the favorite morsels of the Constitution.—TO JAMES MONROE. iv, 354. FORD ED., vii, 491. (W., Feb. 15, 1801.)

1789. ——. I have been, above all things, solaced by the prospect which opened on us [in the Presidential contest in 1801] in the event of a non-election of a President; in which case, the Federal Government would have been in the situation of a clock or watch run down. There was no idea of force, nor of any occasion for it. A convention, invited by the Republican members of Congress, with the virtual President and Vice-President, would have been on the ground in eight weeks, would have repaired the Constitution where it was defective, and wound it up again. This peaceable and legitimate resource, to which we are in the habit of implicit obedience, superseding all appeal to force, and being always within our reach, shows a precious principle of self-preservation in our composition, till a change of circumstances shall take place, which is not within prospect at any definite period.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. vii, 374. FORD ED., viii, 22. (W., March 21, 1801.)

1790. CONVENTION (Virginia), First.—On the discontinuance of Assemblies [in Virginia], it became necessary to substitute in their place some other body, competent to the ordinary business of government, and to the calling forth the powers of the state for the maintenance of our opposition to Great Britain. Conventions were, therefore, introduced, consisting of two delegates from each county, meeting together and forming one House, on the plan of the former House of Burgesses, to whose places they succeeded. These were at first chosen anew for every particular session. But in March, 1775, they recommended to the people to choose a convention, which should continue in office a year.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 363. FORD ED., iii, 225. (1782.)

1791. CONVENTION (Virginia), Powers of.—The convention of Virginia, which organized their new government, had been chosen before a separation from Great Britain had been thought of in their State. They had, therefore, none but the ordinary powers of legislation. This leaves their act for organizing the government subject to be altered by every legislative assembly, and though no general change in it has been made, yet its effect has been controlled in several special cases.—To M. DE MEUNIER. viii, 283. FORD ED., iv, 139. (P., 1786.)

1792. ———. To our convention no special authority had been delegated by the people to form a permanent Constitution, over which their successors in legislation should have no powers of alteration. They had been elected for the ordinary purposes of legislation only, and at a time when the establishment of a new government had not been proposed or contemplated. Although, therefore, they gave to this act the title of a constitution, yet it could be no more than an act of legislation, subject, as their other acts were, to alteration by their successors.—To JOHN HAMBDEN PLEASANTS. vii, 344. FORD ED., x, 302. (M., 1824.)

1793. CONVENTIONS, Constitutional.—The * * * States in the Union have been of opinion that to render a form of government unalterable by ordinary acts of Assembly, the people must delegate persons with special powers. They have accordingly chosen special conventions to form and fix their governments.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 367. FORD ED., iii, 229. (1782.)

1794. ———. Happy for us that we are yet able to send our wise and good men together to talk over our form of government, discuss its weaknesses, and establish its remedies with the same sans froid as they would a subject of agriculture.—To RALPH IZARD. ii, 429. (P., 1788.)

1795. ———. The example of changing a constitution by assembling the wise men of the State, instead of assembling armies, will be worth as much to the world as the former examples we had given them.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 12. FORD ED., v, 89. (P., 1789.)

1796. ———. This corporeal globe, and everything upon it, belong to its present corporeal inhabitants, during their generation. They alone have a right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone, and to declare the law of that direction; and this declaration can only be made by their majority. That majority, then, has a right to depute representatives to a convention, and to make the constitution what they think will be the best for themselves. * * * If this avenue be shut to the call of sufferance it will make itself through that of force, and we shall go on, as other nations are doing, in the endless circle of oppression, rebellion, reformation; and oppression, rebellion, reformation, again; and so on forever.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 16. FORD ED., x, 44. (M., 1816.)

1797. CONVICTS, Transported.—The malefactors sent to America were not sufficient in number to merit enumeration, as one class out of three which peopled America. It was at a late period of their history that this practice began. * * * I do not think the whole number sent would amount to two thousand, and being principally men, eaten up with disease, they married seldom and propagated little. I do not suppose that themselves and their descendants are at present four thousand, which is little more than one-thousandth part of the whole inhabitants.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 254. FORD ED., iv, 158. (P., 1786.)

1798. COOPER (Thomas), University of Va. and.—I do sincerely lament that untoward circumstances have brought on us the irreparable loss of this professor, whom I have looked to as the corner stone of our edifice [University of Virginia]. I know no one who could have aided us so much in forming the future regulations of our infant institution; and although we may perhaps obtain from Europe equivalents in science, they can never replace the advantages of his experience, his knowledge of the character, habits and manners of our country, his identification with its sentiments and principles, and high reputation he has obtained in it generally.*—To GENERAL TAYLOR. vii, 164. (M., 1820.)

* Dr. Cooper was an Englishman, and the son-in-law of Dr. Priestley, with whom he came to America in 1792. Cooper edited Priestley's writings and was 1799. — —. You may have heard of the hue and cry raised from the different pulpits on our appointment [to be professor in the University of Virginia] of Dr. Cooper, whom they charge with Unitarianism as boldly as if they knew the fact, and as presumptuously as if it were a crime, and one for which, like Servetus, he should be burned * * *. For myself, I was not disposed to regard the denunciations of these satellites of religious inquisition; but our colleagues, better judges of popular feeling, thought that they were not to be altogether neglected; and that it might be better to relieve Dr. Cooper, ourselves and the institution from this crusade.—To GENERAL TAYLOR. vii, 162. (M., 1820.)

1800. COPYING PRESS, Appreciated.—Have you a copying press? If you have not, you should get one. Mine (exclusive of paper, which costs a guinea a ream) has cost me about fourteen guineas. I would give ten times that sum to have had it from the date of the Stamp Act.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 415. (P., 1785.)

1801. — —. I shall be able to have a small copying press completed for you here [Paris] in about three weeks.—To M. DE LA FAYETTE. ii, 22. (P., 1786.)

1802. COPYING PRESS, Jefferson's portable.—Having a great desire to have a portable copying machine, and being satisfied from some experiments that the principle of the large machines might be applied in a small one, I planned one when in England, and had it made. It answers perfectly. I have since set a workman to making them here, and they are in such demand that he has his hands full. * * * I send you one. The machine costs 66 livres, the appendages 24 livres. * * * You must expect to make many essays before you succeed perfectly. A soft brush, like a shaving brush, is more convenient than the sponge.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 110. FORD ED., iv, 369. (P., 1787.)

1804. CORNWALLIS (Lord), Ravages of in Virginia.—Lord Cornwallis remained in this position [from Point of Fork along the main James River] ten days, his own headquarters being in my house [Elk-hill] at that place. I had time to remove most of the effects out of the house. He destroyed all my growing crops of corn and tobacco; he burned all my barns, containing the same articles of the last year, having first taken what corn he wanted; he used, as was to be expected, all my stock of cattle, sheep and hogs, for the sustenance of his army, and carried off all the horses capable of service; of those too young for service, he cut the throats; and he burned all the fences on the plantation, so as to leave it an absolute waste. He carried off also about thirty slaves. Had this been to give them freedom, he would have done right; but it was to consign them to inevitable death from the small-pox and putrid fever, then raging in his camp. This I knew afterwards to be the fate of twenty-seven of them. I never had news of the remaining three, but presume they shared the same fate. When I say that Lord Cornwallis did all this, I do not mean that he carried about the torch in his own hands, but that it was all done under his eye; the situation of the house in which he was, commanding a view of every part of the plantation, so that he must have seen every fire. I relate these things on my own knowledge in a great degree, as I was on the ground soon after he left it. He treated the rest of the neighborhood somewhat in the same style, but not with that spirit of total extermination with which he seemed to rage over my possessions. Wherever he went, the dwelling houses were plundered of everything that could be carried off. Lord Cornwallis's character in England would forbid the belief that he shared in the plunder; but that his table was served with the plate thus pillaged from private houses, can be proved by many hundred eyewitnesses. From an estimate I made at that time, on the best information I could collect, I supposed the State of Virginia lost under Lord Cornwallis's hands, that year, about thirty thousand slaves; and that of these, about twenty-seven thousand died of the small pox and camp fever, and the rest were partly sent to the West Indies, and exchanged for rum, sugar, coffee and fruit, and partly sent to New York, whence they went, at the peace, either to Nova Scotia or England. From this last place, I believe they have been lately sent to Africa. History will never relate the horrors committed by the British army in the Southern States of America. They raged in Virginia six months only, from the middle of April to the middle of October, 1781, when they were all taken prisoners; and I give you a faithful specimen of their transactions for ten days of that time, and on one spot only. Ex pede Herculem. I suppose their whole devastations during those six months amounted to about three millions sterling.—To DR. WILLIAM GORDON. ii, 426. FORD ED., v, 39. (P., 1788.)

1805. — —. Lord Cornwallis encamped ten days on an estate of mine at Elk Island, having his headquarters in my house. He burned all the tobacco houses and barns on the farm with the produce of the former year in them. He burned all the enclosures, and wasted the fields in which the crop of that year

(it was in the month of June) was growing. He killed or carried off every living animal, cutting the throats of those which were too young for service. Of the slaves he carried away thirty.—To WILLIAM JONES. FORD ED., iv, 354. (P., 1787.)

1806. CORNWALLIS (Lord), Trumbull's picture of.—The painting lately executed by Colonel Trumbull, I have never seen, but as far back as the days of Horace at least, we are told that "pictoribus atque poetis; Quidlibet audendi semper fuit aqua potestas." He has exercised this licentia pictoris in like manner in the surrender of Yorktown, where he has placed Lord Cornwallis at the head of the surrender although it is well known that he was excused by General Washington from appearing.—To SAMUEL A. WELLS. FORD ED., x, 133. (M., 1819.)

1807. CORONERS, Election of.—Coroners of Counties shall be annually elected by those qualified to vote for Representatives.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 20. (June 1776.)

— CORPORATION.—See INCORPORATION.

1808. CORREA DE SERRA (J.), Learned.—I found him one of the most learned and amiable of men.—To BARON VON HUMBOLDT. vi, 267. FORD ED., ix, 430. (1813.)

1809. CORREA DE SERRA (J.), Minister at Washington.—We have to join in mutual congratulations on the appointment of our friend Correa, to be minister or envoy of Portugal, here (Washington). This, I hope, will give him to us for life.—To F. W. GILMER. vii, 5. FORD ED., x, 33. (M., 1816.)

1810. CORREA DE SERRA (J.), Regrets for.—No foreigner, I believe, has ever carried with him more friendly regrets.—To JAMES MADISON. vii, 190. FORD ED., x, 169. (P.F., 1820.)

1811. CORREA DE SERRA (J.), University of Va. and.—M. Correa is here (Monticello) on his farewell visit to us. He has been much pleased with the plan and progress of our University, and has given some valuable hints to its botanical branch. He goes to do, I hope, much good in his new country (Brazil); the public instruction there, as I understand, being within the department destined for him.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 168. (M., 1820.)

1812. CORRESPONDENCE, Between Citizens.—A right of free correspondence between citizen and citizen, on their joint interests, whether public or private, and under whatsoever laws these interests arise (to wit, of the State, of Congress, of France, Spain, or Turkey), is a natural right; it is not the gift of any municipal law, either of England, or of Virginia, or of Congress; but in common with all our other natural rights, is one of the objects for the protection of which society is formed, and municipal laws established.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 199. FORD ED., vii, 172. (M., 1797.)

1813. — — — The right of free correspondence between citizen and citizen on their joint interests, public or private, and under whatsoever laws these interests arise, is a natural right of every individual citizen, not the gift of municipal law, but among the objects for the protection of which municipal laws are instituted.—JURY PETITION. ix, 451. FORD ED., vii, 161. (1797.)

— CORRESPONDENCE, Revolutionary Committees of.—See APPENDIX.

1814. CORRESPONDENCE, Constituents and representatives.—By the Constitution of Virginia, established from its earliest settlement, the people thereof have professed the right of being governed by laws to which they have consented by representatives chosen by themselves immediately. In order to give to the will of the people the influence it ought to have, and the information which may enable them to exercise it usefully, it was a part of the common law, adopted as the law of this land, that their representatives, in the discharge of their functions, should be free from the cognizance or coercion of the co-ordinate branches, Judiciary and Executive; and that their communications with their constituents should of right, as of duty also, be free, full, and unawed by any. So necessary has this intercourse been deemed in the country from which they derive principally their descent and laws, that the correspondence between the representative and constituent is privileged there to pass free of expense through the channel of the public post, and that the proceedings of the legislature have been known to be arrested and suspended at times until the Representatives could go home to their several counties and confer with their constituents.—JURY PETITION. ix, 448. FORD ED., vii, 158. (1797.)

1815. CORRESPONDENCE, Judiciary and.—For the Judiciary to interpose in the Legislative department between the constituent and his representative, to control them in the exercise of their functions or duties towards each other, to overawe the free correspondence which exists and ought to exist between them, to dictate what may pass between them, and to punish all others, to put the representative into jeopardy of criminal prosecution, of vexation, expense, and punishment before the Judiciary, if his communications, public or private, do not exactly square with their ideas of fact or right, or with their designs of wrong, is to put the Legislative department under the feet of the Judiciary, is to leave us, indeed, the shadow, but to take away the substance of representation, which requires essentially that the representative be as free as his constituents would be, that the same interchange of sentiment be lawful between him and them as would be lawful among themselves were they in the personal transaction of their own business; is to do away the influence of the people over the proceedings of their representatives by excluding from their knowledge, by the terror of punishment, all but such information or misinformation as may suit their own views.*—JURY PETITION. ix, 450. FORD ED., vii, 160. (1797.)

* In 1797, a Federal Grand Jury in Virginia made a presentment of the act of Samuel J. Cabell, a mem-

1816. CORRESPONDENCE, Literary.—I set the more value on literary correspondence, inasmuch as I can make private friendships instrumental to the public good, by inspiring a confidence which is denied to public and official communications.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 287. (W., 1804.)

1817. CORRESPONDENCE, Longing for.—But why has nobody else written to me? Is it that one is forgotten as soon as their back is turned? I have a better opinion of men.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 45. (P., 1785.)

1818. CORRESPONDENCE, Men of Worth and.—I cannot relinquish the right of correspondence with those whom I have learned to esteem. If the extension of common acquaintance in public life be an inconvenience, that with select worth is more than a counterpoise.—To LEVI LINCOLN. vi, 7. (M., 1811.)

1819. CORRESPONDENCE, Natural Right and.—The right of free correspondence is not claimed under the Constitution of the United States, nor the laws or treaties derived from it, but as a natural right, placed originally under the protection of our municipal laws, and retained under the cognizance of our own courts.—JURY PETITION. ix, 452. FORD ED., vii, 162. (1797.)

1820. CORRESPONDENCE, Punctuality and.—I never was a punctual correspondent to any person, as I must own to my shame.—To RICHARD HENRY LEE. FORD ED., ii, 193. (Wg., 1779.)

1821. CORRESPONDENCE, Rank and.—If it be possible to be certainly conscious of anything, I am conscious of feeling no difference between writing to the highest or lowest being on earth.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 401. FORD ED., viii, 59. (W., 1801.) See LETTERS.

1822. CORRESPONDENCE, State courts and.—The Federal Constitution alienates from [the State courts] all cases arising, 1st, under the Constitution; 2d, under the laws of Congress; 3d, under treaties, &c. But the right of free correspondence, whether with a public representative in General Assembly, in Congress, in France, in Spain, or with a private one charged with a pecuniary trust, or with a private friend, the object of our esteem, or any other, has not been given to us under, 1st, the Federal Constitution; 2dly, any law of Congress; or 3dly, any treaty; but * * * by nature. It is, therefore, not alienated, but remains under the protection of our courts.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 200. FORD ED., vii, 172. (M., 1797.) See LETTERS.

1823. CORRUPTION, Agriculturists and.—Corruption of morals in the mass of cultivators is a phenomenon of which no age nor nation has furnished an example. It is the mark set on those, who, not looking up to ber of Congress from Virginia, in writing political circular-letters to his constituents.—EDITOR.

heaven, to their own soil and industry, as does the husbandman, for their subsistence, depend for it on casualties and caprice of customers.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 405. FORD ED., iii, 268. (1782.)

1824. CORRUPTION, British.—I have been among those who have feared the design to introduce the corruptions of the English government here, and it has been a strong reason with me for wishing there was an ocean of fire between that island and us.—To JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., vii, 57. (M., 1796.)

1825. CORRUPTION, Centralization.—Our country is too large to have all its affairs directed by a single government. Public servants at such a distance, and from under the eye of their constituents, must, from the circumstance of distance, be unable to administer and overlook all the details necessary for the good government of the citizens, and the same circumstance, by rendering detection impossible to their constituents, will invite the public agents to corruption, plunder, and waste. And I do verily believe, that if the principle were to prevail, of a common law being in force in the United States (which principle possesses the general government at once of all the powers of the State governments, and reduces us to a single consolidated government), it would become the most corrupt government on the earth.—To GIDEON GRANGER. iv, 331. FORD ED., vii, 451. (M., 1800.)

1826. — — — Consolidation first, and then corruption, its necessary consequence.—To NATHANIEL MACON. vii, 223. FORD ED., x, 193. (M., 1821.)

1827. — — — If ever this vast country is brought under a single government, it will be one of the most extensive corruption, indifferent and incapable of a wholesome care over so wide a spread of surface.—To WILLIAM T. BARRY. vii, 256. (M., 1822.)

1828. CORRUPTION, Cities and.—When they [the people] get piled upon one another in large cities, as in Europe, they will become corrupt as in Europe.*—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 479. (P., Dec. 1787.)

1829. CORRUPTION, Congress.—I said that he [President Washington] must know, and everybody knew, there was a considerable squadron in both [Houses] whose votes were devoted to the paper and stock-jobbing interest, that the names of a weighty number were known, and several others suspected on good grounds. That on examining the votes of these men, they would be found uniformly for every Treasury measure, and that as most of these measures had been carried by small majorities, they were carried by these very votes: that, therefore, it was a cause of just uneasiness, when we saw a legislature legislating for their own interests, in opposition to those of the people.—THE ANAS. ix, 117. FORD ED., i, 200. (July 1792.)

* In the Congress edition (ii, 332), the reading is: "When we get piled upon one another in large cities, as in Europe, we shall become corrupt as in Europe, and go to eating one another as they do there." The FORD version is the correct one.—EDITOR.

1830. ——. With grief and shame it must be acknowledged that his [Alexander Hamilton's] [financial] machine was not without effect; that even in this, the birth of our government, some members were found sordid enough to bend their duty to their interests and to look after personal rather than public good.—THE ANAS. ix, 91. FORD ED., i, 160. (1818.)

1831. ——. I indulge myself on one political topic only, that is, the shameless corruption of a portion of the Representatives in the first and second Congresses, and their implicit devotion to the treasury. I think I do good in this, because it may produce exertions to reform the evil, on the success of which the form of the government is to depend.—TO E. RANDOLPH. iv, 101. FORD ED., vi, 498. (M., Feb. 1794.)

1832. CORRUPTION, Extirpating.—I would prefer a native Frenchman [for the office of surveyor and inspector for the port of Bayou St. John], if you can find one proper and disposed to cooperate with us in extirpating that corruption which has prevailed in those offices under the former government, and had so familiarized itself as that men, otherwise honest, could look on it without horror. I pray you to be alive to the suppression of this odious practice, and that you bring to punishment and brand with eternal disgrace every man guilty of it, whatever be his station.—TO GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. iv, 551. (W., 1804.)

1833. CORRUPTION, Government and.—In every government on earth is some trace of human weakness, some germ of corruption and degeneracy, which cunning will discover, and wickedness insensibly open, cultivate and improve. Every government degenerates when trusted to the rulers of the people alone. The people themselves, therefore, are its only safe depositories. And to render even them safe, their minds must be improved to a certain degree. This, indeed, is not all that is necessary, though it be essentially necessary. An amendment to our Constitution [Virginia] must here come in aid of the public education. The influence over government must be shared among all the people. If every individual which composes their mass, participates of the ultimate authority, the government will be safe; because the corrupting the whole mass will exceed any private resources of wealth; and public ones cannot be provided but by levies on the people. In this case, every man would have to pay his own price. The government of Great Britain has been corrupted, because but one man in ten has a right to vote for members of Parliament. The sellers of the government, therefore, get nine-tenths of their price clear. It has been thought that corruption is restrained by confining the right of suffrage to a few of the wealthier of the people; but it would be more effectually restrained, by an extension of that right, to such members as would bid defiance to the means of corruption.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 390. FORD ED., iii, 254. (1782.)

1834. ——. [We] should look forward to a time, and that not a distant one, when a corruption in this, as in the country from which we derive our origin, will have seized the heads of government, and be spread by them through the body of the people; when they will purchase the voices of the people, and make them pay the price. Human nature is the same on every side of the Atlantic, and will be alike influenced by the same causes.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 362. FORD ED., iii, 225. (1782.)

1835. ——. Mankind soon learn to make interested uses of every right and power which they possess, or may assume. The public money and public liberty, intended [in the Virginia constitution] to have been deposited with three branches of magistracy, but found inadvertently to be in the hands of one only, will soon be discovered to be sources of wealth and dominion to those who hold them; distinguished, too, by this tempting circumstance, that they are the instrument, as well as the object, of acquisition. With money we will get men, said Cæsar, and with men we will get money.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 362. FORD ED., iii, 224. (1782.)

1836. CORRUPTION, Guarding against. The time to guard against corruption and tyranny is before they shall have gotten hold of us. It is better to keep the wolf out of the fold, than to trust to drawing his teeth and talons after he shall have entered.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 363. FORD ED., iii, 225. (1782.)

1837. CORRUPTION, Influence through.—I wonder to see such an arrearage from the Department of State to our bankers in Holland. Our predecessors seem to have levied immense sums from their constituents merely to feed favorites by large advances, and thus to purchase by corruption an extension of their influence and power.—TO JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 93. (M., Sep. 1801.)

1838. CORRUPTION, Innocent of.—Recurring to the tenor of a long life of public service, against the charge of malice and corruption (in the New Orleans Batture case) I stand conscious and erect.—THE BATTURE CASE. viii, 604. (1812.)

1839. CORRUPTION, Monarchical.—A germ of corruption indeed has been transferred from our dear mother country, and has already borne fruit, but its blight is begun from the breath of the people.—TO J. P. BRISOT DE WARVILLE. FORD ED., vi, 249. (Pa., 1793.)

1840. CORRUPTION, Principles and.—Time indeed changes manners and notions, and so far we must expect institutions to bend to them. But time produces also corruption of principles, and against this it is the duty of good citizens to be ever on the watch, and if the gangrene is to prevail at last, let the day be kept off as long as possible.—TO SPENCER ROANE. vii, 211. FORD ED., x, 188. (M., 1821.)

1841. CORRUPTION, Refuge from.—It seems to me that in proportion as commercial avarice and corruption advance on us from the North and East, the principles of free government are to retire to the agricultural States of the South and West as their last asylum and bulwark.—To HENRY MIDDLETON. vi, 91. (M., 1813.)

1842. COTTON, Early Conditions.—The four southernmost States make a great deal of cotton. Their poor are almost entirely clothed in it in winter and summer. In winter they wear shirts of it, and outer clothing of cotton and wool mixed. In summer their shirts are linen, but the outer clothing cotton. The dress of the women is almost entirely of cotton manufactured by themselves, except the richer class, and even many of these wear a good deal of home-spun cotton. It is as well manufactured as the calicoes of Europe. These four States furnish a great deal of cotton to the States north of them, who cannot make it, as being too cold.—To J. P. BRISSOT DE VARVILLE. ii, 12. FORD ED., iv, 281. (P., 1786.)

1843. COTTON, Plans to raise.—Much enquiry is made of me here [Paris] about the cultivation of cotton, and I would thank you to give me your opinion how much a hand would make cultivating that as his principal crop instead of tobacco.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. FORD ED., v, 36. (P., 1788.)

1844. COTTON GIN, Invention.—Your favor of Oct. 15 [1793] inclosing a drawing of your cotton gin, was received on the 6th inst. The only requisite of the law now uncomplished with is the forwarding a model, which being received your patent may be made out and delivered to your order immediately.—To ELI WHITNEY. FORD ED., vi, 448. (G., Nov. 16, 1793.)

1845. COTTON GIN, Practicability of.—As the State of Virginia * * * carries on household manufactures of cotton to a great extent, as I also do myself, and one of our great embarrassments is the clearing the cotton of the seed, I feel a considerable interest in the success of your invention, for family use. Permit me, therefore, to ask information from you on these points. Has the machine been thoroughly tried in the ginning of cotton, or is it yet but a machine of theory? What quantity of cotton has it cleared on an average of several days, and worked by hand, and by how many hands? What will be the cost of one of them, made to be worked by hand? Favorable answers to these questions would induce me to engage one of them.—To ELI WHITNEY. FORD ED., vi, 448. (G., Nov. 1793.)

1846. COUNCIL, Appointment of.—A Privy Council shall be annually appointed by the House of Representatives, whose duties it shall be to give advice to the Administrator, when called on by him. With them the Deputy Administrator shall have session and suffrage.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 20. (June 1776.)

fices seven years and be ineligible a second time, and who, * * * shall hold no other office or emolument under this State, or any other State or power whatsoever. Their duty shall be to * * * advise the Governor when called on by him, and their advice in any case shall be a sanction to him. They shall also have power, and it shall be their duty, to meet at their own will, and to give their advice, though not required by the governor, in cases where they shall think the public good calls for it. * * * They shall annually choose a President, who shall preside in council in the absence of the Governor, and who, in case of his office becoming vacant by death or otherwise, shall have authority to exercise all his functions, till a new appointment be made, as he shall also in any interval during which the Governor shall declare himself unable to attend to the duties of his office.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 447. FORD ED., iii, 327. (1783.)

1848. COUNCIL, Expensive.—What will you do with the Council? They are expensive, and not constantly nor often necessary; yet to drop them would be wrong. I think you had better require their attendance twice a year to examine the executive department, and see that it be going on rightly, advise on that subject the Governor, or inform the Legislature, as they shall see occasion. Give them fifty guineas for each trip, fill up only five of the places, and let them be always subject to summons on great emergencies by the Governor, on which occasions their expenses only should be paid. At an expense of five hundred guineas you will then preserve this member of the Constitution always fit for use. Young and ambitious men will leave it to go into the Assembly; but the elderly and able, who have retired from the legislative field as too turbulent, will accept of the offices.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 404. (A., Feb. 1784.)

— COUNCIL, Orders in.—See ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

1849. COUNCIL, Shelter of a.—Responsibility is a tremendous engine in a free government. Let the Executive [of Virginia] feel the whole weight of it then, by taking away the shelter of his Executive Council. Experience both ways has already established the superiority of this measure.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 315. FORD ED., v, 315. (Pa., 1791.)

1850. — — — Leave no screen of a council behind which to skulk from responsibility.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 12. FORD ED., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

1851. COUNCIL, Useless.—[The Governor's] Council * * * is at best but a fifth wheel to a wagon.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 10. FORD ED., x, 38. (M., 1816.)

1852. COUNCIL, Votes in.—In answer to your inquiry whether, in the early times of our [Virginia] government, where the Council was divided, the practice was for the Governor to give the deciding vote? I must observe that, correctly speaking, the Governor not being a counsellor, his vote could make no part of an advice of Council. That would be to place an advice on their journals, which they did not give, and could not give because of their equal division. But he did what was equivalent in effect. While I was in the administration, no doubt was ever suggested that where the Council, divided in opinion, could give no advice, the Governor was free and bound to act on his own opinion and his own responsibility. Had this been a change of the practice of my predecessor, Mr. Henry, the first Governor, it would have produced some discussion, which it never did. Hence, I conclude it was the opinion and practice from the first institution of the government. During Arnold's and Cornwallis's invasion, the Council dispersed to their several homes, to take care of their families. Before their separation, I obtained from them a capitulary of standing advices for my government in such cases as ordinarily occur: such as the appointment of militia officers, justices, inspectors, &c., on the recommendations of the courts; but in the numerous and extraordinary occurrences of an invasion, which could not be foreseen, I had to act on my own judgment and my own responsibility. The vote of general approbation, at the session of the succeeding winter, manifested the opinion of the Legislature, that my proceedings had been correct. General Nelson, my successor, staid mostly, I think, with the army; and I do not believe his Council followed his camp, although my memory does not enable me to affirm the fact. Some petitions against him for impressment of property without authority of law, brought his proceedings before the next Legislature; the questions necessarily involved were whether necessity, without express law, could justify the impressment, if it could, whether he could order it without the advice of Council. The approbation of the Legislature amounted to a decision of both questions. I remember this case the more especially, because I was then a member of the Legislature, and was one of those who supported the Governor's proceedings, and I think there was no division of the House on the question. I believe the doubt was first suggested in Governor Harrison's time, by some member of the Council, on an equal division. Harrison, in his dry way, observed that instead of one governor and eight counsellors, there would then be eight governors and one counsellor, and continued, as I understood, the practice of his predecessors. Indeed, it is difficult to suppose it could be the intention of those who framed the Constitution, that when the Council should be divided, the government should stand still; and the more difficult as to a constitution formed during a war, and for the purpose of carrying on that war, that so high an officer as their Governor should be created and salaried, merely to act as the clerk and authenticator of the votes of the Council. No doubt it was intended that the advice of the Council should control the Governor. But the action of the controlling power being withdrawn, his would be left free to proceed on its own responsibility. Where from division, absence, sickness, or other obstacle, no advice could be given, they could not mean that their Governor, the person of their peculiar choice and confidence, should stand by, an inactive spectator, and let their government tumble to pieces for want of a will to direct it. In executive cases, where promptitude and decision are all important, an adherence to the letter of a law against its probable intentions (for every law must intend that itself shall be executed), would be fraught with incalculable danger. Judges may await further legislative explanations, but a delay of executive action might produce irretrievable ruin. The State is invaded, militia to be called out, an army marched, arms and provisions to be issued from the public magazines, the Legislature to be convened, and the Council is divided. Can it be believed to have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution, that the Constitution itself and their constituents with it should be destroyed for want of a will to direct the resources they had provided for its preservation? Before such possible consequences all verbal excuses must vanish; construction must be made secundum arbitrium boni viri, and the constitution be rendered a practicable thing. That exposition of it must be vicious, which would leave the nation under the most dangerous emergencies without a directing will. The cautious maxims of the bench, to seek the will of the legislator and his words only, are proper and safe for judicial government. They act ever on an individual case only, the evil of which is partial, and gives time for correction. But an instant of delay in executive proceedings may be fatal to the whole nation. They must not, therefore, be laced up in the rules of the judiciary department. They must seek the intention of the legislator in all the circumstances which may indicate it in the history of the day, in the public discussions, in the general opinion and understanding, in reason and in practice. The three great departments having distinct functions to perform, must have distinct rules adapted to them. Each must act under its own rules, those of no one having any obligation on either of the others. Where the opinion first began that a governor could not act when his council could not or would not advise, I am uninformed. Probably not till after the war; for, had it prevailed then, no militia could have been opposed to Cornwallis, nor necessities furnished to the opposing army of Lafayette.—To JAMES BARBOUR, VI, 38. FORD ED., IX, 335. (M., 1812.)

I have two great measures at heart, without which no republic can maintain itself in strength. 1. That of general education, to enable every man to judge for himself what will secure or endanger his freedom. 2. To divide every county into hundreds, of such size that all the children of each will be within reach of a central school in it. But this division looks to many other fundamental provisions. Every hundred, besides a school, should have a justice of the peace, a constable, and a captain of militia. These officers, or some others within the hundred, should be a corporation to manage all its concerns, to take care of its roads, its poor, and its police by patrols, &c. (as the selectmen of the Eastern townships). Every hundred should elect one or two jurors to serve where requisite, and all other elections should be made in the hundreds separately, and the votes of all the hundreds be brought together. Our present captaincies might be declared hundreds for the present, with a power to the courts to alter them occasionally. These little republics would be the main strength of the great one. We owe to them the vigor given to our Revolution in its commencement in the Eastern States, and by them the Eastern States were enabled to repeal the Embargo in opposition to the Middle, Southern, and Western States, and their large and lubberly division into counties which can never be assembled. General orders are given out from a centre to the foreman of every hundred, as to the sergeants of an army, and the whole nation is thrown into energetic action, in the same direction in one instant and as one man, and becomes absolutely irresistible. Could I once see this I should consider it as the dawn of the salvation of the republic, and say with old Simeon, "nunc dimittas, Domine." But our children will be as wise as we are, and will establish in the fulness of time those things not yet ripe for establishment.—To JOHN TYLER v, 525. FORD ED., ix, 277. (M., 1810.)

1854. ——. The organization of our [Virginia] county administration may be thought * * * difficult; but follow principle and the knot unties itself. Divide the counties into wards of such size as that every citizen can attend, when called on, and act in person. Ascribe to them the government of their wards in all things relating to themselves exclusively. A justice, chosen by themselves, in each, a constable, a military company, a patrol, a school, the care of their own poor, their own portion of the public roads, the choice of one or more jurors to serve in some court, and the delivery, within their own wards, of their own votes for all elective officers of higher sphere, will relieve the county administration of nearly all its business, will have it better done, and by making every citizen an acting member of the government, and in the offices nearest and most interesting to him, will attach him by his strongest feelings to the independence of his country, and its republican constitution.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 12. FORD ED., x, 40. (M., 1816.)

1855. COUNTIES, Division of.—In what terms reconcilable to Majesty, and at the same time to truth, shall we speak of a late instruction to the Governor of the Colony of Virginia, by which he is forbidden to assent to any law for the division of a county, unless the new county will consent to have no representative in Assembly? That Colony has as yet fixed no boundary to the westward. Their westward counties, therefore, are of indefinite extent. Some of them are actually seated many hundreds of miles from their eastern limits. Is it possible, then, that his Majesty can have bestowed a single thought on the situation of those people, who, in order to obtain justice for injuries, however great or small, must, by the laws of that Colony, attend their County Court, at such a distance, with all their witnesses, monthly, till their litigation be determined.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 136. FORD ED., i, 441. (1774.)

1856. ——. The article, nearest my heart, is the division of counties into wards. These will be pure and elementary republics, the sum of all which, taken together, composes the State, and will make of the whole a true democracy as to the business of the wards, which is that of nearest and daily concern. The affairs of the larger sections, of counties, of States, and of the Union, not admitting personal transactions by the people, will be delegated to agents elected by themselves; and representation will thus be substituted, where personal action becomes impracticable. Yet, even over these representative organs, should they become corrupt and perverted, the division into wards constituting the people, in their wards, a regularly organized power, enables them by that organization to crush, regularly and peaceably, the usurpations of their unfaithful agents, and rescues them from the dreadful necessity of doing it insurrectionally. In this way we shall be as republican as a large society can be; and secure the continuance of purity in our government, by the salutary, peaceable, and regular control of the people.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 35. FORD ED., x, 45. (M., 1816.)

1857. ——. As Cato concluded every speech with the words "Carthago delenda est," so do I every opinion, with the injunction, "divide the counties into wards."—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vi, 544. (M., 1816.)

1858. ——. These wards, called townships in New England, are the vital principle of their governments, and have proved themselves the wisest invention ever devised by the wit of man for the perfect exercise of self-government, and for its preservation.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 13. FORD ED., x, 41. (M., 1816.)

1859. COUNTIES, The State and.—A county of a State * * * cannot be governed by its own laws, but must be subject to those of the State of which it is a part.—To WILLIAM LEE. vii, 57. (M., 1817.)

1860. ——. Every State is divided into counties, each to take care of what lies within its local bounds; each county again into townships or wards, to manage minuter details.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 82. FORD ED., i, 113. (1821.)

1861. COURTESY, Diplomatic.—Whenever Mr. Hammond [the British Minister] applies to our government on any matter whatever, be it ever so new or difficult, if he does not receive his answer in two or three days or a week, we are goaded with new letters on the subject. Sometimes it is the sailing of the packet, which is made the pretext for forcing us into premature and undigested determinations. You know best how far your applications meet such early attentions, and whether you may with propriety claim a return of them: you can best judge, too, of the expediency of an imitation, that where dispatch is not reciprocal it may be expedient and justifiable that delay should be so.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 583. FORD ED., vi, 302. (Pa., June 1793.)

1862. COURTIER, Unprincipled.—Courtiers had rather give up power than pleasures; they will barter, therefore, the usurped prerogatives of the King, for the money of the people.—To COUNT DE MOUSTIER. ii, 389. (P., May 1788.)

— COURTS, Admiralty.—See ADMIRALTY.

1863. COURTS, Erection of.—The Administrator* shall not possess the prerogative * * * of erecting courts.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 19. (June 1776.)

1864. COURTS, Organization of Virginia.—The Judiciary powers shall be exercised: First, by County Courts, and other inferior jurisdictions. Secondly, by a General Court and a High Court of Chancery. Thirdly, by a Court of Appeals.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 22. (June 1776.)

1865. COURTS, Jurisdiction of.—The courts of this commonwealth [Virginia] (and among them the General Court, as a court of impeachment), are originally competent to the cognizance of all infractions of the rights of one citizen by another citizen; and they still retain all their judiciary cognizances not expressly alienated by the Federal Constitution.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 199. FORD ED., vii, 172. (M., 1797.)

1866. COURTS (Appeals), Judges of.—The Court of Appeals shall consist of not less than seven nor more than eleven members, to be appointed by the House of Representatives.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 23. (June 1776.)

1867. — — — The members of the Court of Appeals * * * shall hold their offices during good behavior, for breach of which they shall be removable by an act of the Legislature only.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 23. (June 1776.)

1868. — — — The jurisdiction [of the Court of Appeals] shall be to determine finally all causes removed before them from the General Court, or High Court of Chancery, or of the County Court, or other inferior jurisdictions, for misbehavior; to try impeachments.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 23. (June 1776.)

1869. — — — In the Court of Appeals, the judges of the General Court and High Court of Chancery shall have session and deliberative voice, but no suffrage.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 23. (June 1776.)

1870. COURTS OF CHANCERY, Beginning of.—In ancient times, when contracts and transfers of property were more rare, and their objects more simple, the imperfections of the administration of justice according to the letter of the law were less felt. But when commerce began to make progress, when the transfer of property came into daily use, when the modifications of these transfers were infinitely diversified, when with the improvement of other faculties that of the moral sense became also improved, and learnt to respect justice in a variety of cases which it had not formerly discriminated, the instances of injustice left without remedy by courts adhering to the letter of the law, would be so numerous as to produce a general desire that a power should be found somewhere which would redress them. History renders it probable that appeals were made to the king himself in these cases, and that he exercised this power sometimes in person, but more generally by his chancellor to whom he referred the case. This was most commonly an Ecclesiastic, learning being rare in any other class at that time. Roman learning, and a prejudice in favor of Roman institutions are known to have been a leading feature in the ecclesiastical character. Hence it happened that the forms of proceeding in the Court of Chancery, and the rules of its decisions were assimilated to those of the Roman law. The distinction in that system between the jus pratorium, or discretion of the Prætor, and the general law is well known. Among the Romans, and in most modern nations, these were and are exercised by the same person. But the Chancellors of England, finding the ordinary courts in possession of the administration of general law, and confined to that, assumed to themselves by degrees that of the jus pratorium, and made theirs be considered as a court of conscience, or of equity. The history of the struggles between the ordinary, or common law courts, and the Court of Equity or Chancery, would be beyond our purpose. It is sufficient to say that the interpositions of the Chancellor were at first very rare, that they increased insensibly, and were rather tolerated from their necessity, than authorized by the laws in the earlier periods of history. Lord Bacon first introduced regularity into their proceedings, and Finch, Earl of Nottingham, in the reign of Charles II. opened to view that system which has been improving from that time to this.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 110. (P., 1785.)

1871. COURTS OF CHANCERY, Common Law and.—One practice only is wanting to render the Court of Chancery completely valuable. That is that when a class of cases has been formed, and has been the subject of so many decisions in the Court of Chancery as to have been seen there under all circumstances, and in all its combinations, and the rules for its decision are modified accordingly and thoroughly digested, the Legislature should reduce these rules to a text and transplant them into the department of the Common Law, which is competent then to the application of them, and is a safer depository for the general administration of justice. This would be to make the Chancery a nursery only for the forming new plants for the department of the Common Law. Much of the business of Chancery is now actually in a state of perfect preparation for removal into the Common Law.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 113. (P., 1785.)

1872. — — — It has often been predicted in England that the Chancery would swallow up the Common Law. During many centuries, however, that these two courts have gone on together, the jurisdiction of the Common Law has not been narrowed in a single article; on the contrary, it has been enlarged from time to time by act of the Legislature; but jealousy, uncorrected by reason or experience, sees certainly wherever there is a possibility, and sensible men still think that the danger from this court overweighs its utility.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 113. (P., 1785.)

1878. COURTS OF CHANCERY, Judges of.—The Judges of the General Court and of the High Court of Chancery, * * * if kept united, shall be five in number; if separate, there shall be five for the General Court, and three for the High Court of Chancery.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 22. (June 1776.)

1874. ——. The Judges of the General Court and of the High Court of Chancery shall be appointed by the Administrator and Privy Council.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 22. (June 1776.)

1875. ——. The appointment of the Judges of the General Court and of the High Court of Chancery shall be made from the faculty of the law, and of such persons of that faculty as shall have actually exercised the same at the bar of some court, or courts of record within this Colony, for seven years.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 22. (June 1776.)

1876. ——. The Judges of the General Court and of the High Court of Chancery * * * shall hold their commissions during good behavior, for breach of which they shall be removable by the Court of Appeals.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 23. (June 1776.)

1877. ——. The judges of the high court of chancery, general court, and court of admiralty shall * * * be appointed by joint ballot of both houses of Assembly, and hold their offices during good behavior.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 448. FORD ED., iii, 328. (1783.)

1878. COURTS OF CHANCERY, Juries in.—All facts in causes whether of Chancery, Common, Ecclesiastical, or Marine law, shall be tried by a jury upon evidence given vivâ voce, in open court; but where witnesses are out of the Colony, or unable to attend through sickness, or other invincible necessity, their deposition may be submitted to the credit of the jury.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 24. (June 1776.)

1879. ——. To guard still more effectually against the dangers apprehended from a Court of Chancery, the Legislature of Virginia have very wisely introduced into it the trial by jury for all matters of fact.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 116. (P., 1785.)

1880. ——. In your new station [Legislature of Va.] let me recommend to you the jury system; as also the restoration of juries in the Court of Chancery, which a law not long since repealed, because "the trial by jury is troublesome and expensive." If the reason be good, they should abolish it at common law also.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 307. FORD ED., vii, 400. (M., Nov. 1799.)

1881. ——. I was once a great advocate for introducing into chancery vivâ voce testimony, and trial by jury. I am still so as to the latter, but have retired from the former opinion on the information received from both your State [Kentucky] and ours, that it worked inconveniently. I introduced it into the Virginia law, but did not return to the bar, so as to see how it answered.—To JOHN BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 318. FORD ED., vii, 416. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

1882. ——. In that one of the bills for organizing our [Va.] judiciary system, which proposed a court of Chancery, I had provided for a trial by jury of all matters of fact, in that as well as in the courts of law. Edmund Pendleton defeated it by the introduction of four words only, "if either party choose." The consequence has been, that as no suitor will say to his judge, "Sir, I distrust you, give me a jury," juries are rarely, I might say, perhaps, never seen in that court, but when called for by the Chancellor of his own accord.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 37. FORD ED., i, 50. (1821.)

1883. COURTS OF CHANCERY, Jurisdiction of.—The Court of Chancery, whilst developing and systematizing its powers, has found, in the jealousy of the nation and its attachment to certain and impartial law, an obstacle insuperable beyond that line. It has been obliged therefore to establish for itself certain barriers as the limitation of its power, which, whenever it transcends the general jurisdiction which superintends all the Courts, and receives appeals from them, corrects its encroachments, and reverses its decisions. This is the House of Lords in England, and the Court of Appeals in Virginia. These limitations are: 1. That it cannot take cognizance of any case wherein the Common Law can give complete remedy. 2. That it cannot interpose in any case against the express letter and intention of the Legislature. If the Legislature means to enact an injustice, however palpable, the Court of Chancery is not the body with whom a correcting power is lodged. 3. That it shall not interpose in any case which does not come within a general description, and admit of redress by a general and practicable rule. This is to prevent partiality. When a Chancellor pretends that a case is distinguished from all others, it is thought better that that singular case should go without remedy, than that he should be at liberty to cover partial decisions under pretence of singular circumstances, which ingenious men can always invent. Hence all the cases remediable in Chancery are reduced to certain classes. When a new case presents itself, not found in any of these classes, it is dismissed as irremediable. If in the progress of commerce, and of the developments of moral duties, the same case is presented so often that the Chancellor can seize certain leading features which submit to a general description, and show that it is a proper object for the application of some moral rule,—here is a new class of cases formed and brought within the regular relief of the Court of Chancery, which thus continues the administration of justice progressive almost in equal pace with the progress of commerce and refinement of morality.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 112. (P., 1785.)

1884. COURTS OF CHANCERY, Lord Mansfield and.—Unhappily for England a very unexpected revolution is working in their laws of late years. Lord Mansfield, a man of the clearest head and most seducing eloquence, coming from a country where the powers of the common law and chancery are united in the same court, has been able since his admission to the bench of judges in England, to persuade the courts of common law to revise the practice of construing their text equitably. The object of former judges has been to render the law more and more certain; that of this person to render it more uncertain under pretence of rendering it more reasonable. No period of the English law, of whatever length it be taken, can be produced wherein so many of its settled rules have been reversed as during the time of this judge. His decisions will be precious in those States where no chancery is established; but his accession to the bench should form the epoch, after which all recurrence to English decisions should be proscribed in those States which have separated the two courts. His plan of rendering the Chancery useless by administering justice in the same way in the courts of common law has been admirably seconded by the celebrated Doctor Blackstone, a judge in the same department, who has endeavored seriously to prove that the jurisdiction of the Chancery is a chaos, irreducible to system, insusceptible of fixed rules, and incapable of definition or explanation. Were this true, it would be a monster whose existence should not be suffered one moment in a free country wherein every power is dangerous which is not bound up by general rules.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 115. (P., 1785.)

1885. COURTS OF CHANCERY, Utility of.—Even some of the States in our Union have chosen to do without this court; and it has been proposed to others to follow their example in this case. One of two consequences must follow. Either, 1—the cases now remediable in Chancery must be left without remedy, in which event the clamors for justice which originally begat this court, would produce its re-institution; or 2—the courts of common law must be permitted to perform the discretionary functions of the Chancery. This will be either by adopting at once all the rules of the Chancery, with the consent of the Legislature, or if that is withheld, these courts will be led, by the desire of doing justice, to extend the text of the law according to its equity as was done in England before the Chancery took a regular form. This will be worse than running on Scylla to avoid Charybdis, for at present nine-tenths of our legal contestations are perfectly remedied by the common law, and can be carried before that judicature only. This proportion then of our rights is placed on sure ground. Relieve the judges from the rigor of text law, and permit them, with prætorian discretion, to wander into its equity, and the whole legal system becomes uncertain. This has been its fate in every country where the fixed and the discretionary law have been committed into the same hands. It is probable that the singular certainty, with which justice has been administered in England, has been the consequence of their distribution into two distinct departments.—To PHILLIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 114. (P., 1785.)

1886. COURTS (County), Appointment of Judges.—The judges of the County Courts, and other inferior jurisdictions, shall be appointed by the Administrator, subject to the negative of the Privy Council. They shall not be fewer than five in number.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. FORD ED., ii, 22. (June 1776.)

1887. COURTS (County), Election of Judges.—I acknowledge the value of this institution [County Courts]; that it is in truth our principal executive and judiciary, and that it does much for little pecuniary reward. It is their self-appointment I wish to correct; to find some means of breaking up a cabal, when such a one gets possession of the bench. When this takes place, it becomes the most afflicting of tyrannies, because its powers are so various, and exercised on everything most immediately around us.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vii, 18. FORD ED., x, 52. (M., 1816.)

1888. — — —. It has been thought that the people are not competent electors of judges learned in the law. But I do not know that this is true, and, if doubtful, we should follow principle. In this, as in many other elections, they would be guided by reputation, which would not err oftener, perhaps, than the present mode of appointment. In one State of the Union, at least, it has long been tried, and with the most satisfactory success. The judges of Connecticut have been chosen by the people every six months, for nearly two centuries, and I believe there has hardly ever been an instance of change; so powerful is the curb of incessant responsibility. If prejudice, however, derived from a monarchical institution, is still to prevail against the vital elective principle of our own, and if the existing example among ourselves of periodical election of judges by the people be still mistrusted, let us at least not adopt the evil, and reject the good, of the English precedent; let us [Virginia] retain amovability on the concurrence of the executive and legislative branches, and nomination by the executive alone.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 12. FORD ED., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

1889. COURTS (County), Jurisdiction.—The jurisdictions of the judges of the County Courts * * * shall be defined from time to time by the Legislature.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 22. (June 1776.)

1890. COURTS (County), Removal of Judges.—The judges of the County Courts * * * shall be removable for misbehavior by the Court of Appeals.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 22. (June 1776.)

— COURTS (Federal).—See JUDICIARY.

1891. COURTS (Inferior), Judges.—The justices or judges of the inferior court * * * shall be appointed by the governor, on advice of the Council of State.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 450. FORD ED., iii, 329. (1783.)

1892. — — — The justices or judges of the inferior courts may be members of the Legislature.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 450. FORD ED., iii, 330. (1783.)

1893. COURTS (French Plenary), Composition of.—The composition of the Plenary Court is, indeed, vicious in the extreme; but the basis of that court may be retained, and its composition changed. Make of it a representative of the people, by composing it of members sent from the Provincial Assemblies, and it becomes a valuable member of the constitution.—TO COUNT DE MOUSTIER. ii, 388. (P., May 1788.)

1894. — — — Two innovations must be fundamentally condemned: the abolishing, in so great a degree, of the parliaments, and the substitution of so ill-composed a body as the Cour Pleniere. If the King has power to do this, the government of this country is a pure despotism.—TO MR. CUTTING. ii, 438. (P., July 1788.)

1895. — — — The right of registering the laws is taken from the parliaments and transferred to a Plenary court, created by the King. This last is the measure most obnoxious to all persons. Though the members are to be for life, yet a great proportion of them are from descriptions of men always candidates for the royal favor in other lines.—TO JOHN JAY. ii, 391. (P., May 1788.)

1896. COURTS (Monarchical), Character of.—Courts are to be seen as you would see the tower of London, or menagerie of Versailles with their lions, tigers, hyenas and other beasts of prey, standing in the same relation to their fellows. A slight acquaintance with them will suffice to show you that, under the most imposing exterior, they are the weakest and worst part of mankind. Their manners, could you ape them, would not make you beloved in your own country, nor would they improve it could you introduce them there to the exclusion of that honest simplicity now prevailing in America, and worthy of being cherished.—TRAVELLING HINTS. ix, 405. (1788.)

1897. COURTS (Monarchical), Inscrutable.—The designs of these [European] courts are unsearchable.—TO JAMES MONROE. i, 346. FORD ED., iv, 51. (P., 1785.)

1898. COURTS (Monarchical), The People and.—Courts love the people always, as wolves do the sheep.—TO JOHN JAY. ii, 561. (P., 1789.)

1899. COURTS (Monarchical), Unaffectionate.—A court has no affections; but those of the people whom they govern influence their decisions, even in the most arbitrary governments.—TO JAMES MONROE. i, 346. FORD ED., iv, 51. (P., 1785.)

— COURTS (State).—See JUDICIARY.

1900. CRAWFORD (William H.), Presidency and.—A baseless and malicious attack on Mr. Crawford has produced from him so clear, so incontrovertible, and so temperate a justification of himself as to have added much to the strength of his interest. The question will ultimately be, as I suggested in a former letter to you, between Crawford and Adams, with this in favor of Crawford that, although many States have a different first favorite, he is the second with nearly all, and that if it goes into the Legislature he will surely be elected.—TO RICHARD RUSH. FORD ED., x, 305. (M., June 1824.)

1901. CREDIT, American.—The real credit of the United States depends on the ability, and the immutability of their will, to pay their debts.—TO C. W. F. DUMAS. FORD ED., vi, 70. (Pa., 1792.)

1902. — — — We beg * * * to assure the French nation, that among the important reasons which lead us to economize and foster our public credit, a strong one is the desire of preserving to ourselves the means of discharging our debts to them with punctuality and good faith in the terms and sums which have been stipulated between us.—TO EDMOND CHARLES GENET. FORD ED., vi, 295. (Pa., 1793.)

1903. CREDIT, Destroyed.—They [attacks in English newspapers] have destroyed our credit, and thus checked our disposition to luxury; and, forcing our merchants to buy no more than they have ready money to pay for, they force them to go to those markets where that ready money will buy most. Thus * * * they check our luxury, they force us to connect ourselves with all the world, and they prevent foreign emigrations to our country, all of which I consider as advantageous to us.—TO COUNT VAN HOGENDORP. i, 464. FORD ED., iv, 104. (P., 1785.)

1904. — — — I heartily wish the States may, by their contributions, enable you to re-establish a credit, which cannot be lower than at present, to exist at all. This is partly owing to their real deficiencies, and partly to the lies propagated by the London papers, which are probably paid for by the minister, to reconcile the people to the loss of us. * * * Should this produce the amendment of our federal constitution * * * we shall receive a permanent indemnification for a temporary loss.—To SAMUEL OSGOOD. i, 450. (P., 1785.)

1905. — — — Desperate of finding relief from a free course of justice, I look forward to the abolition of all credit as the only other remedy which can take place. I have seen, therefore, with pleasure, the exaggerations of our want of faith with which the London papers teem. It is, indeed, a strong medicine for sensible minds, but it is a medicine. It will prevent their crediting us abroad, in which case we cannot be credited at home.—To A. DONALD. ii, 194. FORD ED., iv, 414. (P., 1787.)

1906. CREDIT, Establishing.—I told the President [Washington] all that was ever necessary to establish our credit, was an efficient government, and an honest one, declaring it would sacredly pay our debts, laying taxes for this purpose and applying them to it.—THE ANAS. ix, 123. FORD ED., i, 205. (Oct. 1792.)

1907. CREDIT, Faith in American.—I had rather trust money in the hands of the United States than in those of any government on earth.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. ii, 121. (P., 1787.)

1908. CREDIT, Funding and.—The funding the public debt will secure to us the credit we now hold at Amsterdam, where our European paper is above par, which is the case of no other nation. Our business is to have great credit and to use it little.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., v, 198. (N.Y., 1790.)

1909. — — — The consolidation and funding their debts will give the French government a credit which then will enable them to do what they please.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 12. FORD ED., v, 88. (P., 1789.)

1910. CREDIT, High.—Our loan in Amsterdam for two and a half millions of florins was filled in two hours and a half after it was opened.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 255. FORD ED., v, 327. (Pa., May 1791.)

1911. CREDIT, Interest and.—The bankers of Holland consider us as the surest nation on earth for the repayment of the capital, but as the punctual payment of interest is of absolute necessity in their arrangements, we cannot borrow but with difficulty and disadvantage.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 374. (P., 1788.)

1912. — — — If the first money operations of the government under the new Constitution are injudiciously begun, correction, whenever they shall be corrected, will come too late. Our borrowings will always be difficult and disadvantageous. If they begin well, our credit will immediately take the first station. Equal provision for the interest, adding to it a certain prospect for the principal, will give us [in Holland] a preference to all nations, the English not excepted.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 376. (P., 1788.)

1913. CREDIT, Low.—American reputation in Europe is not such as to be flattering to its citizens. Two circumstances are particularly objected to us; the non-payment of our debts, and the want of energy in our government. These discourage a connection with us. I own it to be my opinion, that good will arise from the destruction of our credit. I see nothing else which can restrain our disposition to luxury, and to the loss* of those manners which alone can preserve republican government. As it is impossible to prevent credit, the best way would be to cure its ill effects, by giving an instantaneous recovery to the creditor. This would be reducing purchases on credit to purchases for ready money. A man would then see a prison painted on everything he wished, but had not ready money to pay for.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ED., iv, 188. (P., 1786.)

1914. CREDIT, Manufactures and.—If credit alone can be obtained for the manufactures of the country, it will still help to clothe our armies, or to increase at market the necessities our people want.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 206. FORD ED., ii, 134. (Alb., 1777.)

1915. CREDIT, National Existence and.—The existence of a nation having no credit is always precarious.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 376. (P., 1788.)

1916. CREDIT, Necessity of.—The sense of the necessity of public credit is so universal and so deeply rooted, that no other necessity will ever prevail against it.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 401. (M., Nov. 1814.)

1917. CREDIT, Paper, Prices and.—Though the price of public paper is considered as the barometer of the public credit, it is truly so only as to the general average of prices.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. vi, 70. (Pa., 1792.)

1918. CREDIT, Sustaining.—I think nothing can bring the security of our continent and its cause into danger, if we can support the credit of our paper. To do that, I apprehend, one of two steps must be taken. Either to procure free trade by alliance with some naval power able to protect it; or, if we find there is no prospect of that, to shut our ports totally, to all the world, and turn our colonies into manufactories. The former would be most eligible, because most conformable to the habits and wishes of our people.—To BENJ. FRANKLIN. i, 205. FORD ED., ii, 132. (Aug. 1777.)

1919. CREDIT, Taxation and.—It is a wise rule, and should be a fundamental in a government disposed to cherish its credit, and at the same time to restrain the use of it within the limits of its faculties, "never to borrow a dollar without laying a tax in the same instant for paying the interest annually, and the principal within a given term; and to consider that tax as pledged to the creditors on the public faith." On such a pledge as this, sacredly observed, a government may always command, on a reasonable interest, all the lendable money of their citizens, while the necessity of an equivalent tax is a salutary warning to them and their constituents against oppressions, bankruptcy, and its inevitable consequence, revolution. But the term of redemption must be moderate, and at any rate within the limit of their rightful powers. But what limits, it will be asked, does this prescribe to their powers? What is to hinder them from creating a perpetual debt? The laws of nature, I answer. The earth belongs to the living, not to the dead. The will and the power of man expire with his life, by nature's law.—To JOHN W. EPPES. vi, 136. FORD ED., ix, 389. (M., June 1813.)

* "Change" of those manners in the Congress edition.—EDITOR.

1920. CREDIT, Using.—I am anxious about everything which may affect our credit. My wish would be to possess it in the highest degree, but to use it little. Were we without credit, we might be crushed by a nation of much inferior resources, but possessing higher credit.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 374. (P., 1788.)

1921. — —. Though I am an enemy to the using our credit but under absolute necessity, yet the possessing a good credit I consider as indispensable, in the present system of carrying on war.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 376. (P., 1788.)

1922. — —. We consider it as of the first importance to possess the first credit at Amsterdam, and to use it little.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 155. FORD ED., v, 190. (N. Y., 1790.)

1923. CREDIT, War and.—War requires every resource of taxation and credit.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 57. (P., 1788.)

1924. — —. The present system of war renders it necessary to make exertions far beyond the annual resources of the State, and to consume in one year the efforts of many. And this system we cannot change. It remains, then, that we cultivate our credit with the utmost attention.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 374. (P., 1788.) See DEBT.

1925. CREDIT (Private), Evils of.—As it is impossible to prevent credit, the best way would be to cure its ill effects by giving an instantaneous recovery to the creditor. This would be reducing purchases on credit to purchases for ready money. A man would then see a prison painted on everything he wished but had not the ready money to pay for.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ED., iv, 188. (P., 1786.)

1926. CREDULITY, Mankind and.—What is it men cannot be made to believe!—To RICHARD H. LEE. i, 541. FORD ED., iv, 207. (L., 1786.)

1927. CREEK INDIANS, Carthaginians and.—I shall be very glad to receive the con-

jectures of your philosopher on the descent of the Creek Indians from the Carthaginians, supposed to have been separated from Hanno's fleet, during his periphus. I see nothing impossible in his conjecture. I am glad he means to appeal to similarity of language, which I consider as the strongest kind of proof it is possible to adduce. I have somewhere read that the language of the ancient Carthaginians is still spoken by their descendants, inhabiting the mountainous interior parts of Barbary, to which they were obliged to retire by the conquering Arabs. If so, a vocabulary of their tongue can still be got, and if your friend will get one of the Creek languages, the comparison will decide. * * * My wish, like his, is to ascertain the history of the American aborigines.—To E. RUTLEDGE. ii, 434. FORD ED., v, 41. (P., 1788.)

1928. CREEK INDIANS, Civilization of.—The Cherokee nation, consisting now of about 2,000 warriors, and the Creeks of about 3,000 are far advanced in civilization. They have good cabins, enclosed fields, large herds of cattle and hogs, spin and weave their own clothes of cotton, have smiths and other of the most necessary tradesmen, write and read, are on the increase in numbers, and a branch of Cherokees is now instituting a regular representative government. Some other tribes are advancing in the same line.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 62. FORD ED., ix, 358. (M., 1812.) See INDIANS.

1929. CRIME, Adequate punishment.—Whereas, it frequently happens that wicked and dissolute men, resigning themselves to the dominion of inordinate passions, commit violations on the lives, liberties and property of others, and the secure enjoyment of these having principally induced men to enter into society, government would be defective in its principal purpose, were it not to restrain such criminal acts, by inflicting due punishments on those who perpetrate them.—CRIMES BILL. i, 147. FORD ED., ii, 203. (1779.)

1930. — —. The punishment of all real crimes is certainly desirable, as a security to society; the security is greater in proportion as the chances of avoiding punishment are less.—REPORT ON SPANISH CONVENTION. iii, 353. FORD ED., v, 482. (1792.)

1931. CRIME, Breach of Prison.—The law of nature impels every one to escape from confinement; it should not, therefore, be subjected to punishment. Let the legislator restrain his criminal by walls, not parchment. As to strangers breaking prison to enlarge an offender, they should, and may be fairly considered as accessories after the fact.—NOTE TO CRIMES BILL. i, 159. FORD ED., ii, 218. (1779.)

— CRIME, Death Penalty.—See DEATH PENALTY.

1932. CRIME, Disproportionate punishment.—The punishment of crimes against property is, in most countries, immensely disproportionate to the crime. In England, and probably in Canada, to steal a hare, is death the first offence. To steal above the value of twelve pence is death the second offence.—REPORT ON SPANISH CONVENTION. iii, 353. FORD ED., v, 483. (1792.)

1933. CRIME, Flight from debts.—The carrying away of the property of another may be reasonably made to found a civil action. A convention, then, may include forgery and the carrying away the property of others under the head of "Flight from Debts." To remit the fugitive in this case, would be to remit him in every case; for in the present state of things, it is next to impossible not to owe something. But I see neither injustice nor inconvenience in permitting the fugitive to be sued in our courts. The laws of some countries punishing the unfortunate debtor by perpetual imprisonment, he is right to liberate himself by flight, and it would be wrong to reimprison him in the country to which he flies. Let all process, therefore, be confined to his property.—REPORT ON SPANISH CONVENTION. iii, 354. FORD ED., v, 484. (1792.)

1934. CRIME, Forgery.—There is one crime against property, pressed by its consequences into more particular notice, to wit, forgery, whether of coin, or paper; and whether paper, of public, or private obligation. But the fugitive for forgery, is punished by exile and confiscation of the property he leaves. To which, add by Convention a civil action against the property he carries or acquires, to the amount of the special damage done by his forgery.—REPORT ON SPANISH CONVENTION. iii, 354. FORD ED., v, 484. (1792.)

1935. CRIME, Horse-stealing.—The offence of horse-stealing seems properly distinguishable from other larcenies, here, where these animals generally run at large, the temptation being so great and frequent, and the facility of commission so remarkable.*—NOTE ON CRIMES BILL. i, 157. FORD ED., ii, 215. (1779.)

1936. CRIME, Jurisdiction over.—The Constitution of the United States, * * * having delegated to Congress a power to punish treason, counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States, piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations, and no other crimes whatsoever; and it being true, as a general principle, and one of the amendments to the Constitution having also declared, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," therefore the act of Congress, passed on the 14th day of July, 1798, and intituled, "An Act in addition to the act intituled An Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," as also the act passed by them on the — day of June, 1798, intituled,

"An Act to punish frauds committed on the Bank of the United States" (and all other acts which assume to create, define, or punish crimes, other than those so enumerated in the Constitution), are altogether void, and of no force; and that the power to create, define, and punish such other crimes is reserved, and, of right, appertains solely and exclusively to the respective States, each within its own territory.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 465. FORD ED., vii, 292. (1798.)

1937. CRIME, Lex Talionis and.—They [the members of the Revision Committee of the Virginia Code] were agreed * * * that for other felonies [than treason and murder] hard labor in the public works should be substituted, and in some cases, the lex talionis. How this last revolting principle came to obtain our* approbation, I do not remember. There remained, indeed, in our laws, a vestige of it in a single case of a slave; it was the English law, in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, copied probably from the Hebrew Law of "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth," and it was the law of several ancient people; but the modern mind had left it far in the rear of its advances.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 43. FORD ED., i, 60. (1821.)

1938. CRIME, National.—No national crime passes unpunished in the long run.—TO M. DE MARBOIS. vii, 76. (M., 1817.)

1939. CRIME, Natural Laws and.—It is not only vain, but wicked, in a legislator to frame laws in opposition to the laws of nature, and to arm them with the terrors of death. This is truly creating crimes in order to punish them.—NOTE ON CRIMES BILL. i, 159. FORD ED., ii, 218. (1779.)

1940. CRIME, Principles of Punishing.—In forming a scale of crimes and punishments, two considerations have principal weight. 1. The atrocity of the crime. 2. The peculiar circumstances of a country which furnish greater temptations to commit it, or greater facilities for escaping detection. The punishment must be heavier to counterbalance this. Were the first the only consideration, all nations would form the same scale. But, as the circumstances of a country have influence on the punishment, and no two countries exist precisely under the same circumstances, no two countries will form the same scale of crimes and punishments. For example in America, the inhabitants let their horses go at large in the uninclosed lands, which are so extensive as to maintain them altogether. It is easy, therefore, to steal them, and easy to escape. Therefore, the laws are obliged to oppose these temptations with a heavier degree of punishment. For this reason, the stealing of a horse in America is punished more severely than stealing the same value in any other form. In Europe, where horses are confined so securely that it is impossible to steal them, that species of theft need not be punished

* Jefferson was a member of the Committee.—EDITOR.

more severely than any other. In some countries of Europe, stealing fruit from trees is punished capitally. The reason is, that it being impossible to lock fruit trees up in coffers, as we do our money, it is impossible to oppose physical bars to this species of theft. Moral ones are, therefore, opposed by the laws. This, to an unreflecting American, appears the most enormous of all the abuses of power; because he has been used to see fruits hanging in such quantities that if not taken by men, they would rot. He has been used to consider them therefore, as of no value, and as not furnishing materials for the commission of a crime.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 264. FORD ED., iv, 169. (P., 1786.)

1941. CRIMINALS, Reformation of.—A member of society, committing an inferior injury, does not wholly forfeit the protection of his fellow citizens, but after suffering a punishment in proportion to his offence, is entitled to their protection from all greater pain, so that it becomes a duty in the Legislature to arrange, in a proper scale, the crimes which it may be necessary for them to repress, and to adjust thereto a corresponding gradation of punishments.—CRIMES BILL. i, 147. FORD ED., ii, 204. (1779.)

1942. CRITICISM, Canons of.—I have always very much despised the artificial canons of criticism. When I have read a work in prose or poetry, or seen a painting, a statue, &c., I have only asked myself whether it gives me pleasure, whether it is animating, interesting, attaching? If it is, it is good for these reasons.—To WILLIAM WIRT. FORD ED., x, 61. (P.F., 1816.)

1943. CRITICISM, Freedom of.—In mentioning me in your Essays, and canvassing my opinions, you have done what every man has a right to do, and it is for the good of society that that right should be freely exercised. No republic is more real than that of letters, and I am the last in principles, as I am the least in pretensions, to any dictatorship in it. Had I other dispositions, the philosophical and dispassionate spirit with which you have expressed your own opinions in opposition to mine, would still have commanded my approbation.—To NOAH WEBSTER. iii, 201. FORD ED., v, 254. (P., 1790.)

—CROAKINGS OF WEALTH.—See WEALTH.

1944. CRUELTY, British in America.—If M. de Meunier proposes to mention the facts of cruelty of which he * * * spoke yesterday, these facts are: 1. The death of upwards of eleven thousand American prisoners in one prison ship (the Jersey), and in the space of three years. 2. General Howe's permitting our prisoners, taken at the battle of Germantown, and placed under a guard in the yard of the State-house of Philadelphia, to be so long without any food furnished them that many perished with hunger. Where the bodies lay, it was seen that they had eaten all the grass around them within their reach, after they had lost the power of rising, or moving from their place. 3. The second fact was the act of a commanding officer; the first of several commanding officers, and for so long a time as must suppose the approbation of government, itself. But the following was the act of the government itself. During the periods that our affairs seemed unfavorable, and theirs successful, that is to say, after the evacuation of New York, and again, after the taking of Charleston, in South Carolina, they regularly sent our prisoners, taken on the seas and carried to England, to the East Indies. This is so certain, that in the month of November or December, 1785, Mr. Adams having officially demanded a delivery of the American prisoners sent to the East Indies. Lord Carmarthen answered, officially, "that orders were immediately issued for their discharge." M. de Meunier i at liberty to quote this fact. 4. A fact to be ascribed not only to the government, but to the parliament, who passed an act for that purpose in the beginning of the war, was the obliging our prisoners taken at sea to join them, and fight against their countrymen. This they effected by starving and whipping them. * * * The fact is referred to in that paragraph of the Declaration of Independence, which says, "He has constrained our fellow-citizens, taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands." This was the most afflicting to our prisoners of all the cruelties exercised on them. The others affected the body only, but this the mind; they were haunted by the horror of having, perhaps, themselves shot the ball by which a father or a brother fell. Some of them had constancy enough to hold out against half allowance of food and repeated whippings. These were generally sent to England, and from thence to the East Indies. One of them escaped from the East Indies, and got back to Paris, where he gave an account of his sufferings to Mr. Adams.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 277. FORD ED., iv, 183. (P., 1786.)

1945. ——. I doubt whether humanity is the character of the British nation in general. But [your] history, and every one which is impartial, must in its relation of the [American] war show, in such repeated instances, that they conducted it, both in theory and practice, on the most barbarous principles, that the expression here cited* will stand in contradiction to the rest of the work. As examples of their theory, recollect the act of Parliament for constraining our prisoners, taken on the sea, to bear arms against their fathers, brothers, &c. For their practice, recollect the exciting the savages against us, insurrections of our slaves, sending our prisoners to the East Indies, killing them in prison ships, keeping them on half rations, and of the most unwholesome quality, cruel murders of unarmed individuals of every sex, massacres of those in arms after they had asked quarter, &c. &c.—NOTES ON M. SOULES WORK. ix, 300. FORD ED., iv, 308. (P., 1786.)

1946. ——. I confess that when I heard of the atrocities committed by the English troops at Hampton, I did not believe them, but subsequent evidence has placed them beyond doubt. To this has been added information from another quarter which proves the violation of women to be their habitual practice in war. Mr. Hamilton, a son of Alexander Hamilton, of course, a federalist and Anglomaniac, and who was with the British army in Spain, declares it is their constant practice, and that at the taking of Badajoz, he was himself eyewitness to it in the streets, and that the officers did not attempt to restrain it. The information contained in your letter proves it is not merely a recent practice. This is a trait of barbarism, in addition to their encouragement of the savage cruelties, and their brutal treatment of prisoners of war, which I had not attached to their character.—To JOSIAH MEIGS. FORD ED., ix, 419. (M., 1813.) See CORNWALLIS and RETALIATION.

1947. CUBA, Acquisition by United States.—I candidly confess, that I have ever looked on Cuba as the most interesting addition which could ever be made to our system of States. The control which, with Florida Point, this island would give us over the Gulf of Mexico, and the countries an isthmus bordering on it, as well as all those whose waters flow into it, would fill up the measure of our political well-being.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 316. FORD ED., x, 278. (M., 1823.)

1948. ——. Certainly, her addition to our confederacy is exactly what is wanting to round our power as a nation to the point of its utmost interest.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 300. FORD ED., x, 261. (M., June 23, 1823.)

1949. ——. It is better to lie still in readiness to receive that interesting incorporation when solicited by herself.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 300. FORD ED., x, 261. (M., June 1823.)

1950. ——. It will be objected to our receiving Cuba, that no limit can then be drawn to our future acquisitions. Cuba can be defended by us without a navy, and this develops the principle which ought to limit our views. Nothing should ever be accepted which would require a navy to defend it.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 445. (M., 1809.)

1951. ——. Bonaparte, although with difficulty, will consent to our receiving Cuba into our Union, to prevent our aid to Mexico and the other [Spanish] provinces. That would be a price, and I would immediately erect a column on the southernmost limit of Cuba, and inscribe on it a ne plus ultra as to us in that direction.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 444. FORD ED., ix, 25. (M., April 1809.)

1952. CUBA, England, France and.—Patriots of Spain have no warmer friends than the administration of the United States, but it is our duty to say nothing and to do nothing for or against either. If they succeed, we shall be well satisfied to see Cuba and Mexico remain in their present dependence; but very unwilling to see them in that of either France or England, politically or commercially. We consider their interests and ours as the same, and that the object of both must be to exclude all European influence from this hemisphere. * * * These are sentiments which I would wish you to express to any proper characters of either of these two countries, and particularly that we have nothing more at heart than their friendship.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 381. FORD ED., ix, 212. (W., Oct. 1808.)

1953. CUBA, Possession by England.—Cuba alone seems at present to hold up a speck of war to us. Its possession by Great Britain would indeed be a great calamity to us. Could we induce her to join us in guaranteeing its independence against all the world, except Spain, it would be nearly as valuable to us as if it were our own.* But should she take it, I would not immediately go to war for it; because the first war on other accounts will give it to us; or the island will give itself to us, when able to do so.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. vii, 288. FORD ED., x, 257. (M., 1823.)

1954. CUBA, Spain, Bonaparte and.—I suppose the conquest of Spain will soon force a delicate question on you as to the Floridas and Cuba, which will offer themselves to you. Napoleon will certainly give his consent without difficulty to our receiving the Floridas, and with some difficulty possibly Cuba. And though he will disregard the obligation whenever he thinks he can break it with success, yet it has a great effect on the opinion of our people and the world to have the moral right on our side, of his agreement as well as that of the people of those countries.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 442. FORD ED., ix, 251. (M., April 1809.)

1955. CUBA, Spanish Retention of.—I shall sincerely lament Cuba's falling into any hands but those of its present owners. Spanish-America is at present in the best hands for us, and "Chi sta bene, non si muove" should be our motto.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 290. (M., 1808.)

1956. ——. [The Cabinet was] unanimously agreed in the sentiments which should be unauthoritatively expressed by our agents to influential persons in Cuba and Mexico, to wit: "If you remain under the dominion of the Kingdom and family of Spain, we are contented; but we should be extremely unwilling to see you pass under the dominion or ascendancy of France or England. In the latter cases should you choose to declare independence, we cannot now commit ourselves by saying we would make common cause with you, but must reserve ourselves to act according to the then existing circumstances: but in our proceedings we shall be influenced by friendship to you, by a firm belief that our interests are intimately connected, and by the strongest repugnance to see you under subordination to either France or England, either politically or commercially."—ANAS. FORD ED., i, 334. (Oct. 1808.)

—CURRENCY.—See BANKS, DOLLAR, NATIONAL CURRENCY, and MONEY.

* Jefferson wrote, two weeks later, to President Monroe, withdrawing this opinion, it having been "founded on an error of fact," with regard to the existence of an English interest in Cuba, and the possibility of its falling into the possession of Great Britain. "We are surely," said Jefferson, "under no obligation to give her, gratis, an interest which she has not; and the whole inhabitants being averse to her, and the climate mortal to strangers, its continued military occupation by her would be impracticable. It is better, then, to lie still in readiness to receive that interesting incorporation when solicited by herself."—EDITOR.

1957. "CURTIUS," Letters of.—I send you * * * one of the pieces, "Curtius" * * *. It is evidently written by [Alexander] Hamilton, giving a first and general view of the subject, that the public mind might be kept a little in check, till he could resume the subject more at large from the beginning, under his second signature of "Camillus." The piece called "The Features of the Treaty," I do not send, because you have seen it in the newspapers. It is said to be written by Coxe, but I should rather suspect, by Beckley. The antidote is certainly not strong enough for the poison of "Curtius." If I had not been informed the present came from Beckley, I should have suspected it from Jay or Hamilton. I gave a copy or two, by way of experiment, to honest, sound-hearted men of common understanding, and they were not able to parry the sophistry of "Curtius." * * * For God's sake take up your pen, and give a fundamental reply to "Curtius" and "Camillus." *—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 121. FORD ED., vii, 31. (M., Sep. 1795.)

1958. DALRYMPLE (—), Republicanism of.—Mr. Dalrymple, secretary to the legation of Mr. Crawford * * * is a young man of learning and candor, and exhibits a phenomenon I never before met with, that is, a republican born on the north side of the Tweed.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 501. (P., 1785.)

1959. DANCING, Women and.—Dancing is a necessary accomplishment, although of short use; for the French rule is wise, that no lady dances after marriage. This is founded in solid physical reasons.—To N. BURWELL. vii, 102. FORD ED., x, 105. (M., 1818.)

1960. DASHKOFF (M.), Welcome to.—I hail you with particular pleasure, as the first harbinger of those friendly relations with your country [Russia], so desirable to ours.—To M. DASHKOFF. v, 463. (M., Aug. 1809.)

1961. DAVID (Jacques Louis), Paintings of.—We have nothing new and excellent in your charming art of painting. In fact, I do not feel an interest in any pencil but that of David.—To MADAME DE BREHAN. ii, 501. FORD ED., v, 80. (P., 1789.)

1962. DAYTON (Jonathan), Becomes a Federalist.—You will have perceived that Dayton has gone over completely. He expects to be appointed Secretary of War, in the room of M'Henry, who, it is said, will retire. He has been told, as report goes, that they would not have confidence enough in him to appoint him. The desire of inspiring them with more, seems the only way to account for the ecclat which he chooses to give to his conversion.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 211. FORD ED., vii, 202. (P., Feb. 1798.)

1963. DEAD, Binding power of the.—Rights and powers can only belong to persons, not to things, not to mere matter, unendowed with will. The dead are not even things. The particles of matter which composed their bodies make part now of the bodies of other animals, vegetables, or minerals, of a thousand forms. To what, then, are attached the rights and powers they held while in the form of men? A generation may bind itself as long as its majority continues in life; when that has disappeared, another majority is in place, holds all the rights and powers their predecessors once held, and may change their laws and institutions to suit themselves.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 350. (M., 1824.) See EARTH.

† Dayton became implicated with Aaron Burr in his treasonable enterprise, and in August, 1807, applied to Jefferson to be admitted to bail. Jefferson declined on the ground that, "when a person, charged with an offence, is placed in the possession of the judiciary authority, the laws commit to that solely the whole direction of the case; and any interference with it on the part of the Executive would be an encroachment on their independence, and open to just censure."—FORD ED., ix, 126.

1964. DEAD, No Rights attached to.—The dead have no rights. They are nothing; and nothing cannot own something. Where there is no substance, there can be no accident.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 16. FORD ED., x, 44. (M., 1816.) See GENERATIONS.

1965. DEANE (Silas), Official books of.—About three weeks ago, a person called on me and informed me that Silas Deane had taken him in for a sum of one hundred and twenty guineas, and that being unable to obtain any other satisfaction, he had laid hands on his account book and letter book, and had brought them off to Paris, to offer them first to the United States, if they would repay him his money, and if not, that he should return to London, and offer them to the British minister. I desired him to leave them with me four and twenty hours, that I might judge whether they were worth our notice. He did so. They were two volumes. One contained all his accounts with the United States, from his first coming to Europe, to January the 10th, 1781. * * * The other volume contained all his correspondence from March the 30th to August the 23d, 1777. * * * On perusal of many of them, I thought it desirable that they should not come to the hands of the British minister, and from an expression dropped by the possessor of them, I believe he would have fallen to fifty or sixty guineas. I did not think them important enough, however, to justify my purchasing them without authority; though, with authority, I should have done it. Indeed, I would have given that sum to cut out a single sentence, which contained evidence of a fact, not proper to be committed to the hands of enemies. I told him I would state his proposition to you, and await orders.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 454. (P., Aug. 1788.)

1966. ———. A Monsieur Foulloy, who has been connected with Deane, lately offered me for sale two volumes of Deane's letter books and account books, that he had taken instead of money which Deane owed him. I have purchased them on public account. He tells me Deane has still six or eight volumes more, and being to return soon to London, he will try to get them also, in order to make us pay high for them. You are sensible of the impropriety of letting such books get into hands which might make an unfriendly use of them. You are sensible of the immorality of an examiner's selling his secrets for money; and consequently that there can be no immorality in tempting him with money to part with them; so that they may be restored to that government to whom they properly belong. Your former acquaintance with Deane may, perhaps, put it in your power to render our country the service of recovering those books. It would not to do propose it to him as for Congress. * * * I suppose his distresses and his capacious habits will not render him difficult on this head. On the supposition that there are six or eight volumes, I think you might venture as far as fifty guineas, and proportionably for fewer.—To DR. EDWARD BANCROFT. ii, 578. (P., 1789.)

1967. DEANE (Silas), Poverty of.—Silas Deane is coming over to finish his days in America, not having one sou to subsist on elsewhere. He is a wretched monument of the consequences of a departure from right.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 101. FORD ED., v, 114. (P., 1789.)

1968. DEARBORN (Henry), Appointment to Cabinet.—On a review of the characters in the different States proper for the different departments, I have had no hesitation in considering you as the person to whom it would be most advantageous to the public to confide the Department of War. May I hope that you will give your country the aid of your talents?—To HENRY DEARBORN. iv, 356. FORD ED., vii, 496. (W., 1801.)

1969. DEARBORN (Henry), Esteem for.—In public or in private, and in all situations, I shall retain for you the most cordial esteem, and satisfactory recollections of the harmony and friendship with which we have run our race together.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 230. FORD ED., ix, 172. (W., Jan. 1808.)

1970. DEARBORN (Henry), Political Attacks on.—That you as well as myself, and all our brethren, have maligners, who from ill-temper, or disappointment, seek opportunities of venting their angry passions against us, is well known, and too well understood by our constituents to be regarded. No man who can succeed you will have fewer, nor will any one enjoy a more extensive confidence through the nation.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 229. FORD ED., ix, 171. (W., Jan. 1808.)

1971. DEARBORN (Henry), Services of.—The integrity, attention, skill, and economy with which you have conducted your department (War) have given me the most complete and unqualified satisfaction, and this testimony I bear to it with all the sincerity of truth and friendship; and should a war come on, there is no person in the United States to whose management and care I could commit it with equal confidence.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 229. FORD ED., ix, 171. (W., 1808.)

1972. ———. Nor among the incidents of the war, will we forget your services. * * * Your capture of York and Fort George first turned the tide of success in our favor; and the subsequent campaigns sufficiently wiped away the disgrace of the first.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. vi, 450. (M., 1815.)

1973. DEARBORN (Henry), Retirement of.—If it were justifiable to look to your own happiness only, your resolution to retire from all public business could not but be approved. But you are too young to ask a discharge as yet, and the public councils too much reeding the wisdom of our ablest citizens, to relinquish their claim on you. And surely none needs your aid more than your own State.—To GENERAL DEARBORN. vi, 451. (M., March 1815.)

1974. DEATH, Blighted by.—The part you take in my loss makes an affectionate concern for the greatness of it. It is great indeed. Others may lose of their abundance, but I, of my want, have lost even the half of all I had. My evening prospects now hang on the slender thread of a single life. Perhaps I may be destined to see even this last cord of parental affection broken. The hope with which I had looked forward to the moment, when, resigning public cares to younger hands, I was to retire to that domestic comfort from which the last step is to be taken, is fearfully blighted.—To JOHN PAGE. iv, 547. (W., 1804.)

1975. DEATH, A Conqueror.—When you and I look back on the country over which we have passed, what a field of slaughter does it exhibit! Where are all the friends who entered it with us, under all the inspiring energies of health and hope? As if pursued by the havoc of war, they are strewn by the way, some earlier, some later, and scarce a few stragglers remain to count the numbers fallen, and to mark yet, by their own fall, the last footsteps of their party. Is it a desirable thing to bear up through the heat of the action, to witness the death of all our companions, and merely to be the last victim? I doubt it. We have, however, the traveller's consolation. Every step shortens the distance we have to go; the end of our journey is in sight, the bed wherein we are to rest, and to rise in the midst of the friends we have lost.—To JOHN PAGE. iv, 547. (W., 1804.)

1976. DEATH, Decay and.—To me every mail, in the departure of some contemporary, brings warning to be in readiness myself also, and to cease from new engagements. It is a warning of no alarm. When faculty after faculty is retiring from us, and all the avenues to cheerful sensation closing, sight failing now, hearing next, then memory, debility of body, torpidity of mind, nothing remaining but a sickly vegetation, with scarcely the relief of a little locomotion, the last cannot be but a coup de grace.—To MR. JOHN MELISH. vi, 403. (M., 1814.)

1977. DEATH, Generations and.—When we have lived our generation out, we should not wish to encroach on another. I enjoy good health: I am happy in what is around me, yet I assure you I am ripe for leaving all this year, this day, this hour.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 26. (M., 1816.)

1978. ———. There is a ripeness of time for death, regarding others as well as ourselves, when it is reasonable we should drop off, and make room for another growth. When we have lived our generation out, we should not wish to encroach on another.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 26. (M., 1816.)

1979. DEATH, Life and.—When all our faculties have left, or are leaving us, one by one, sight, hearing, memory, every avenue of pleasing sensation is closed, and athymy, debility, and malaise left in their places; when friends of our youth are all gone, and a new generation is risen around us whom we know not, is death an evil? * * * I think not. I have ever dreaded a doting old age; and my health has been generally so good, and is now so good, that I dread it still.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 243. FORD ED., x, 216. (M., 1822.)

1980. DEATH, Meeting after.—Our next meeting must be in the country to which [those years] have flown,—a country for us not now very distant. For this journey we shall need neither gold nor silver in our purse, nor scrip, nor coats, nor staves. Nor is the provision for it more easy than the preparation has been kind. Nothing proves more than this, that the Being who presides over the world is essentially benevolent. Stealing from us, one by one, the faculties of enjoyment, searing our sensibilities, leading us, like the horse in his mill, round and round the same beaten circle, — To see what we have seen,

To taste the tasted, and at each return
Less tasteful; o'er our palates to decant
Another vintage—

Until satiated and fatigued with this leaden iteration, we ask our own congé. I heard once a very old friend, who had troubled himself with neither poets nor philosophers, say the same thing in plain prose, that he was tired of pulling off his shoes and stockings at night and putting them on again in the morning.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. vii, 53. FORD ED., x, 70. (M., 1817.)

1981. DEATH, Prepared for.—Mine is the next turn, and I shall meet it with good will; for after one's friends are all gone before him, and our faculties leaving us, too, one by one, why wish to linger in mere vegetation, as a solitary trunk in a desolate field, from which all its former companions have disappeared.—To MRS. COSWAY. D. L. J., 374. (M., 1820.)

1982. DEATH, Problem of.—The great problem, untried by the living, unreported by the dead.—To M. CORREA. vii, 95. (P.F., 1817.)

• 1983. DEATH, A Time for.—There is a fulness of time when men should go, and not occupy too long the ground to which others have a right to advance.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. vi, 4. FORD ED., ix, 329. (P.F., 1811.)

1984. DEATH PENALTY, Crimes Punishable by.—The General Assembly [of Virginia] shall have no power to pass any law inflicting death for any crime, excepting murder; and those offences in the military service for which they shall think punishment by death absolutely necessary: and all capital punishments in other cases are hereby abolished.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 17. (June 1776.)

1985. — — — No crime shall be henceforth punished by the deprivation of life or limb, except those hereinafter ordained to be so punished.*—CRIMES BILL. i, 148. FORD ED., ii, 205. (1779.)

* Those crimes, so ordained, were treason and murder. When Jefferson made this humane propo-

1986. DEATH PENALTY, Criminal Reform and.—The reformation of offenders, though an object worthy the attention of the laws, is not effected at all by capital punishments, which exterminate instead of reforming, and should be the last melancholy resource against those whose existence is become inconsistent with the safety of their fellow citizens; which also weaken the State, by cutting off so many who, if reformed, might be restored sound members to society, who, even under a course of correction, might be rendered useful in various labors for the public, and would be living and long continued spectacles to deter others from committing the like offences.—CRIMES BILL. i, 147. FORD ED., ii, 204. (1779.)

1987. — — — Beccaria, and other writers on crimes and punishments, had satisfied the reasonable world of the unrightfulness and inefficacy of the punishment of crimes by death; and hard labor on roads, canals and other public works, had been suggested as a proper substitute. The Revisors [of the Virginia laws] had adopted these opinions; but the general idea of our country had not yet advanced to that point. The bill, therefore, for proportioning crimes and punishments, was lost in the House of Delegates by a majority of a single vote. I learned afterwards, that the substitute of hard labor in public, was tried (I believe it was in Pennsylvania) without success. Exhibited as a public spectacle, with shaved heads and mean clothing, working on the high roads, produced in the criminals such a prostration of character, such an abandonment of self-respect, as instead of reforming, plunged them into the most desperate and hardened depravity of morals and character.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 45. FORD ED., i, 62. (1821.)

1988. DEATH PENALTY, Indians and.—It will be worthy the consideration of the Legislature, whether the provisions of the law inflicting on Indians, in certain cases, the punishment of death by hanging, might not permit its commutation into death by military execution, the form of the punishment in the former way being peculiarly repugnant to their ideas, and increasing the obstacles to the surrender of the criminal.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 22. (Jan. 1802.)

1989. DEATH PENALTY, Pardons and.—If all these people are convicted, there will be too many to be punished with death. My hope is that they will send me full statements of every man's case, that the most guilty may be marked as examples, and the less so suffer long imprisonment under reprieves from time to time.—To ALBERT GAL-LATIN. vii, 363. (M., 1808.)

1990. DEBATE, In Congress.—Was there ever a proposition so plain as to pass Congress without a debate?—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 152. FORD ED., iv, 391. (P., 1787.) See 1473, 1571.

sition, the penal code of England comprehended more than two hundred offences, besides treason and murder, punishable by hanging.—EDITOR.

federal constitution * * * we shall receive a permanent indemnification for a temporary loss.—To SAMUEL OSGOOD. i, 450. (P., 1785.)

1905. — — —. Desperate of finding relief from a free course of justice, I look forward to the abolition of all credit as the only other remedy which can take place. I have seen, therefore, with pleasure, the exaggerations of our want of faith with which the London papers teem. It is, indeed, a strong medicine for sensible minds, but it is a medicine. It will prevent their crediting us abroad, in which case we cannot be credited at home.—To A. DONALD. ii, 194. FORD ED., iv, 414. (P., 1787.)

1906. CREDIT, Establishing.—I told the President [Washington] all that was ever necessary to establish our credit, was an efficient government, and an honest one, declaring it would sacredly pay our debts, laying taxes for this purpose and applying them to it.—THE ANAS. ix, 123. FORD ED., i, 205. (Oct. 1792.)

1907. CREDIT, Faith in American.—I had rather trust money in the hands of the United States than in those of any government on earth.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. ii, 121. (P., 1787.)

1908. CREDIT, Funding and.—The funding the public debt will secure to us the credit we now hold at Amsterdam, where our European paper is above par, which is the case of no other nation. Our business is to have great credit and to use it little.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., v, 198. (N.Y., 1790.)

1909. — — —. The consolidation and funding their debts will give the French government a credit which then will enable them to do what they please.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 12. FORD ED., v, 88. (P., 1789.)

1910. CREDIT, High.—Our loan in Amsterdam for two and a half millions of florins was filled in two hours and a half after it was opened.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 255. FORD ED., v, 327. (Pa., May 1791.)

1911. CREDIT, Interest and.—The bankers of Holland consider us as the surest nation on earth for the repayment of the capital, but as the punctual payment of interest is of absolute necessity in their arrangements, we cannot borrow but with difficulty and disadvantage.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 374. (P., 1788.)

1912. — — —. If the first money operations of the government under the new Constitution are injudiciously begun, correction, whenever they shall be corrected, will come too late. Our borrowings will always be difficult and disadvantageous. If they begin well, our credit will immediately take the first station. Equal provision for the interest, adding to it a certain prospect for the principal, will give us [in Holland] a preference to all nations, the English not excepted.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 376. (P., 1788.)

1913. CREDIT, Low.—American reputation in Europe is not such as to be flattering to its citizens. Two circumstances are particularly objected to us; the non-payment of our debts, and the want of energy in our government. These discourage a connection with us. I own it to be my opinion, that good will arise from the destruction of our credit. I see nothing else which can restrain our disposition to luxury, and to the loss* of those manners which alone can preserve republican government. As it is impossible to prevent credit, the best way would be to cure its ill effects, by giving an instantaneous recovery to the creditor. This would be reducing purchases on credit to purchases for ready money. A man would then see a prison painted on everything he wished, but had not ready money to pay for.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ED., iv, 188. (P., 1786.)

1914. CREDIT, Manufactures and.—If credit alone can be obtained for the manufactures of the country, it will still help to clothe our armies, or to increase at market the necessities our people want.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 206. FORD ED., ii, 134. (Alb., 1777.)

1915. CREDIT, National Existence and.—The existence of a nation having no credit is always precarious.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 376. (P., 1788.)

1916. CREDIT, Necessity of.—The sense of the necessity of public credit is so universal and so deeply rooted, that no other necessity will ever prevail against it.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 401. (M., Nov. 1814.)

1917. CREDIT, Paper, Prices and.—Though the price of public paper is considered as the barometer of the public credit, it is truly so only as to the general average of prices.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. vi, 70. (Pa., 1792.)

1918. CREDIT, Sustaining.—I think nothing can bring the security of our continent and its cause into danger, if we can support the credit of our paper. To do that, I apprehend, one of two steps must be taken. Either to procure free trade by alliance with some naval power able to protect it; or, if we find there is no prospect of that, to shut our ports totally, to all the world, and turn our colonies into manufactories. The former would be most eligible, because most conformable to the habits and wishes of our people.—To BENJ. FRANKLIN. i, 205. FORD ED., ii, 132. (Aug. 1777.)

1919. CREDIT, Taxation and.—It is a wise rule, and should be a fundamental in a government disposed to cherish its credit, and at the same time to restrain the use of it within the limits of its faculties, "never to borrow a dollar without laying a tax in the same instant for paying the interest annually, and the principal within a given term; and to consider that tax as pledged to the creditors on the public faith." On such a pledge as this, sacredly observed, a government may always command, on a reasonable interest, all the lendable money of their citizens, while the necessity of an equivalent tax is a salutary warning to them and their constituents against oppressions, bankruptcy, and its inevitable consequence, revolution. But the term of redemption must be moderate, and at any rate within the limit of their rightful powers. But what limits, it will be asked, does this prescribe to their powers? What is to hinder them from creating a perpetual debt? The laws of nature, I answer. The earth belongs to the living, not to the dead. The will and the power of man expire with his life, by nature's law.—To JOHN W. EPPES, vi, 136. FORD ED., ix, 389. (M., June 1813.)

* "Change" of those manners in the Congress edition.—EDITOR.

1920. CREDIT, Using.—I am anxious about everything which may affect our credit. My wish would be to possess it in the highest degree, but to use it little. Were we without credit, we might be crushed by a nation of much inferior resources, but possessing higher credit.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON, ii, 374. (P., 1788.)

1921. — — —. Though I am an enemy to the using our credit but under absolute necessity, yet the possessing a good credit I consider as indispensable, in the present system of carrying on war.—To JAMES MADISON, ii, 376. (P., 1788.)

1922. — — —. We consider it as of the first importance to possess the first credit at Amsterdam, and to use it little.—To C. W. F. DUMAS, iii, 155. FORD ED., v, 190. (N. Y., 1790.)

1923. CREDIT, War and.—War requires every resource of taxation and credit.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON, ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 57. (P., 1788.)

1924. — — —. The present system of war renders it necessary to make exertions far beyond the annual resources of the State, and to consume in one year the efforts of many. And this system we cannot change. It remains, then, that we cultivate our credit with the utmost attention.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON, ii, 374. (P., 1788.) See DEBT.

1925. CREDIT (Private), Evils of.—As it is impossible to prevent credit, the best way would be to cure its ill effects by giving an instantaneous recovery to the creditor. This would be reducing purchases on credit to purchases for ready money. A man would then see a prison painted on everything he wished but had not the ready money to pay for.—To ARCHIBALD STUART, i, 518. FORD ED., iv, 188. (P., 1786.)

1926. CREDULITY, Mankind and.—What is it men cannot be made to believe!—To RICHARD H. LEE, i, 541. FORD ED., iv, 207. (L., 1786.)

1927. CREEK INDIANS, Carthaginians and.—I shall be very glad to receive the con-

jectures of your philosopher on the descent of the Creek Indians from the Carthaginians, supposed to have been separated from Hanno's fleet, during his periplus. I see nothing impossible in his conjecture. I am glad he means to appeal to similarity of language, which I consider as the strongest kind of proof it is possible to adduce. I have somewhere read that the language of the ancient Carthaginians is still spoken by their descendants, inhabiting the mountainous interior parts of Barbary, to which they were obliged to retire by the conquering Arabs. If so, a vocabulary of their tongue can still be got, and if your friend will get one of the Creek languages, the comparison will decide. * * * My wish, like his, is to ascertain the history of the American aborigines.—To E. RUTLEDGE, ii, 434. FORD ED., v, 41. (P., 1788.)

1928. CREEK INDIANS, Civilization of.—The Cherokee nation, consisting now of about 2,000 warriors, and the Creeks of about 3,000 are far advanced in civilization. They have good cabins, enclosed fields, large herds of cattle and hogs, spin and weave their own clothes of cotton, have smiths and other of the most necessary tradesmen, write and read, are on the increase in numbers, and a branch of Cherokees is now instituting a regular representative government. Some other tribes are advancing in the same line.—To JOHN ADAMS, vi, 62. FORD ED., ix, 358. (M., 1812.) See INDIANS.

— CREEK INDIANS, Commerce with.
—See MONOPOLY.

— CRESAP (Captain), Logan and.—See LOGAN.

1929. CRIME, Adequate punishment.—Whereas, it frequently happens that wicked and dissolute men, resigning themselves to the dominion of inordinate passions, commit violations on the lives, liberties and property of others, and the secure enjoyment of these having principally induced men to enter into society, government would be defective in its principal purpose, were it not to restrain such criminal acts, by inflicting due punishments on those who perpetrate them.—CRIMES BILL, i, 147. FORD ED., ii, 203. (1779.)

1930. — — —. The punishment of all real crimes is certainly desirable, as a security to society; the security is greater in proportion as the chances of avoiding punishment are less.—REPORT ON SPANISH CONVENTION, iii, 353. FORD ED., v, 482. (1792.)

1931. CRIME, Breach of Prison.—The law of nature impels every one to escape from confinement; it should not, therefore, be subjected to punishment. Let the legislator restrain his criminal by walls, not parchment. As to strangers breaking prison to enlarge an offender, they should, and may be fairly considered as accessories after the fact.—NOTE TO CRIMES BILL, i, 159. FORD ED., ii, 218. (1779.)

— CRIME, Death Penalty.—See DEATH PENALTY.

1932. CRIME, Disproportionate punishment.—The punishment of crimes against property is, in most countries, immensely dismay pronounce, à fortiori, that a private one cannot be so. If the debt which the banking companies owe be a blessing to anybody, it is to themselves alone, who are realizing a solid interest of eight or ten per cent. on it. As to the public, these companies have banished all our gold and silver medium, which, before their institution, we had without interest, which never could have perished in our hands, and would have been our salvation now in the hour of war; instead of which they have given us two hundred million of froth and bubble, on which we are to pay them heavy interest, until it shall vanish into air as the Morris notes did. We are warranted, then, in affirming that this parody on the principle of "a public debt being a public blessing," and its mutation into the blessing of private instead of public debts, is as ridiculous as the original principle itself. In both cases, the truth is, that capital may be produced by industry, and accumulated by economy; but jugglers only will propose to create it by legerdemain tricks with paper.—To J. W. EPES. vi, 239. FORD ED., ix, 411. (M., Nov. 1813.)

2014. DEBT, Running in.—It is a miserable arithmetic which makes any single privation whatever so painful as a total privation of everything which must necessarily follow the living so far beyond our income. What is to extricate us I know not, whether law, or loss of credit. If the sources of the former are corrupted, so as to prevent justice, the latter must supply its place, leave us possessed of our infamous gains, but prevent all future ones of the same character.—To WILLIAM HAY. ii, 215. (P., 1787.)

2015. — — — How happy a people were we during the war from the single circumstance that we could not run in debt.—To DR. CURRIE. ii, 219. (P., 1787.)

— DEBT, Of the States.—See ASSUMPTION.

2016. DEBT, Thralldom of.—Instead of the unalloyed happiness of retiring unembarrassed and independent, to the enjoyment of my estate, which is ample for my limited views, I have to pass such a length of time in a thralldom of mind never before known to me. Except for this, my happiness would have been perfect.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. v, 509. (M., 1810.)

2017. DEBT, Tormented by.—The torment of mind I endure till the moment shall arrive when I shall not owe a shilling on earth is such really as to render life of little value. I cannot decide to sell my lands. I have sold too much of them already, and they are the only sure provision for my children; nor would I willingly sell the slaves as long as there remains any prospect of paying my debts with their labor. In this I am governed solely by views to their happiness, which will render it worth their while to use extraordinary exertions for some time to enable me to put them ultimately on an easier footing, which I will do the moment they have paid the debts due from the estate, two-thirds of which have been contracted by purchasing them.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. FORD ED., iv, 416. (P., 1787.)

2018. DEBT (French), Assignats and.—I have communicated to the President what passed between us * * * on the subject of the payments made to France by the United States in the assignats of that country, since they have lost their par with gold and silver; and after conferences, by his instruction, with the Secretary of the Treasury, I am authorized to assure you, that the government of the United States have no idea of paying their debt in a depreciated medium, and that in the final liquidation of the payments, which shall have been made, due regard will be had to an equitable allowance for the circumstance of depreciation.* —To JEAN BAPTISTE TERNANT. iii, 294. FORD ED., v, 383. (Pa., Sep. 1791.)

2019. DEBT (French), Complaints of officers.—A second year's interest is become due [to the French officers]. They have presented their demands. There is not money here [Paris] to pay them; the pittance remaining in Mr. Grand's hands being only sufficient to pay current expenses three months longer. The dissatisfaction of these officers is extreme, and their complaints will produce the worst effect. The Treasury Board has not ordered their payment, probably because they knew there would not be money. The amount of their demand is about forty-two thousand livres, and Mr. Grand has in his hands but twelve thousand. I have thought it my duty, under this emergency, to ask you whether you could order that sum for their relief from the funds in Holland? If you can, I am persuaded it will have the best of effects.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 510. (P., 1786.)

2020. — — — The payment of the French officers, the last year, had the happiest effect imaginable. It procured so many advocates for the credit and honor of the United States, who were heard in all companies. It corrected the idea that we were unwilling to pay our debts. I fear that our present failure towards them will give new birth to new imputations, and a relapse of credit.—To THE TREASURY COMMISSIONERS. i, 521. (P., 1786.)

2021. — — — The debt to the officers of France carries an interest of about two thousand guineas, so we may suppose its principal is between thirty and forty thousand. This makes more noise against us than all our other debts put together.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 164. FORD ED., iv, 399. (P., 1787.)

2022. — — — Mr. Adams informs me he has borrowed money in Holland, which, if confirmed by Congress, will enable them to pay not only the interest due here to the foreign officers, but the principal. Let me beseech you to reflect on the expediency of transferring this debt to Holland. All our other debts in Europe do not injure our reputation so much as this. These gentlemen have connections both in and out of office, and these again their connections, so that our default on this article is further known, more blamed, and excites worst

* As written by Jefferson, the letter, after the words "depreciated medium" closed as follows: "and that they will take measures for making these payments in their just value, avoiding all benefit from depreciation, and desiring on their part to be guarded against any unjust loss from the circumstances of mere exchange." It was changed to meet the views of Hamilton.—EDITOR.

dispositions against us, than you can conceive.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 209. FORD ED., iv, 422. (P., 1787.)

2023. DEBT (French), Desire to pay.—

We desire strongly to pay off our debt to France, and for this purpose we will use our credit as far as it will hold good. * * * Under these dispositions and prospects, it would grieve us extremely to see our debt pass into the hands of speculators, and be subjected ourselves to the chicaneries and vexations of private avarice. We desire you, therefore, to dissuade the government * * * from listening to any overtures of that kind, and as to the speculators themselves, whether native or foreign, to inform them without reserve that our government condemns their projects, and reserves to itself the right of paying nowhere but into the Treasury of France.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 253. (Pa., 1791.)

2024. DEBT (French), Payments discontinued.—

We are informed by the public papers that the late constitution of France, formally notified to us, is suspended, and a new convention called. During the time of this suspension, and while no legitimate government exists, we apprehend we cannot continue the payments of our debt to France, because there is no person authorized to receive it, and to give us an unobjectionable acquittal. You are, therefore, desired to consider the payment as suspended, until further orders. Should circumstances oblige you to mention this (which it is better to avoid if you can), do it with such solid reasons as will occur to yourself, and accompany it with the most friendly declarations that the suspension does not proceed from any wish in us to delay the payment, the contrary being our wish, nor from any desire to embarrass or oppose the settlement of their government in that way in which their nation shall desire it; but from our anxiety to pay this debt justly and honorably, and to the persons really authorized by the nation (to whom we owe it) to receive it for their use. Nor shall this suspension be continued one moment after we can see our way clear out of the difficulty into which their situation has thrown us.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 476. FORD ED., vi, 121. (Pa., Oct. 1792.)

2025. DEBT (French), Payments Resumed.—

On the dissolution of the late constitution in France, by removing so integral a part of it as the King, the National Assembly, to whom a part only of the public authority had been delegated, appear to have considered themselves as incompetent to transact the affairs of the nation legitimately. They invited their fellow-citizens, therefore, to appoint a National Convention. In conformity with this their idea of the defective state of the national authority, you were desired from hence to suspend further payments of our debt to France till new orders, with an assurance, however, to the acting power, that the suspension should not be continued a moment longer than should be necessary for us to see the reestablishment of some person or body of persons authorized to receive payment and give us a good acquittal; (if you should find it necessary to give any assurance or explanation at all). In the meantime, we went on paying up the four million of livres which had been destined by the last constituted authorities to the relief of St. Domingo. Before this was completed, we received information that a National Assembly had met, with full powers to transact the affairs of the nation, and soon afterwards, the minister of France here presented an application for three millions of livres, to be laid out in provisions to be sent to France. Urged by the strongest attachment to that country, and thinking it even providential that moneys lent to us in distress could be repaid under like circumstances, we had no hesitation to comply with the application, and arrangements are accordingly taken, for furnishing this sum at epochs accommodated to the demand and our means of paying it. * * * We shall certainly use our utmost endeavors to make punctual payments of the instalments and interest hereafter becoming exigible, and to omit no opportunity of convincing that nation how cordially we wish to serve them.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 521. FORD ED., vi, 199. (Pa., March 1793.)

2026. DEBT (French), Proposition of Genet.—

I cannot but think that to decline the propositions* of M. Genet on the subject of our debt, without assigning any reason at all, would have a very dry and unpleasant aspect indeed. We are then to examine what are our good reasons for the refusal, which of them may be spoken out, and which may not. 1. Want of confidence in the continuance of the present form of government, and consequently that advances to them might commit us with their successors. This cannot be spoken out. 2. Since they propose to take the debt in produce, it would be better for us that it should be done in moderate masses yearly, than all in one year. This cannot be professed. 3. When M. de Calonne was Minister of Finance, a Dutch company proposed to buy up the whole of our debt, by dividing it into actions or shares. I think M. Claviere, now Minister of Finance, was their agent. It was observed to M. de Calonne, that to create such a mass of American paper, divide it into shares, and let them deluge the market, would depreciate the rest of our paper, and our credit in general; that the credit of a nation was a delicate and important thing, and should not be risked on such an operation. M. de Calonne, sensible of the injury of the operation to us, declined it. In May, 1791, there came, through Mr. Otto, a similar proposition from Schweizer, Jeanneret & Co. We had a communication on the subject from Mr. Short, urging this same reason strongly. It was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, in a letter to yourself, assigned the reasons against it, and these were communicated to Mr. Otto, who acquiesced in them. This objection, then, having been sufficient to decline the proposition twice before, and having been urged to the two preceding forms of government (the ancient and that of 1791), will not be considered by them as founded in objections to the present form. 4. The law allows the whole debt to be paid only on condition it can be done on terms advantageous to the United States. The minister foresees this objection, and thinks he answers it by observing the advantage which the payment in produce will occasion. It would be easy to show that this was not the sort of advantage the Legislature meant, but a lower rate of interest. 5. I cannot but suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury * * * would, on examination, be able to derive practical objections from them. We pay to France but five per cent. The people of this country would never subscribe their money for less than six. If, to remedy this, obligations at less than five per cent. were offered, and accepted by M. Genet, he must part with them immediately, at a considerable discount, to indemnify the loss of the one per cent., and at still greater discount to bring them down to par with our present six per cent., so that the operation would be equally disgraceful to us and losing to them, &c., &c. I think it very material myself to keep alive the friendly sentiments of that country, so far as can be done without risking war or double payment. If the instalments falling due this year can be advanced, without incurring those dangers, I should be for doing it. We now see by the declaration of the Prince of Saxe Coburg, on the part of Austria and Prussia, that the ultimate point they desire is to restore the constitution of 1791. Were this even to be done before the pay days of this year, there is no doubt in my mind but that that government (as republican as the present, except in the form of its Executive) would confirm an advance so moderate in sum and time. I am sure the nation of France would never suffer their government to go to war with us for such a bagatelle, and the more surely if that bagatelle shall have been granted by us so as to please and not displease the nation; so as to keep their affections engaged on our side. So that I should have no fear in advancing the instalments of this year at epochs convenient to the Treasury. But at any rate I should be for assigning reasons for not changing the form of the debt.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 575. FORD ED., vi, 287. (June 1793.)

2027. DEBT (French), Reply to Genet.—The instalments as they are settled by convention between the two nations far exceed the ordinary resources of the United States. To accomplish them completely and punctually, we are obliged to anticipate the revenues of future terms by loans to as great an extent as we can prudently attempt. As they are arranged however by the convention, they give us time for successive and gradual efforts. But to crowd these anticipations all into a single one, and that to be executed, in the present instant, would more than hazard that state of credit, the preservation of which can alone enable us to meet the different payments at the time agreed on. To do even this hitherto, has required in the operations of borrowing, time, prudence and patience; and these operations are still going on in all the extent they will bear. To press them beyond this, would be to defeat them both now and hereafter.—To EDMOND CHARLES GENET. FORD ED., vi, 294. (Pa., June 1793.)

2028. DEBT (French), Speculators and.—I am of opinion, as I always have been, that the purchase of our debt to France by private speculators, would have been an operation extremely injurious to our credit; and that the consequence foreseen by our banker, that the purchasers would have been obliged, in order to make good their payments, to deluge the markets of Amsterdam with American paper of all sorts, and to sell it at any price, was a probable one. And the more so, as we know that the particular individuals who were engaged in that speculation, possess no means of their own adequate to the payments they would have had to make. While we must not doubt that these motives, together with a proper regard for the credit of the United States, had real and full weight with our bankers towards inducing them to counterwork these private speculations; yet, to ascribe their industry in this business wholly to these motives, might lead to a too great and dangerous confidence in them. It was obviously their interest to defeat all such speculations, because they tended to 'take out of their hands, or at least to divide with them, the profits of the great operation of transferring the French debt to Amsterdam, an object of first rate magnitude to them, and on the undivided enjoyments of which they might count, if private speculators could be baffled. It has been a contest of dexterity and cunning, in which our champions have obtained the victory. The manœuvre of opening a loan of three millions of florins, has, on the whole, been useful to the United States, and though unauthorized, I think should be confirmed. The measure proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of sending a superintendent of their future operations, will effectually prevent their doing the like again, and the funding laws leave no danger that such an expedient might at any future time be useful to us.—OPINION ON FOREIGN DEBT. vii, 506. FORD ED., vi, 231. (August 1790.)

2029. DEBT (French), Transfer to Holland.—It being known that M. de Calonne, the Minister of Finance, is at his wit's ends to raise supplies for the ensuing year, a proposition has been made him by a Dutch company to purchase the debt of the United States to this country [France] for seventy millions of livres in hand. His necessities dispose him to accede to the proposition; but a hesitation is produced by the apprehension that it might lessen our credit in Europe, and perhaps be disagreeable to Congress. I have been consulted here only by the agent for that company. I informed him that I could not judge what effect it might have on our credit, and was not authorized either to approve or disapprove of the transaction. I have since reflected on this subject. If there be a danger that our payments may not be punctual, it might be better that the discontents which would thence arise should be transferred from a court, of whose goodwill we have so much need, to the breasts of a private company. But it has occurred to me, that we might find occasion to do what would be grateful to this court, and establish with them a confidence in our honor. I am informed that our credit in Holland is sound. Might it not be possible, then, to borrow the four and twenty millions due to this country and thus pay them their whole debt at once? This would save them from any loss on our account. Is it liable to the objection of impropriety in creating new debts before we have more certain means of paying them? It is only transferring from one creditor to another, and removing the causes of discontent to persons with whom they would do us less injury.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 28. (P., September 1786.)

2030. — I think it would be advisable to have our debt transferred to individuals of your country [Holland]. There could, and would be no objection to the guarantee remaining as you propose; and a postponement of the first payments of capital would surely be a convenience to us. For though the resources of the United States are great and growing, and their dispositions good, yet their machine is new, and they have not got it to go well. It is the object of their general wish at present, and they are all in movement, to set it in a good train; but their movements are necessarily slow. They will surely effect it in the end, because all have the same end in view; the difficulty being only to get all the thirteen States to agree on the same means.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. ii, 120. (P., 1787.)

2031. — Would to heaven Congress would authorize you to transfer the debt of France to Holland before you leave Europe.

Most especially is it necessary to get rid of the debt to the officers. Their connections at Court are such as to excite very unfavorable feelings there against us, and some very hard things have been said (particularly in the Assemblée des Notables) on the prospect relative to our debts. The payment of the interest to the officers would have kept them quiet; but there are two years now due to them. I dare not draw for it without instructions.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 181. (P., 1787.)

2032. DEBT (Revolutionary), Divisions of.—The first and great division of our federal debt, is, into 1, foreign; and 2, domestic. The foreign debt comprehends, 1, the loan from the government of Spain; 2, the loans from the government of France, and from the Farmers General; 3, the loans negotiated in Holland by order of Congress. This branch of our debt stands absolutely singular; no man in the United States having ever supposed that Congress, or their legislatures, can, in any wise, modify or alter it. They justly view the United States as the one party, and the lenders as the other, and that the consent of both would be requisite, were any modification to be proposed. But with respect to the domestic debt, they consider Congress as representing both the borrowers and lenders, and that the modifications which have taken place in this have been necessary to do justice between the two parties, and that they flowed properly from Congress as their mutual umpire. The domestic debt comprehends, 1, the army debt; 2, the loan office debt; 3, the liquidated debt; and 4, the unliquidated debt. The first term includes debts to the officers and soldiers for pay, bounty and subsistence. The second term means moneys put into the loan office of the United States. The third comprehends all debts contracted by quarter-masters, commissaries, and others duly authorized to procure supplies for the army, and which have been liquidated (that is, settled) by commissioners appointed under the resolution of Congress, of June 12, 1780, or by the officers who made the contract. The fourth comprehends the whole mass of debts, described in the preceding article, which have not yet been liquidated. These are in a course of liquidation and are passing over daily into the third class.

* * * No time is fixed for the payment of the debts of this third class, that is the liquidated debt; no fund is yet determined, nor any firm provision for the interest in the meantime. The consequence is that the certificates of these debts sell greatly below par. When I left America, they could be bought for from two shillings and sixpence to fifteen shillings in the pound; this difference proceeding from the circumstance of some States having provided for paying the interest on those due in their own State, which others had not. Hence, an opinion had arisen with some, and propositions had even been made in the legislatures, for paying off the principal of these debts with what they had cost the holder, and interest on that. This opinion is far from being general, and I think will not prevail. But it is among possible events.—To MESSRS. VAN STAPHORST. i, 471. FORD ED., iv, 106. (P., 1785.)

2033. DEBT (Revolutionary), Foreign.—As to the foreign debt, Congress is considered as the representative of one party only, and I think I can say with truth, that there is not one single individual in the United States, either in or out of office, who supposes they can ever do anything which might impair their foreign contracts.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 155. FORD ED., v, 190. (N.Y., 1790.)

— DEBT (Revolutionary), Funding of.
—See ASSUMPTION.

2034. DEBT (Revolutionary), Payment of.—I am in hopes you will persuade the States to commit their commercial arrangements to Congress and to enable them to pay their debts, interest and capital.—To EDWARD RANDOLPH. ii, 211. (P., 1787.)

2035. DEBT (Revolutionary), Payments on.—The public effects of the United States, such as their paper bills of credit, loan office bills, &c., were a commodity which varied its value from time to time. A scale of their value for every month has been settled according to what they sold for at market, in silver or gold. This value in gold or silver, with an interest of six per cent. annually till payment, is what the United States pay. This they are able to pay; but were they to propose to pay off all their paper, not according to what it cost the holder, in gold or silver, but according to the sum named in it, their whole country, if sold, and all their persons into the bargain, might not suffice. They would, in this case, make a bankruptcy where none exists, as an individual would, who being very able to pay the real debts he has contracted, would undertake to give to every man fifty times as much as he had received from him.—To M. TROUCHIN. ii, 360. (P., 1788.)

2036. DEBT (Revolutionary), Principle of Payment.—The principle on which it [the paper money debt] shall be paid I take to be settled, though not directly, yet virtually, by the resolution of Congress of June 3d, 1784; that is, that they will pay the holder, or his representative, what the money was worth at the time he received it, with an interest from that time of six per cent. per annum.—To H. S. CREVECOEUR. i, 595. FORD ED., iv, 253. (P., July 1786.)

2037. — — — It is not our desire to pay off those bills [of exchange] according to the present depreciation, but according to their actual value in hard money, at the time they were drawn with interest. The State having received value, so far as it is just it should be substantially paid.—To VA. DEL. IN CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 500. (R., 1781.)

2038. — — — The loan office certificates will be settled by the table of depreciation at their true worth in gold or silver at the time the paper dollars were lent. On that true value the interest has been paid, and continues to be paid to the creditors annually in America. That the principal will also be paid is as sure as any future fact can be.—To MESSRS. DELAP. ii, 102. (P., 1787.)

2039. DEBT (Revolutionary), Redemption of Domestic.—No man in America ever entertained a doubt that our foreign debt is to be paid fully; but some people in America have seriously contended, that the certificates and other evidences of our domestic debt, ought to be redeemed only at what they have cost the holder. * * * But this is very far from being a general opinion; a very great majority being firmly decided that they shall be paid fully. Were I the holder of any of them, I should not have the least fear of their full payment.—To MESSRS. VAN STAPHORST. i, 369. FORD ED., iv, 78. (P., 1785.)

government [under the Constitution] should be some operation whereby they may assume to themselves the [first] station [in point of credit]. Their European debts form a proper subject for this. Digest the whole, public and private, Dutch, French and Spanish, into a table, showing the sum of interest due every year, and the portions of principal payable the same year. Take the most certain branch of revenue, and one which shall suffice to pay the interest, and leave such a surplus as may accomplish all the payments of the capital, at terms somewhat short of those at which they will become due. Let the surpluses of those years, in which no reimbursement of principal falls, be applied to buy up our paper on the exchange of Amsterdam, and thus anticipate the demands of principal. In this way, our paper will be kept up at par; and this alone will enable us to command in four and twenty hours, at any time, on the exchange of Amsterdam, as many millions as that capital can produce. The same act, which makes this provision for the existing debts, should go on to open a loan to their whole amount; the produce of that loan to be applied, as fast as received, to the payment of such parts of the existing debts as admit of payment. The rate of interest to be as the government should privately instruct their agent, because it must depend on the effect these measures would have on the exchange. Probably it could be lowered from time to time.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 377. (P., 1788.)

2041. DEBT (Revolutionary), Soundness of.—As a private individual and citizen of America, I can with propriety and truth deliver it to you as my firm belief, that the loan office certificate you showed me, and all others of the same kind, will be paid, principal and interest, as soon as the circumstances of the United States will permit; that I do not consider this as a distant epoch, nor suppose there is a public debt on earth less doubtful.—To M. DIRIEKS. ii, 422. (P., 1788.)

2042. DEBT (Revolutionary), Speculation and.—In consequence of [the acceptance by nine States of the new Constitution] speculations are already begun here [Paris], to purchase up our domestic liquidated debt. Indeed, I suspect that orders may have been previously lodged in America to do this, as soon as the new Constitution was accepted effectually. If it is thought that this debt should be retained at home, there is not a moment to lose; and I know of no means of retaining it but those I suggested to the Treasury Board. The transfer of these debts to Europe, will exclusively embarrass, and perhaps totally prevent the borrowing any money in Europe, till these shall be paid off. This is a momentous object, and in my opinion should receive instantaneous attention.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 455. (P., Aug. 1788.)

2043. DEBT (Revolutionary), Transfer of Domestic.—If the transfer of the [domestic] debts to Europe meet with any encouragement from us, we can no more borrow money here, let our necessities be what they will. For who will give ninety-six per cent. for the foreign obligations of the same nation, whose domestic ones can be bought at the same market for fifty-five per cent.; the former, too, bearing an interest of only five per cent., while the latter yields six? If any discouragements can be honestly thrown on this transfer, it would seem advisable, in order to keep the domestic debt at home. It would be a very effectual one, if, instead of the title existing in the Treasury books alone, it was made to exist in loose papers, as our loan office debts do. The European holder would then be obliged to risk the title paper of his capital, as well as his interest, in the hands of his agents in America, whenever the interest was to be demanded; whereas, at present, he trusts him with the interest only. This single circumstance would put a total stop to all future sales of domestic debt at this market. [Amsterdam].—To THE TREASURY BOARD. ii, 368. (A., 1788.)

2044. DEBT (Revolutionary), Western Lands and.—It is made a fundamental that the proceeds [of the sale of our lands] shall be solely and sacredly applied as a sinking fund to discharge the capital only of the [national] debt.—To COUNT VAN HAGENDORP. i, 466. (P., 1785.)

2045. — — — It will be yet a twelve-month before we shall be able to judge of the efficacy of our Land office to sink our national debt. It is made a fundamental, that the proceeds shall be solely and sacredly applied as a sinking fund to discharge the capital only of the debt.—To COUNT VAN HOGENDORP. i, 466. FORD ED., iv, 106. (P., 1785.)

2046. — — — I am uneasy at seeing that the sale of our western lands is not yet commenced. That precious fund for the immediate extinction of our debt will, I fear, be suffered to slip through our fingers. Every delay exposes it to events which no human foresight can guard against.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 153. FORD ED., iv, 391. (P., 1787.)

2047. — — — I am very much pleased to hear that our western lands sell so successfully. I turn to this precious resource as that which will in every event liberate us from our domestic debt, and perhaps too from our foreign one; and this much sooner than I had expected.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 333. FORD ED., iv, 481. (P., 1787.)

2048. — — — I am much pleased that the sale of western lands is so successful. I hope they will absorb all the certificates of our domestic debt speedily, in the first place, and that then, offered for cash, they will do the same by our foreign one.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 328. FORD ED., iv, 475. (P., 1787.)

2049. DEBT (United States), Dangers of.—I place economy among the first and most important of republican virtues, and public debt as the greatest of the dangers to be feared.—To GOVERNOR PLUMER. vii, 19. (M., 1816.)

2050. DEBT (United States), Economy and.—I am for applying all the possible savings of the public revenue to the discharge of the national debt.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.)

2051. DEBT (United States), Evils of.—If we run into such debts, as that we must be taxed in our meat and in our drink, in our necessities and our comforts, in our labors and our amusements, for our callings and our creeds, as the people of England are, our people, like them, must come to labor sixteen hours in the twenty-four, give the earnings of fifteen of these to the government for their debts and daily expenses; and the sixteenth being insufficient to afford us bread, we must live, as they now do, on oatmeal and potatoes; have no time to think, no means of calling the mismanagers to account; but be glad to obtain subsistence by hiring ourselves out to rivet their chains on the necks of our fellow-sufferers.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 14. FORD ED., x, 41. (M., 1816.)

2052. DEBT (United States), Increasing.—A further assumption of State debt has been proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury [in order to raise money]. It has been rejected by a small majority; but the chickens of the treasury have so many contrivances, and are so indefatigable within doors and without, that we all fear they will get it in yet some way or other.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. iii, 348. FORD ED., 505. (Pa., 1792.)

2053. — — —. I am not for increasing, by every device, the public debt, on the principle of its being a public blessing.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.)

2055. — — —. The growth and entailment of a public debt is an indication soliciting the employment of the pruning knife.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 212. FORD ED., x, 188. (M., 1821.)

2056. DEBT (United States), Independence and.—To preserve our independence, we must not let our rulers load us with perpetual debt. We must make our election between economy and liberty, or profusion and servitude.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 14. FORD ED., x, 41. (M., 1816.)

2057. DEBT (United States), Interest.—I once thought that in the event of a war we should be obliged to suspend paying the interest of the public debt. But a dozen years more of experience and observation on our people and government, have satisfied me it will never be done. The sense of the necessity of public credit is so universal and so deeply rooted, that no other necessity will prevail against it.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 401. (M., Nov. 1814.)

2058. DEBT (United States), Louisiana and.—Should the acquisition of Louisiana be constitutionally confirmed and carried into effect, a sum of nearly thirteen millions of dollars will then be added to our public debt, most of which is payable after fifteen years; before which term the present existing debts will all be discharged by the established operation of the sinking fund.—THIRD ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 27. FORD ED., viii, 271. (Oct. 1803.)

sary manufactures among ourselves, the proof that our government is solid, can stand the shock of war, and is superior even to civil schism, are precious facts for us; and of these the strongest proofs were furnished, when, with four eastern States tied to us, as dead to living bodies, all doubt was removed as to the achievements of the war, had it continued. But its best effect has been the complete suppression of party. The federalists who were truly American (and their great mass was so), have separated from their brethren who were mere Anglomens, and are received with cordiality into the republican ranks.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 66. FORD ED., x, 83. (M., 1817.)

2060. DEBT (United States), Payment of.—It is proposed to provide additional funds, to meet the additional debt [assumption], by a tax on spirituous liquors, foreign and home-made, so that the whole interest will be paid by taxes on consumption. If a sufficiency can now be raised in this way to pay the interest at present, its increase by the increase of population (suppose five per cent. per annum), will alone sink the principal within a few years, operating as it will in the way of compound interest. Add to this what may be done by throwing in the aid of western lands and other articles as a sinking fund, and our prospect is really a bright one.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 198. FORD ED., v, 250. (Pa., 1790.)

2061. — — —. No man is more ardently intent to see the public debt soon and sacredly paid off than I am. This exactly marks the difference between Colonel Hamilton's views and mine, that I would wish the debt paid to-morrow; he wishes it never to be paid, but always to be a thing wherewith to corrupt and manage the Legislature.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 464. FORD ED., vi, 105. (M., 1792.)

2062. — — —. The simple question appears to me to be what did the public owe, principal and interest, when the Secretary's [Hamilton's] taxes began to run? If less, it must have been paid; but if he was paying old debts with one hand and creating new ones with the other, it is such a game as Mr. Pitt is playing.—To JAMES MADISON. vi, 113. (M., Sep. 1792.)

2063. — — —. The honest payment of our debts, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently, [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.)

2064. — — —. The economies [of the first republican Congress] have enabled us to suppress all the internal taxes, and still to make such provision for the payment of the public debt as to discharge that in eighteen years.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 430. (W., April 1802.)

degree, on the extinguishment of the public debt before we engage in any war; because that done, we shall have revenue enough to improve our country in peace and defend it in war, without recurring either to new taxes or loans. But if the debt should once more be swelled to a formidable size, its entire discharge will be despaired of, and we shall be committed to the English career of debt, corruption and rottenness, closing with revolution. The discharge of the public debt, therefore, is vital to the destinies of our government, and it hangs on Mr. Madison and yourself alone. We shall never see another President and Secretary of the Treasury making all their objects subordinate to this. Were either of you to be lost to the public, that great hope is lost.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v. 477. FORD ED., ix, 264. (M., 1809.)

2066. — — —. There are two measures which if not taken we are undone. * * * [The second* is] to cease borrowing money, and to pay off the national debt. If this cannot be done without dismissing the army, and putting the ships out of commission, haul them up high and dry, and reduce the army to the lowest point at which it was ever established. There does not exist an engine so corruptive of the government and so demoralizing of the nation as a public debt. It will bring on us more ruin at home than all the enemies from abroad against whom this army and navy are to protect us. What interest have we in keeping ships in service in the Pacific Ocean? To protect a few speculative adventurers in a commerce dealing in nothing in which we have an interest. As if the Atlantic and Mediterranean were not large enough for American capital! As if commerce and not agriculture was the principle of our association.—To NATHANIEL MACON. FORD ED., x, 193. (M., Aug. 1821.)

2067. DEBT (United States), Perpetuation of.—As the doctrine is that a public debt is a public blessing, so they think a perpetual one is a perpetual blessing, and therefore wish to make it so large that we can never pay it off.—To NICHOLAS LEWIS. iii, 348. FORD ED., v, 505. (Pa., April 1792.)

2068. DEBT (United States), Prosperity and.—We are ruined if we do not overrule the principles that "the more we owe, the more prosperous we shall be"; "that a public debt furnishes the means of enterprise"; "that if ours should be once paid off, we should incur another by any means however extravagant."—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., v, 320. (Pa., 1791.)

2069. DEBT (United States), Public Faith and.—The payments made in discharge of the principal and interest of the national debt, will show that the public faith has been exactly maintained.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 11. FORD ED., viii, 121. (Dec. 1801.)

* The first was to arrest the progress of centralization under the decisions of the Supreme Court.—TOR.

2070. — — —. To preserve the faith of the nation by an exact discharge of its debts and contracts * * * [is one of] the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 21. FORD ED., viii, 187. (Dec. 1802.)

2072. DEBT (United States), Reduction of.—The receipts of external duties for the last twelve months have exceeded those of any former year, and the ratio of increase has been also greater than usual. This has enabled us to answer all the regular exigencies of government, to pay from the treasury in one year upwards of eight millions of dollars, principal and interest, of the public debt, exclusive of upwards of one million paid by the sale of bank stock, and making in the whole a reduction of nearly five millions and a half of principal; and to have now in the treasury four millions and a half of dollars, which are in a course of application to a further discharge of debt and current demands.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 18. FORD ED., viii, 184. (Dec. 1802.)

2073. — — —. The amount of debt paid for the year ending September 30, 1803, is about three millions one hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of interest, and making, with the payment of the preceding year, a discharge of more than eight millions and a half of dollars of the principal of that debt, besides the accruing interest; and there remain in the treasury nearly six millions of dollars.*—THIRD ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 26. FORD ED., viii, 271. (Oct. 1803.)

2075. — — —. The receipts * * * during the year * * * have exceeded the sum of thirteen millions of dollars, which with not quite five millions in the treasury at the beginning of the year, have enabled us, after meeting other demands, to pay nearly two millions of the debt contracted under the British treaty and convention, upwards of four millions of principal of the public debt.

and four millions of interest. These payments, with those which had been made in three years and a half preceding, have extinguished of the funded debt nearly eighteen millions of principal.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 52. FORD ED., viii, 395. (Dec. 1805.)

2079. DEBT (United States), Republicans and.—An alarm has been endeavored to be sounded as if the republican interest was indisposed to the payment of the public debt. Besides the general object of the calumny, it was meant to answer the special one of electioneering. Its falsehood was so notorious that it produced little effect.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii, 493. FORD ED., vi, 143. (Pa., Dec. 1792.)

2080. DEBT (United States), Sacredness of.—The evidences of the public debt are solid and sacred. I presume there is not a man in the United States who would not part with his last shilling to pay them.—To FRANCIS EPPES. FORD ED., v, 507. (Pa., April 1792.)

2081. ——. There can never be a fear but that the paper which represents the public debt will be ever sacredly good. The public faith is bound for this, and no change of system will ever be permitted to touch this; but no other paper stands on ground equally sure.—To WILLIAM SHORT. iii, 343. FORD ED., v, 460. (Pa., March 1792.)

2082. DEBT (United States), Statements of.—An accurate statement of the original amount and subsequent augmentations or diminutions of the public debt, to be continued annually [in the message to Congress], is an article on which we have conferred before. A similar statement of the annual expenses of the government for a certain period back, and to be repeated annually, is another wholesome necessity we should impose on ourselves and our successors.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 181. (W., Dec. 1802.)

2083. DEBT (United States), Time and.—No nation can make a declaration against the validity of long-contracted debts, so disinterestedly as we, since we do not owe a shilling which will not be paid with ease, principal and interest, by the measures you [the new government] have taken, within the time of our own lives.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 108. FORD ED., v, 123. (P., 1789.) See GENERATIONS.

2084. DEBT (United States), Wars and.—Our distance from the wars of Europe, and our disposition to take no part in them, will, we hope, enable us to keep clear of the debts which they may occasion to other powers.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 155. FORD ED., v, 190. (N.Y., 1790.)

2085. DEBT (United States), Wars for Commerce and.—No earthly consideration could induce my consent to contract such a debt as England has by her wars for commerce, to reduce our citizens by taxes to such wretchedness, as that laboring sixteen of the twenty-four hours, they are still unable to afford themselves bread, or barely to earn as much oatmeal or potatoes as will keep soul and body together. And all this to feed the avidity of a few millionaire merchants, and to keep up one thousand ships of war for the protection of their commercial speculations.—To WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. vii, 7. 2086. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, British government and.—It is uncertain how far we should have been able to accommodate our opinions [in the settlement of the debts]. But the absolute aversion of the [British] government to enter into any arrangement [with Mr. Adams and myself] prevented the object from being pursued. Each country is left to do justice to itself and to the other, according to its own ideas, as to what is past; and to scramble for the future as well as they can; to regulate their commerce by duties and prohibitions and, perhaps, by cannons and mortars; in which event, we must abandon the ocean, where we are weak, leaving to neutral nations the carriage of our commodities; and measure with them on land, where they alone can lose.*—To JAMES ROSS. i, 562. FORD ED., iv, 218. (P., 1786.)

2087. ——. I wish it were in my power to inform you that arrangements were at length taken between the two nations for carrying into complete execution the late treaty of peace, and for settling those conditions which are essential to the continuance of a commerce between them. I suppose all arrangement is thought unnecessary here [London], as the subject has not been deemed worthy of a conference [with Mr. Adams and myself]. Both nations are left to pursue their own measures, and it is not easy to foresee what these will be.—To ALEXANDER McCaul. FORD ED., iv, 202. (L., April 1786.)

2088. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, Executions for.—The immensity of the [Virginia] debt [to British creditors] was another reason for forbidding such a mass of property to be offered for sale under execution at once, as, from the small quantity of circulating money, it must have been sold for little or nothing, whereby the creditor would have failed to receive his money, and the debtor would have lost his whole estate without being discharged of his debt.†—REPORT TO CONGRESS. ix, 241. FORD ED., iv, 127. (1785.)

2089. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, Interest on.—It is a general sentiment in America that the principal of these debts should be paid, and that that alone is stipulated by the treaty. But they [the British] think the interest also which arose before and since the war, is justly due. They think it would be as unjust to demand interest during the war. They urge that during that time they could not pay the debt, for that of the remittances attempted, two-thirds on an average were taken by the nation to whom they were due; that during that period they had no use of the money, as from the same circumstances of capturing their produce on the sea, tobacco sold at 5s. the hundred, which was not sufficient to bear the expenses of the estate; that they paid taxes and other charges on the property during that period, and stood its insurers in the ultimate event of the war. They admit, indeed, that such individual creditors, as were not engaged in privateering against them, have lost this interest; but that it was the fault of their own nation, and that this is the case where both parties having lost, each may justifiably endeavor to save himself. Setting aside this portion of the interest, I am persuaded the debts in America are generally good, and that there is an honest intention to pay them.—To ALEXANDER McCaul. FORD ED., iv, 203. (L., 1786.)

† Report to Congress of a conference with Count de Vergennes, respecting commercial arrangements.—EDITOR.

2090. ——. While the principal, and interest preceding and subsequent to the war, seem justly due from us [to the British], that which accrued during the war does not. Interest is a compensation for the use of money. Their money, in our hands, was in the form of lands and negroes. Tobacco, the produce of these lands and negroes (or as I may call it, the interest of them), being almost impossible of conveyance to the markets of consumption, because taken by themselves in its way there, sold during the war, at five or six shillings the hundred. This did not pay taxes, and for tools and other plantation charges. A man who should have attempted to remit to his creditor tobacco, for either principal or interest, must have remitted it three times before one cargo would have arrived safe; and this from the depredations of their own nation, and often of the creditor himself; for some of the merchants entered deeply into the privateering business. The individuals, who did not, say they have lost this interest; the debtor replies that he has not gained it, and that it is a case, where a loss having been incurred, every one tries to shift it from himself. The known bias of the human mind from motives of interest should lessen the confidence of each party in the justice of their reasoning; but it is difficult to say which of them should make the sacrifice, both of reason and interest.—To JAMES ROSS. i, 562. FORD ED., iv, 218. (P., 1786.) See INTEREST ON MONEY.

2091. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, Jefferson's Personal.—With respect to myself, I acknowledge to you that I do not think an interest justly demandable during the war. Whatever I owed, with interest previous and subsequent to the war, I have taken measures for paying as speedily as possible. My chief debts are to yourself, and to Mr. Jones, of Bristol. In the year 1776, before there was a shilling of paper money issued, I sold land for £4200 to pay these two debts. I did not receive the money till it was not worth oak leaves. I have lost the principal and interest of these debts once then in attempting to pay them. Besides this, Lord Cornwallis's army took off thirty of my slaves, burned one year's crop of tobacco in my houses, and destroyed another in the fields, with other damages to the amount of three or four thousand pounds. Still, I am renewing my efforts to pay what I justly ought; and I hope these will be more successful. My whole estate is left in the hands of Mr. Lewis, of Albemarle, and Mr. Eppes, of Chesterfield, to apply its whole profits to the payment of my debts. * * * Till payment is effected, I shall not draw one shilling from the estate, nor resume its possession. * * * I think it very possible that you will not concur with me in opinion as to the intermediate interest; and that so far I shall meet your censure. Both parties are liable to feel too strongly the arguments which tend to justify their endeavors to avoid this loss. Yet after making allowances for this prejudice, it seems to me impossible but that the hardships are infinitely greater on our side than on yours. You have lost the interest but it is not we who have gained it. We deem your nation the aggressors. They took those profits which arose from your property in our hands, and inflicted on us immeasurable losses besides. I urge these considerations because, while they decide my own opinion, I wish them to weigh so much as to preserve me yours, which I highly esteem, and should be afflicted were I to lose it.—To ALEXANDER McCaul. FORD ED., iv, 204. (L., 1786.)

2092. ——. I am desirous of arranging with you such just and practicable conditions as will ascertain to you the terms at which you will receive my part of your debt, and give me the satisfaction of knowing that you are contented. * * * The first question which arises is as to the article of interest. For all the time preceding the war, and all subsequent to it, I think it reasonable that interest should be paid; but equally unreasonable during the war. Interest is a compensation for the use of money. Your money in my hands is in the form of lands and negroes. From these, during the war, no use, no profits could be derived. Tobacco is the article they produce. That can only be turned into money at a foreign market. But the moment it went out of our ports for that purpose, it was captured either by the King's ships, or by those of individuals. The consequence was that tobacco, worth from twenty to thirty shillings the hundred, sold generally in Virginia during the war for five shillings. This price, it is known, will not maintain the laborer and pay taxes. There was no surplus of profit then to pay an interest. In the meanwhile we stood insurers of the lives of the laborers, and of the ultimate issue of the war. He who attempted during the war to remit either his principal or interest, must have expected to remit three times to make one payment; because it is supposed that two out of three parts of the shipments were taken. It was not possible, then, for the debtor to derive any profit from the money which might enable him to pay an interest, nor yet to get rid of the principal by remitting it to his creditor.—To WILLIAM JONES. FORD ED., iv, 352. (P., 1787.)

2093. ——. Besides these reasons in favor of the general mass of debtors, I have some peculiar to my own case. In the year 1776, before a shilling of paper money was issued, I sold lands to the amount of four thousand two hundred pounds sterling. In order to pay these two debts I offered the bonds of the purchasers to your agent, Mr. Evans, if he would acquit me, and accept of the purchasers as debtors in my place. They were as sure as myself had he done it. These debts, being turned over to you, would have been saved to you by the treaty of peace, but he declined it. Great sums of paper money were afterwards issued. This depreciated, and payment was made me in this money when it was but a shadow. Our laws do not entitle their own citizens to require repayment in these cases, though the treaty authorizes the British creditor to do it. Here, then, I lost the principal and interest once. Again Lord Cornwallis encamped ten days on an estate of mine at Elk island, having his headquarters in my house. He burned all the tobacco houses and barns on the farm, with the produce of the former year in them. He burned all the enclosures, and wasted the fields in which the crop of that year (it was the month of June), was growing. He killed or carried off every living animal, cutting the throats of those which were too young for service. Of the slaves, he carried away thirty. The useless and barbarous injury he did me, in that instance, was more than would have repaid your debt, principal and interest. Thus I lost it a second time. Still I lay my shoulder assiduously to the payment of it a third time. In doing this, however, I think yourself will be of opinion that I am authorized in justice to clear it of every article not demandable in strict right. Of this nature I consider interest during the war.—To WILLIAM JONES. FORD ED., iv, 353. (1787.)

2095. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, Liquidation of.—There are two circumstances of difficulty in the payment of these debts. To speak of [Virginia], the particular State with which you and I are best acquainted, we know that its debt is ten times the amount of its circulating cash. To pay that debt at once then is a physical impossibility. Time is requisite. Were all the creditors to rush to judgment together, a mass of two millions of property would be brought to market, where there is but the tenth of that sum of money in circulation to purchase it. Both debtor and creditor would be ruined, as debts would be thus rendered desperate which are in themselves good. Of this truth I find the merchants here [London] sufficiently sensible, and I have no doubt we should have arranged the article of time to mutual satisfaction, allowing judgment to pass immediately, and dividing the execution into instalments.—To ALEXANDER McCaUL. FORD ED., iv, 202. (1786.)

2096. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, Plan to pay.—They [British merchants whom I met in London] were certainly disposed to consent to accommodation as to the article of debts. I was not certain, when I left England, that they would relinquish the interest during the war. A letter received since, from the first character among the American merchants in Scotland, satisfies me they would have relinquished it to insure the capital and residue of interest. Would to heaven all the States, therefore, would settle a uniform plan. To open the courts to them, so that they might obtain judgments; to divide the executions into so many equal annual instalments, as that the last might be paid in the year 1790; to have the payments in actual money; and, to include the capital, and interest preceding and subsequent to the war, would give satisfaction to the world, and to the merchants in general. Since it is left for each nation to pursue their own measures in the execution of the late treaty, may not Congress with propriety recommend a mode of executing that article respecting the debts, and send it to each State to be passed into law. Whether England gives up the [Western] posts or not, these debts must be paid, or our character stained with infamy among all nations and through all time.

As to the satisfaction for slaves carried off, it is a bagatelle, which, if not made good before the last instalment becomes due, may be secured out of that.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 565. FORD ED., iv, 221. (P., 1786.)

2097. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, Privateering and.—With respect to the creditors in Great Britain, they mostly turned their attention to privateering; and arming the vessels they had before employed in trading with us, they captured on the seas, not only the produce of the farms of their debtors, but of those of the whole State. They thus paid themselves by capture more than their annual interest, and we lost more. Some merchants, indeed, did not engage in privateering. These lost their interest. But we did not gain it. It fell into the hands of their countrymen. It cannot, therefore, be demanded of us. As between these merchants and their debtors, it is the case where, a loss being incurred, each party may justifiably endeavor to shift it from himself. Each has an equal right to avoid it. One party can never expect the other to yield a thing to which he has as good a right as the demander; we even think he has a better right than the demander in the present instance. This loss has been occasioned by the fault of the nation which was creditor. Our right to avoid it, then, stands on less exceptionable ground than theirs. But it will be said, that each party thought the other the aggressor. In these disputes there is but one umpire, and that has decided the question where the world in general thought the right lay.—To WILLIAM JONES. FORD ED., iv, 353. (1787.)

2098. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, Slaves and.—The British army, after ravaging the State of Virginia, had sent off a very great number of slaves to New York. By the seventh article of the treaty of peace, they stipulated not to carry away any of these. Notwithstanding this, it was known, when they were evacuating New York, that they were carrying away the slaves. General Washington made an official demand of Sir Guy Carleton, that he should cease to send them away. He answered, that these people had come to them under promise of the King's protection, and that that promise should be fulfilled in preference to the stipulation in the treaty. The State of Virginia, to which nearly the whole of these slaves belonged, passed a law to forbid the recovery of debts due to British subjects. They declared, at the same time, they would repeal the law, if Congress were of opinion they ought to do it. But, desirous that their citizens should be discharging their debts, they afterwards permitted British creditors to prosecute their suits, and to receive their debts in seven equal and annual payments; relying that the demand for the slaves would be either admitted or denied in time to lay their hands on some of the latter payments for reimbursement.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. ix, 240. FORD ED., iv, 127. (1785.)

2099. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, Virginia Loan and.—A citizen of the Commonwealth [of Virginia], who is debtor to a British subject, may lodge the money due, or any part thereof, in the * * * loan office, accounting sixteen pence of the lawful money of the Commonwealth, or two-thirds of a dollar in bills of credit there current, equal to twelve pence of any such debt payable in the debtor's name, signed by the commissioner of the loan office and delivering the same to the Governor whose receipt shall discharge the debt.*—BRITISH PROPERTY BILL. FORD ED., ii, 200. (1779.)

2100. DEBTS DUE BRITISH, Sum of Virginia's.—Virginia certainly owed two millions sterling to Great Britain at the conclusion of the war. Some have conjectured the debt as high as three millions. I think that State owed near as much as all the rest put together. This is to be ascribed to peculiarities in the tobacco trade. The advantages made by the British merchants, on the tobaccos consigned to them, were so enormous, that they spared no means of increasing those consignments. A powerful engine for this purpose was the giving good prices and credit to the planter, till they got him more immersed in debt than he could pay, without selling his lands or slaves. They then reduced the prices given for his tobaccos, so that, let his shipments be ever so great, and his demand of necessities ever so economical, they never permitted him to clear off his debt. These debts had become hereditary from father to son, for many generations, so that the planters were a species of property, annexed to certain mercantile houses in London.—ANSWER TO M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 250. FORD ED., iv, 155. (P., 1786.)

2101. DECIMAL SYSTEM, Advantages of.—The most easy ratio of multiplication and division, is that by ten. Everyone knows the facility of Decimal Arithmetic. Every one remembers, that when learning Money-Arithmetic, he used to be puzzled with adding the farthings, taking out the fours and carrying them on; adding the pence, taking out the twelves and carrying them on; adding the shillings, taking out the twenties and carrying them on; but when he came to the pounds, where he had only tens to carry forward, it was easy and free from error. The bulk of mankind are schoolboys through life. These little perplexities are always great to them. And even mathematical heads feel the relief of an easier, substituted for a more difficult process. Foreigners, too, who trade and travel among us, will find a great facility in understanding our coins and accounts from this ratio of subdivision. Those who have had occasion to convert the livres, sols and deniers of the French; the gilders, stivers and pfennigs of the Dutch; the pounds, shillings, pence, and farthings of these several States, into each other, can judge how much they would have been aided, had their several subdivisions been in a decimal ratio. Certainly, in all cases, where we are free to choose between easy and difficult modes of operation, it is most rational to choose the easy. The Financier [Robert Morris], therefore, in his report, well proposes that our coins should be in decimal proportion to one another.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 163. FORD ED., iii, 447. (1784.)

2102. DECIMAL SYSTEM, Approbation of.—The experiment made by Congress in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, by declaring that there should be one money of account and payment through the United States, and that its parts and multiples should be in a decimal ratio, has obtained such general approbation, both at home and abroad, that nothing seems wanting but the actual coinage, to banish the discordant pounds, shillings, pence and farthings of the different States, and to establish in their stead the new denominations.—COINAGE, WEIGHTS AND MEASURES REPORT. vii, 477. 2103. DECIMAL SYSTEM, France and.—The convenience of [the decimal system] in our moneyed system has been approved by all, and France has followed the example.—TO JOHN QUINCY ADAMS. vii, 89. (M., 1817.)

2104. DECIMAL SYSTEM, Weights, Measures and.—The divisions into dimes, cents and mills is now so well understood that it would be easy of introduction into the kindred branches of weights and measures. I use, when I travel, an odometer of Clarke's invention, which divides the mile into cents, and I find every one comprehends a distance readily, when stated to him in miles and cents; so he would in feet and cents, pounds and cents, &c.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 53. FORD ED. i, 75. 2105. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Action in Congress.—On the 15th of May, 1776, the Convention of Virginia instructed their delegates in Congress, to propose to that body to declare the Colonies independent of Great Britain, and appointed a committee to prepare a declaration of rights, and plan of government.

"In Congress, Friday, June 7, 1776. The delegates† from Virginia moved, in obedience to instructions from their constituents that the Congress should declare, that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; that measures should be immediately taken for procuring the assistance of foreign powers, and a Confederation be formed to bind the Colonies more closely together. The House being obliged to attend at that time to some other business, the proposition was referred to the next day, when the members were ordered to attend punctually at ten o'clock.

Saturday, June 8. They proceeded to take it into consideration, and referred it to a committee of the whole, into which they immediately resolved themselves, and passed that day and Monday, the 10th, in debating on the subject."—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 12. FORD ED. i, 18. (1821.)

2106. — — —. It appearing in the course of these debates [on Independence], that the Colonies of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina were not yet matured for falling from the parent stem, but that they were fast advancing to that state, it was thought most prudent to wait a while for them, and to postpone the final decision to July 1st; but, that this might occasion as little delay as possible, a committee was appointed to prepare a Declaration of Independence.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 17. FORD ED. i, 24. (1821.)

2107. — — —. On Monday, the 1st of July, the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the original motion [to declare the Colonies independent States] made by the delegates of Virginia, which, being again debated through the day, was carried in the affirmative by the votes of New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia. South Carolina and Pennsylvania voted against it. Delaware had but two members present and they were divided. The delegates from New York declared they were for it themselves, and were assured their constituents were for it; but that their instructions having been drawn near a twelve-month before, when reconciliation was still the general object, they were enjoined by them to do nothing which should impede that object. They, therefore, thought themselves not justifiable in voting on either side, and asked leave to withdraw from the question, which was given them. The committee rose and reported their resolution to the House. Mr. Edward Rutledge, of South Carolina, then requested the determination might be put off to the next day, as he believed his colleagues, though they disapproved of the resolution, would then join in it for the sake of unanimity. The ultimate question, whether the House would agree to the resolution of the committee, was accordingly postponed to the next day, when it was again moved, and South Carolina concurred in voting for it. In the meantime, a third member had come post from the Delaware counties, and turned the vote of that Colony in favor of the resolution. Members of a different sentiment attending that morning from Pennsylvania also, her vote was changed, so that the whole twelve Colonies, who were authorized to vote at all, gave their voices for it; and within a few days (July 9) the convention of New York approved of it, and thus supplied the void occasioned by the withdrawing of her delegates from the vote.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 18. FORD ED. i, 24. 2110. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Copies of.—I enclose [you] a copy of the Declaration of Independence, as agreed to by the House, and also as originally framed. 2111. ——. I am not able to give you any particular account of the paper handed you by Mr. Lee, as being either the original or a copy of the Declaration of Independence, sent by myself to his grandfather. The draft, when completed by myself, with a few verbal amendments by Dr. Franklin and Mr. Adams, two members of the Committee, in their own handwriting, is now in my possession, and a fair copy of this was reported to the Committee, passed by them without amendment, and then reported to Congress. This latter should be among the records of the old Congress; and whether this or the one from which it was copied and now in my hands, is to be called the original, is a question of definition. To that in my hands, if worth preserving, my relations with our University [of Virginia] give irresistible claims. Whenever, in the course of the composition, a copy became overcharged, and difficult to be read with amendments, I copied it fair, and when that also was crowded with other amendments, another fair copy was made, &c. These rough drafts I sent to distant friends who were anxious to know what was passing. But how many and to whom I do not recollect. One sent to Mazzei was given by him to the Countess de Tesse (aunt of Madame de Lafayette) as the original, and is probably now in the hands of her family. Whether the paper sent to R. H. Lee was one of these, or whether, after the passage of the instrument, I made a copy for him, with the amendments of Congress, may, I think, be known from the face of the paper.—TO JOHN VAUGHAN, vii, 409. FORD ED., x, 345. — DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Franklin and.—See 2115.

2112. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, History of.—On the 7th of June, 1776, the delegates from Virginia moved, in obedience to instructions from their constituents, that Congress should declare the Thirteen United Colonies to be independent of Great Britain, that a Confederation should be formed to bind them together, and measures be taken for procuring the assistance of foreign powers. The House ordered a punctual attendance of all their members the next day at ten o'clock, and then resolved themselves into a committee of the whole, and entered on the discussion. It appeared in the course of the debates that seven States, viz., New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, were decided for a separation; but that six others still hesitated, to wit, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina. Congress, desirous of unanimity, and seeing that the public mind was advancing rapidly to it, referred the further discussion to the 1st of July, appointing in the meantime a Committee to prepare a Declaration of Independence, a second to form Articles for the Confederation of the States, and a third to propose measures for obtaining foreign aid. On the 28th of June, the Declaration of Independence was reported to the House, and was laid on the table for the consideration of the members. On the 1st day of July, they resolved themselves into a committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the motion of June 7 [declaring independence]. It was debated through the day, and at length was decided in the affirmative by the vote of nine States, viz., New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina and Georgia. Pennsylvania and South Carolina voted against it. Delaware, having but two members present, was divided. The delegates from New York declared they were for it, and their constituents also; but that the instructions against it which had been given them a twelvemonth before, were still unrepealed; that their convention was to meet in a few days, and they asked leave to suspend their vote till they could obtain a repeal of their instructions. Observe that all this was in a committee of the whole Congress, and that according to the mode of their proceedings, the resolution of that committee to declare themselves independent was to be put to the same persons reassuming their forms as a Congress. It was now evening, the members exhausted by a debate of nine hours, during which all the powers of the soul had been distended with the magnitude of the object, and the delegates of South Carolina desired that the final decision might be put off to the next morning that they might still weigh in their own minds their ultimate vote. It was put off, and in the morning of the 2d of July, they joined the other nine States in voting for it. The members of the Pennsylvania delegation, too, who had been absent the day before came in and turned the vote of their State in favor of independence, and a third member of the State of Delaware, who, a hearing of the division in the sentiment of his two colleagues, had travelled post to arrive in time, now came in and decided the vote of that State also for the resolution. Thus twelve States voted for it at the time of its passage, and the delegates of New York, the thirteenth State, received instructions within a few days to add theirs to the general vote; so that * * * there was not a dissenting voice. Congress proceeded immediately to consider the Declaration of Independence which had been reported by their Committee on the 28th of June. The several paragraphs of that were debated for three days, viz., the 2d, 3d, and 4th of July. In the evening of the 4th, they were finally closed, and the instrument approved by an unanimous vote, and signed by every member, except Mr. Dickinson.—To the EDITOR OF THE JOURNAL DE PARIS. ix, 309. FORD ED., iv, 440. (P. Aug. 1787.)

2113. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Objects of.—With respect to our rights, and the acts of the British government contravening those rights, there was but one opinion on this side of the water. All American whigs thought alike on these subjects. When forced, therefore, to resort to arms for redress, an appeal to the tribunal of the world was deemed proper for our justification. This was the object of the Declaration of Independence. Not to find out new principles, or new arguments, never before thought of, not merely to say things which had never been said before; but to place before mankind the common sense of the subject, in terms so plain and firm as to command their assent, and to justify ourselves in the independent stand we were compelled to take. Neither aiming at originality of principle or sentiment, nor yet copied from any particular and previous writing, it was intended to be an expression of the American mind, and to give to that expression the proper tone and spirit called for by the occasion. All its authority rests, then, on the harmonizing sentiments of the day, whether expressed in conversation, in letters, printed essays, or in the elementary books of public right, as Aristotle, Cicero, Locke, Sidney, &c.—To HENRY LEE. vii, 407. FORD ED., x, 343. (M., 1825.)

2114. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Opposition to.—Many excellent persons opposed it on doubts whether we were provided sufficiently with the means of supporting it, whether the minds of our constituents were yet prepared to receive, &c., who, after it was decided, united zealously in the measures it called for.—To WILLIAM P. GARDNER. FORD ED., ix, 377. (M., 1813.)

2115. — — — When the Declaration of Independence was under the consideration of Congress, there were two or three unlucky expressions in it which gave offence to some members. The words "Scotch and other foreign auxiliaries," excited the ire of a gentleman or two of that country. Severe strictures on the conduct of the British King, in negating our repeated repeals of the law which permitted the importation of slaves, were disapproved by some Southern gentlemen whose reflections were not yet matured to the full abhorrence of that traffic. Although the offensive expressions were immediately yielded, these gentlemen continued their depredations on other parts of the instrument. I was sitting by Dr. Franklin who perceived that I was not insensible to these mutilations. "I have made it a rule," said he, "whenever in my power, to avoid becoming the draftsman of papers to be reviewed by a public body. I took my lesson from an incident which I will relate to you. When I was a journeyman printer, one of my companions, an apprentice hatter, having served out his time, was about to open shop for himself. His first concern was to have a handsome signboard, with a proper inscription. He composed it in these words: John Thompson, Hatter, makes and sells hats for ready money," with a figure of a hat subjoined. But he thought he would submit to his friends for their amendments. The first he showed it to thought the word "hatter" tautologous, because followed by the words, "makes hats," which show he was a hatter. It was struck out. The next observed that the word "makes" might as well be omitted, because his customers would not care who made the hats. If good and to their mind, they would buy by whomsoever made. He struck it out. A third said he thought the words "for ready money," were useless as it was not the custom of the place to sell on credit. Everyone who purchased expected to pay. They were parted with, and the inscription now stood, "John Thompson sells hats." "Sells hats," says his next friend? Why nobody will expect you to give them away. What, then, is the use of that word? It was stricken out, and "hats" followed it,—the rather as there was one painted on the board. So his inscription was reduced ultimately to "John Thompson" with the figure of a hat subjoined.—ANECDOTES OF DR. FRANKLIN. viii, 500. FORD ED., x, 119. (M., 1818.)

2116. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, People of England and.—The pusillanimous idea that we had any friends in England worth keeping terms with, still haunted the minds of many. For this reason, those passages which conveyed censure on the people of England were struck out, lest they should give them offence.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 19. FORD ED., i, 28. (1821.)

2117. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Pictures of.—Mr. Barralet's sketch of the ornaments proposed to accompany the publication of the Declaration of Independence, contemplated by Mr. Murray and yourself, has been received. I am too little versed in the art of design to be able to offer any suggestions to the artist. As far as I am a judge, the composition appears to be judicious and well-imagined. Were I to hazard a suggestion, it should be that Mr. Hancock, as President of Congress, should occupy the middle and principal place. No man better merited than did Mr. John Adams to hold a most conspicuous place in the design.—To WILLIAM P. GARDNER. FORD ED., ix, 377. (M., Feb. 1813.)

2119. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Recollections of by Adams.—You have doubtless seen Timothy Pickering's Fourth of July observations on the Declaration of Independence. If his principles and prejudices, personal and political, gave us no reason to doubt whether he had truly quoted the information he alleges to have received from Mr. Adams, I should then say, that in some of the particulars, Mr. Adams's memory has led him into unquestionable error. At the age of eighty-eight, and forty-seven years after the transactions of Independence, this is not wonderful. Nor should I, at the age of eighty, on the small advantage of that difference only, venture to oppose my memory to his, were it not supported by written notes, taken by myself at the moment, and on the spot. He says, "the Committee of five, to wit, Dr. Franklin, Sherman, Livingston, and ourselves, met, discussed the subject, and then appointed him and myself to make the draft; that we, as a sub-committee, met, and after the urgencies of each on the other, I consented to undertake the task; that the draft being made, we, the sub-committee, met, and conned the paper over, and he does not remember that he made, or suggested a single alteration." Now these details are quite incorrect. The Committee of five met; no such thing as a sub-committee was proposed, but they unanimously pressed on myself alone to undertake the draft. I consented; I drew it; but before I reported it to the Committee, I communicated it separately to Dr. Franklin and Mr. Adams, requesting their correction, because they were the two members of whose judgments and amendments I wished most to have the benefit, before presenting it to the Committee; and you have seen the original paper now in my hands, with the corrections of Dr. Franklin and Mr. Adams interlined in their own handwritings. Their alterations were two or three only, and merely verbal. I then wrote a fair copy, reported it to the Committee, and from them, unaltered, to Congress. This personal communication and consultation with Mr. Adams, he has misremembered into the actings of a sub-committee, Pickering's observations, and Mr. Adams's in addition, "that it contained no new ideas, that it is a common-place compilation, its sentiments hackneyed in Congress for two years before, and its essence contained in Otis's pamphlet." may all be true. Of that I am not to be the judge. Richard Henry Lee charged it as copied from Locke's Treatise on Government. Otis's pamphlet I never read, and whether I had gathered my ideas from reading or reflection, I do not know. I know only that I turned to neither book nor pamphlet while writing it. I did not consider it as any part of my charge to invent new ideas altogether, and to offer no sentiment which had ever been expressed before. Had Mr. Adams been so restrained, Congress would have lost the benefit of his bold and impressive advocacy of the rights of the Revolution. For no man's confident and fervid addresses, more than Mr. Adams's, encouraged and supported us through the difficulties surrounding us, which, like the ceaseless action of gravity, weighed on us by night and by day. Yet, on the same ground, we may ask what of these elevated thoughts was new, or can be affirmed never before to have entered the conceptions of man? Whether, also, the sentiments of Independence and the reasons for declaring it, which make so great a portion of the instrument, had been hackneyed in Congress for two years before the 4th of July, '76, or this dictum also of Mr. Adams be another slip of memory, let history say. This, however, I will say for Mr. Adams, that he supported the Declaration with zeal and ability, fighting fearlessly for every word of it. As for myself, I thought it a duty to be, on that occasion, a passive auditor of the opinions of others, more impartial judges than I could be, of its merits or demerits. During the debate I was sitting by Dr. Franklin, and he observed that I was writhing a little under the acrimonious criticisms on some of its parts; and it was on that occasion, that by way of comfort, he told me the story of John Thompson, the hatter, and his new sign. Timothy thinks the instrument the better for having a fourth of it expunged. He would have thought it still better, had the other three-fourths gone out also, all but the single sentiment (the only one he approves), which recommends friendship to his dear England, whenever she is willing to be at peace with us. His insinuations are, that although "the high tone of the instrument was in unison with the warm feelings of the times, this sentiment of habitual friendship to England should never be forgotten, and that the duties it enjoins should especially be borne in mind on every celebration of this anniversary." In other words, that the Declaration, as being a libel on the government of England, composed in times of passion, should now be buried in utter oblivion, to spare the feelings of our English friends and Angloman fellow-citizens. But it is not to wound them that we wish to keep it in mind; but to cherish the principles of the instrument in the bosoms of our fellow-citizens; and it is a heavenly comfort to see that these principles are yet so strongly felt as to render a circumstance so trifling as this lapse of memory of Mr. Adams, worthy of being solemnly announced and supported at an anniversary assemblage of the nation on its birthday. In opposition, however, to Mr. Pickering, I pray God that these principles may be eternal.—To JAMES MADISON. vii. 304. FORD ED., x, 267. (M., Aug. 1823.) See 64.

— DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Rights of Man and.—See 2120.

2120. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Semi-centennial of.—The kind invitation I received from you, on the part of the citizens of the city of Washington, to be present with them at their celebration on the fiftieth anniversary of American Independence, as one of the surviving signers of an instrument pregnant with our own and the fate of the world, is most flattering to myself, and heightened by the honorable accompaniment proposed for the comfort of such a journey. It adds sensibly to the sufferings of sickness, to be deprived by it of a personal participation in the rejoicings of that day. But acquiescence is a duty, under circumstances not placed among those we are permitted to control. I should, indeed, with peculiar delight, have met and exchanged there congratulations personally with the small band, the remnant of that host of worthies, who joined with us on that day, in the bold and doubtful election we were to make for our country, between submission or the sword; and to have enjoyed with them the consolatory fact, that our fellow-citizens, after half a century of experience and prosperity, continue to approve the choice we made. May it be to the world, what I believe it will be (to some parts sooner, to others later, but finally to all), the signal of arousing men to burst the chains under which monkish ignorance and superstition had persuaded them to bind themselves, and to assume the blessings and security of self-government. That form which we have substituted, restores the free right to the unbounded exercise of reason and freedom of opinion. All eyes are opened, or opening, to the rights of man. The general spread of the light of science has already laid open to every view the palpable truth, that the mass of mankind has not been born with saddles on their backs, nor a favored few, booted and spurred, ready to ride them legitimately, by the grace of God. These are grounds of hope for others. For ourselves, let the annual return of this day forever refresh our recollections of these rights, and an undiminished devotion to them. I will ask permission here to express the pleasure with which I should have met my ancient neighbors of the city of Washington and its vicinity, with whom I passed so many years of a pleasing social intercourse; an intercourse which so much relieved the anxieties of the public cares, and left impressions so deeply engraved in my affections, as never to be forgotten. With my regret that ill health forbids me the gratification of an acceptance, be pleased to receive for yourself, and those for whom you write, the assurance of my highest respect and friendly attachments.*—To ROGER C. WEIGHTMAN. vii, 450. FORD ED., x, 390. (M., June 24, 1826.)

2121. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Signers of.—Governor McKean, in his letter to McCorkle of July 16th.

* This was the last letter written by Jefferson. He died on the following Fourth of July.—EDITOR.

1817, has thrown some lights on the transactions of that day; but, trusting to his memory chiefly, at an age when our memories are not to be trusted, he has confounded two questions, and ascribed proceedings to one which belonged to the other. These two questions were, 1st, the Virginia motion of June the 7th, to declare Independence; and 2d, the actual Declaration, its matter and form. Thus he states the question on the Declaration itself as decided on the 1st of July; but it was the Virginia motion which was voted on that day in Committee of the Whole; South Carolina, as well as Pennsylvania, then voting against it. But the ultimate decision in the House, on the report of the Committee, being, by request, postponed to the next morning; all the States voted for it except New York, whose vote was delayed for the reason before stated. It was not till the 2d of July, that the Declaration itself was taken up; nor till the 4th, that it was decided, and it was signed by every member present, except Mr. Dickinson.—To SAMUEL A. WELLS. i, 120. FORD ED., x, 130. (M., 1819.)

2122. ——. The subsequent signatures of members who were not then present, and some of them not yet in office, is easily explained, if we observe who they were; to wit, that they were of New York and Pennsylvania. New York did not sign till the 15th, because it was not till the 9th (five days after the general signature), that their convention authorized them to do so. The Convention of Pennsylvania, learning that it had been signed by a minority only of their delegates, named a new delegation on the 20th, leaving out Mr. Dickinson, who had refused to sign, Willing and Humphreys who had withdrawn, reappointing the three members who had signed, Morris, who had not been present, and five new ones, to wit, Rush, Clymer, Smith, Taylor and Ross; and Morris, and the five new members were permitted to sign, because it manifested the assent of their full delegation and the express will of their Convention, which might have been doubted on the former signature of a minority only. Why the signature of Thornton, of New Hampshire, was permitted so late as the 4th of November. I cannot now say; but undoubtedly for some particular reason which we should find to have been good, had it been expressed. These were the only post-signers, and you see that there were solid reasons for receiving those of New York and Pennsylvania, and that this circumstance in no wise affects the faith of this Declaratory Charter of our rights, and of the rights of man.—To SAMUEL A. WELLS. i, 120. FORD ED., x, 130. (M., 1819.)

2123. ——. I have received the new publication of the Secret Journals of Congress, wherein is stated a resolution of July 19th, 1776, that the Declaration passed on the 4th, be fairly engrossed on parchment, and when engrossed, be signed by every member; and another of August 2d, that being engrossed and compared at the table, it was signed by the members; that is to say, the copy engrossed on parchment (for durability) was signed by the members, after being compared at the table, with the original one signed on paper as before stated.—MEMORANDUM BY JEFFERSON. i, 122. FORD ED., x, 132. (Aug. 1822.)

2124. ——. I observe your toast of Mr. [John] Jay on the 4th of July [1823] wherein you say that the omission of his signature to the Declaration of Independence was by accident. Our impressions as to this fact being different, I shall be glad to have mine corrected, if wrong. Jay, you know, had been in constant opposition to our laboring majority. Our estimate at the time was, that he, Dickinson and Johnson of Maryland, by their ingenuity, perseverance and partiality to our English connection, had constantly kept us a year behind where we ought to have been in our preparations and proceedings. From about the date of the Virginia instructions of May 15th, 1776, to declare Independence, Mr. Jay absented himself from Congress, and never came there again until December, 1778. Of course, he had no part in the discussions or decision of that question. The instructions to their Delegates by the Convention of New York, then sitting, to sign the Declaration, were presented to Congress on the 15th of July only, and on that day the journals show the absence of Mr. Jay, by a letter received from him, as they had done as early as the 29th of May by another letter. And I think he had been omitted by the convention on a new election of Delegates, when they changed their instructions. Of this last fact, however, having no evidence but an ancient impression, I shall not affirm it. But whether so or not, no agency of accident appears in the case. This error of fact, however, whether yours or mine, is of little consequence to the public. But truth being as cheap as error, it is as well to rectify it for our own satisfaction.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 308. FORD ED., x, 271. (M., 1823.)

2125. ——. Of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, I see now living not more than half a dozen on your side of the Potomac, and on this side, myself alone.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 37. FORD ED., ix, 334. (M., Jan. 1812.)

2126. ——. I think Mr. Adams will outlive us all, I mean the Declaration-men, although our senior since the death of Colonel Floyd. It is a race in which I have no ambition to win.—To HENRY DEARBORN. vii, 214. FORD ED., x, 191. (M., Aug. 1821.)

2127. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Slavery clause.—The clause [in the draft] reproaching the enslaving the inhabitants of Africa, was struck out in complaisance to South Carolina and Georgia, who had never attempted to restrain the importation of slaves, and who, on the contrary, still wished to continue it. Our northern brethren also, I believe, felt a little tender under those assurances, for though their people had very few slaves themselves, yet they had been pretty considerable carriers of them to others.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 19. FORD ED., i, 28. (1821.)

2128. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Spirit of.—The genuine effusion of the soul of our country at that time.* —To DR. JAMES MEASE. vii, 410. FORD ED., x, 346. (M., 1825.) See FOURTH OF JULY.

2129. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, The Union and.—This holy bond of our Union.—To DR. JAMES MEASE. vii, 410. FORD ED., x, 346. (M., 1825.)

2130. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Virginia Constitution and.—The [Virginia] Constitution, with the Preamble, was passed on the 29th of June [1776], and the Committee of Congress had only the day before that reported to that body the draft of the Declaration of Independence. The fact is, that that Preamble was prior in composition to the Declaration; and both having the same object, of justifying our separation from Great Britain, they used necessarily the same materials of justification, and hence their similitude.—To AUGUSTUS B. WOODWARD. vii, 406. FORD ED., x, 342. (M., 1825.)

2131. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Where written.—The Declaration of Independence was written in a house on the north side of Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, between Third and Fourth, not a corner house. Heiskell's tavern, which has been pointed out as the house, is not the true one.—FROM DANIEL WEBSTER'S CONVERSATION WITH JEFFERSON. FORD ED., x, 327. (1824.)

2132. ——. At the time of writing the Declaration, I lodged in the house of a Mr. Graaf, a new brick house, three stories high, of which I rented the second floor, consisting of a parlor and bedroom, ready furnished. In that parlor I wrote habitually, and in it wrote this paper, particularly. So far I state from written proofs in my possession. The proprietor, Graaf, was a young man, son of a German, and then newly married. I think he was a bricklayer, and that his house was on the south side of Market street, probably between Seventh and Eighth streets, and if not the only house on that part of the street, I am sure there were few others near it. I have some idea that it was a corner house, but no other recollections throwing light on the question, or worth communication.—To DR. JAMES MEASE. vii, 410. FORD ED., x, 346. (M., 1825.)

* Bancroft in volume 8, chapter 70, of the History of the United States, says, "this Immortal State paper which, for its composer, was the aurora of enduring fame, was 'the genuine effusion of the soul of the country at that time', the revelation of its mind, when in its youth, its enthusiasm, its sublime confronting of danger, it rose to the highest creative powers of which man is capable"—EDITOR.

† Jefferson wrote the Preamble of the Virginia Constitution. The phraseology of the indictment in it of George III. is nearly the same as that in the Declaration.—EDITOR.

‡ Jefferson had been asked to supply this information. In the letter, from which the quotation is made, he wrote: "It is not for me to estimate the importance of the circumstances concerning which your letter makes inquiry. They prove, even in their minuteness, the sacred attachments of our fellow citizens to the event of which the paper of July

2133. DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, The Mecklenburg.—You seem to think the Mecklenburg Declaration genuine. I believe it spurious. I deem it to be a very unjustifiable quiz, like that of the volcano, so minutely related to us as having broken out in North Carolina, some half a dozen years ago, in that part of the country, and perhaps in that very county of Mecklenburg, for I do not remember its precise locality. If this paper be really taken from the Raleigh Register, as quoted, I wonder it should have escaped Ritchie, who culls what is good from every paper, as the bee from every flower; and the National Intelligencer, too, which is edited by a North Carolinian; and that the fire should blaze out all at once in Essex,* one thousand miles from where the spark is said to have fallen. But if really taken from the Raleigh Register, who is the narrator, and is the name subscribed real, or is it as fictitious as the paper itself? It appeals, too, to an original book, which is burned, to Mr. Alexander, who is dead, to a joint letter from Caswell, Hughes and Hooper, all dead, to a copy sent to the dead Caswell, and another sent to Dr. Williamson, now probably dead, whose memory did not recollect, in the history he has written of North Carolina, this gigantic step of its county of Mecklenburg. Horry, too, is silent in his history of Marion, whose scene of action was the county bordering on Mecklenburg. Ramsay, Marshall, Jones, Girardin, Wirt, historians of the adjacent States, all silent. When Mr. Henry's resolutions, far short of Independence, flew like lightning through every paper, and kindled both sides of the Atlantic, this flaming declaration of the same date, of the independence of Mecklenburg county, of North Carolina, absolving it from the British allegiance, and abjuring all political connection with that nation, although sent to Congress too, is never heard of. It is not known even a twelve-month after, when a similar proposition is first made in that body. Armed with this bold example, would not you have addressed our timid brethren in peals of thunder on their tardy fears? Would not every advocate of Independence have rung the glories of Mecklenburg county in North Carolina, in the ears of the doubting Dickinson and others, who hung so heavily on us? Yet the example of independent Mecklenburg county, in North Carolina, was never once quoted. The paper speaks, too, of the continued exertions of their delegation (Caswell, Hooper, Hughes) "in the cause of liberty and independence." Now, you remember as well as I do, that we had not a greater tory in Congress than Hooper; that Hughes was very wavering, sometimes firm, sometimes feeble, according as the day was clear or cloudy; that Caswell, indeed, was a good whig, and kept these gentlemen to the notch, while he was present: but that he left us soon, and their line of conduct became then uncertain until Penn came, who fixed Hughes and the vote of the State. I must not be understood as suggesting any doubtfulness in the State of North Carolina. No State was more fixed or forward. Nor do I affirm, positively, that this paper is a fabrication; because the proof of a negative can only

4th, 1776, was but the declaration, the genuine effusion of the soul of our country at that time. be presumptive. But I shall believe it such until positive and solemn proof of its authenticity be produced. And if the name of McKnitt be real, and not a part of the fabrication, it needs a vindication by the production of such proof. For the present, I must be an unbeliever in the apocryphal gospel.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 128. FORD ED., x, 136. (M., July 1819.)

2134. DEFENCE, Coast.—A steady, perhaps, a quickened pace in preparations for the defence of our seaport towns and waters; an early settlement of the most exposed and vulnerable parts of our country; a militia so organized that its effective portions can be called to any point in the Union, or volunteers instead of them to serve a sufficient time, are means which may always be ready yet never preying on our resources until actually called into use. They will maintain the public interests while a more permanent force shall be in course of preparation.—SIXTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 69. FORD ED., viii, 495. (Dec. 1806.) See MILITIA.

2135. ——. For the purposes of defence, it has been concluded to combine—1st, land batteries, furnished with heavy cannon and mortars, and established on all the points around the place favorable for preventing vessels from lying before it; 2d, movable artillery which may be carried * * * to points unprovided with fixed batteries; 3d, floating batteries; and 4th, gunboats, which may oppose an enemy at its entrance and co-operate with the batteries for his expulsion.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 79. FORD ED., ix, 23. (Feb. 1807.)

— DEFENCE, Gunboats and.—See GUNBOATS.

2136. DEFENCE, National.—To draw around the whole nation the strength of the General Government, as a barrier against foreign foes * * * is [one of the] functions of the General Government on which you have a right to call.—REPLY to VERMONT ADDRESS. iv, 418. (W., 1801.)

2137. DEFENCE, Naval.—I am for such a naval force only * * * as may protect our coasts and harbors * * *.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.) See NAVY.

2138. DEFENCE, Personal.—One loves to possess arms, though they hope never to have occasion for them.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iv, 143. FORD ED., vii, 84. (M., 1796.)

2139. DEFENCE, Preparations for.—The moment our peace was threatened [by the attack on the Chesapeake], I deemed it indispensable to secure a greater provision of those articles of military stores with which our magazines were not sufficiently furnished. To have awaited a previous and special sanction by law would have lost occasions which might not be retrieved. I did not hesitate, therefore, to authorize engagements for such supplements to our existing stock as would render it adequate to the emergencies threatening us; and I trust that the Legislature, feeling the same anxiety for the safety of our country, so materially advanced by this protection, will approve, when done, what they would have seen so important to be done, if then assembled.—SEVENTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 87. FORD ED., ix, 161. (Oct. 1807.) See LAW, TRANSCENDING.

2140. DEFENCE, Readiness for.—While we are endeavoring * * * to obtain by friendly negotiation a peaceable redress of the injury [suspension of deposit at New Orleans], and effectual provision against its repetition, let us array the strength of the nation, and be ready to do with promptitude and effect whatever a regard to justice and our future security may require.—To —. iv, 469. (W., Feb. 1803.)

2141. —. Although our prospect is peace, our policy and purpose are to provide for defence by all those means to which our resources are competent.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 19. (W., 1806.)

2142. DEFENCE, The States and.—For the ordinary safety of the citizens of the several States, whether against dangers from within or without, reliance has been placed either on the domestic means of the individuals, or on those provided by the respective States.—To JACOB J. BROWN. v, 240. (W., 1808.) See FORTIFICATIONS.

2143. DEITY, Assistance Implored.—We commit our injuries to the even-handed justice of that Being. Who doth no wrong, earnestly beseeching Him to illuminate the councils, and prosper the endeavors of those to whom America hath confided her hopes, that through their wise direction we may again see reunited the blessings of liberty, property, and harmony with Great Britain.—ADDRESS VIRGINIA HOUSE OF BURGESSSES TO LORD DUNMORE. FORD ED., i, 459. (June 1775.)

2144. —. We devoutly implore assistance of Almighty God to conduct us happily through this great conflict.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 476. (July 1775.)

2145. DEITY, Beneficence of.—It hath pleased the Sovereign Disposer of all human events to give to this [Revolution] appeal an issue favorable to the rights of the States.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 441. FORD ED., iii, 321. (1783.)

2146. DEITY, Deliverer of the Distressed.—When the measure of their [the Slaves] tears shall be full, when their groans shall have involved heaven itself in darkness, doubtless, a God of justice will awaken to their distress, and by diffusing light and liberality among their oppressors, or, at length, by His exterminating thunder, manifest His attention to the things of this world, and that they are not left to the guidance of a blind fatality.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 279. FORD ED., iv, 185. (P., 1786.)

2147. DEITY, Existence of.—I think that every Christian sect gives a great handle to atheism by their general dogma, that, without a revelation, there would not be sufficient proof of the being of a God. Now, one-sixth of mankind only are supposed to be Christians; the other five-sixths, then, who do not believe in the Jewish and Christian revelation, are without a knowledge of the existence of a God! This gives completely a gain de cause to the disciples of Ocellus, Timæus, Spinosa, Diderot and D'Holbach. The argument which they rest on as triumphant and unanswerable is, that in every hypothesis of cosmogony, you must admit an eternal pre-existence of something; and according to the rule of sound philosophy, you are never to employ two principles to solve a difficulty when one will suffice. They say, then, that it is more simple to believe at once in the eternal pre-existence of the world, as it is now going on, and may forever go on by the principle of reproduction which we see and witness, than to believe in the eternal pre-existence of an ulterior cause, or Creator of the world, a Being whom we see not and know not, of whose form, substance, and mode, or place of existence, or of action, no sense informs us, no power of the mind enables us to delineate or comprehend. On the contrary, I hold (without appeal to revelation) that when we take a view of the universe, in all its parts, general or particular, it is impossible for the human mind not to perceive and feel a conviction of design, consummate skill, and indefinite power in every atom of its composition. The movements of the heavenly bodies, so exactly held in their course by the balance of centrifugal and centripetal forces; the structure of our earth itself, with its distribution of lands, waters and atmosphere; animal and vegetable bodies, examined in all their minutest particles; insects, mere atoms of life, yet as perfectly organized as man or mammoth; the mineral substances, their generation and uses; it is impossible, I say, for the human mind not to believe, that there is in all this, design, cause, and effect, up to an ultimate cause, a fabricator of all things from matter and motion, their preserver and regulator while permitted to exist in their present forms, and their regeneration into new and other forms. We see, too, evident proofs of the necessity of a superintending power, to maintain the universe in its course and order. Stars, well known, have disappeared, new ones have come into view; comets in their incalculable courses, may run foul of suns and planets, and require renovation under other laws; certain races of animals are become extinct; and were there no restoring power, all existences might extinguish successively, one by one, until all should be reduced to a shapeless chaos. So irresistible are these evidences of an intelligent and powerful agent, that, of the infinite numbers of men who have existed through all time, they have believed, in the proportion of a million at least to a unit, in the hypothesis of an eternal pre-existence of a

Creator, rather than in that of a self-existent universe. Surely this unanimous sentiment renders this more probable, than that of the few in the other hypothesis. Some early Christians, indeed, have believed in the co-eternal pre-existence of both the Creator and the world, without changing their relation of cause and effect. That this was the opinion of St. Thomas, we are informed by Cardinal Toleta.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 281. (M., 1823.)

2148. DEITY, Favor Invoked.—May that Infinite Power which rules the destinies of the universe, lead our councils to what is best, and give them a favorable issue for your peace and prosperity.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 5. FORD ED., viii, 6. (1801.)

2149. DEITY, Goodness of.—When we assemble together to consider the state of our beloved country, our just attentions are first drawn to those pleasing circumstances which mark the goodness of that Being from whose favor they flow, and the large measure of thankfulness we owe for His bounty.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 15. FORD ED., viii, 181. (Dec. 1802.)

2150. DEITY, Gratitude to the.—While we devoutly return thanks to the Beneficent Being who has been pleased to breathe into our sister nations the spirit of conciliation and forgiveness, we are bound with peculiar gratitude to be thankful to Him that our own peace has been preserved.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 6. FORD ED., viii, 109. (Dec. 1801.)

2151. DEITY, Inalienable Rights and.—All men are * * * endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

2152. DEITY, Liberty and the.—We * * * most solemnly, before God and the world declare that, * * * the arms we have been compelled to assume we will use with perseverance, exerting to their utmost energies all those powers which our Creator hath given us, to preserve that liberty which He committed to us in sacred deposit * * *.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ED., i, 476. (July 1775.)

2153. DEITY, National Equality and the.—When * * * it becomes necessary for one people * * * to assume among the powers of the earth the * * * equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them * * *.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

2155. DEITY, Prayers to.—I offer my sincere prayers to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, that He may long preserve our country in freedom and prosperity.—To BENJAMIN WARING. iv, 379. (W., March 1801.)

2156. — — — I join in addressing Him whose Kingdom ruleth over all, to direct the administration of their affairs to their own greatest good.—REPLY to VERMONT ADDRESS. iv, 419. (W., 1801.)

2157. — — — That the Supreme Ruler of the universe may have our country under His special care, will be among the latest of my prayers.—R. to A. VIRGINIA ASSEMBLY. viii, 149. (1809.)

2158. DEITY, Protection of.—We join you [Washington] in commending the interests of our dearest country to the protection of Almighty God, beseeching Him to dispose the hearts and minds of its citizens to improve the opportunity afforded them of becoming a happy and respectable nation. And for you we address to Him our earnest prayers, that a life so beloved may be fostered with all His care; that your days may be happy as they have been illustrious; and that He will finally give you that reward which this world cannot give.*—ADDRESS OF CONGRESS TO GENERAL WASHINGTON. RAYNER'S LIFE OF JEFFERSON, 226.

2159. — — — I reciprocate your kind prayers for the protection and blessing of the Common Father and Creator of man.—R. to A. DANBURY BAPTISTS. viii, 114. (1802.)

2160. DEITY, Submission to.—Whatever is to be our destiny, wisdom as well as duty, dictates that we should acquiesce in the will of Him whose it is to give and take away, and be contented in the enjoyment of those who are still permitted to be with us.—To JOHN PAGE. iv, 547. (1804.)

2165. DELAWARE, Anglomany in.—Delaware is on a poise, as she has been since 1775, and will be till Anglomany with her yields to Americanism.—To C. F. VOLNEY. iv, 573. (W., 1805.)

2166. DELAWARE, An English County.—Delaware will probably remain what it ever has been, a mere county of England, conquered indeed, and held under by force, but always disposed to counter-revolution. I speak of its majority only. To Mr. BOWELL. v, 14. (W., 1806.)

2167. DELAY, Danger in.—An instant of delay in executive proceedings may be fatal to the whole nation.—To JAMES BARBOUR. vi, 40. FORD ED., ix, 337. (M., 1812.)

2169. DELUGE, Cases of a Partial.—History renders probably some instances of a partial deluge in the country lying around the Mediterranean Sea. It has been often supposed,

(2 Buffon Epoques, 96) and it is not unlikely that that sea was once a lake. While such, let us admit an extraordinary collection of the waters of the atmosphere from the other parts of the globe to have been discharged over that and the countries whose waters run into it. Or without supposing it a lake, admit such an extraordinary collection of the waters of the atmosphere, and an influx from the Atlantic ocean, forced by long-continued Western winds. That lake, or that sea, may thus have been so raised as to overflow the low lands adjacent to it, as those of Egypt and Armenia, which, according to a tradition of the Egyptians and Hebrews, were overflowed about 2300 years before the Christian era; those of Attica, said to have been overflowed in the time of Ogyges, about 500 years later; and those of Thessaly, in the time of Deucalion, still 300 years posterior.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. vii, 275. FORD ED., iii, 117. (1782.)

2170. DELUGE, Mountain Shells and the.—But such deluges as those will not account for the shells found in the higher lands. A second opinion has been entertained; which is that, in times anterior to the records either of history or tradition, the bed of the ocean, the principal residence of the shelled tribe, has, by some great convulsion of nature, been heaved to the heights at which we now find shells and other remains of marine animals. The favorers of this opinion do well to suppose the great events on which it rests to have taken place beyond all the eras of history; for within these, certainly, none such are to be found; and we may venture to say farther, that no fact has taken place, either in our own days, or in the thousands of years recorded in history, which proves the existence of any natural agents, within or without the bowels of the earth, of force sufficient to heave, to the height of 15,000 feet, such masses as the Andes. The difference between the power necessary to produce such an effect, and that which shuffled together the different parts of Calabria in our days, is so immense, that, from the existence of the latter we are not authorized to infer that of the former.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 276. FORD ED., iii, 118. (1782.)

2171. DELUGE, Voltaire's Shell theory and.—M. de Voltaire has suggested a third solution of this difficulty (Quest. Encycl. Coquilles). He cites an instance in Touraine, where, in the space of 80 years a particular spot of earth had been twice metamorphosed into soft stone, which had become hard when employed in building. In this stone, shells of various kinds were produced, discoverable at first only with the microscope, but afterwards growing with the stone. From this fact, I suppose, he would have us infer that, besides the usual process for generating shells by the elaboration of earth and water in animal vessels, nature may have provided an equivalent operation, by passing the same materials through the pores of calcareous earths and stones; as we see calcareous drop-stones generating every day by percolation of water through limestone and new marble forming in the quarries from which the old has been taken out; and it might be asked, whether it is more difficult for nature to shoot the calcareous juice into the form of a shell, than other juices into the form of crystals, plants, animals, according to the construction of the vessels through which they pass? There is a wonder somewhere. Is it greatest on this branch of the dilemma; on that which supposes the existence of a power of which we have no evidence in any other case; or on the first, which requires us to believe the creation of a body of water, and its subsequent annihilation? The establishment of the instance, cited by M. de Voltaire, of the growth of shells unattached to animal bodies, would have been that of his theory. But he has not established it. He has not even left it on ground so respectable as to have rendered it an object of inquiry to the litterati of his own country. Abandoning this fact, therefore, the three hypotheses are equally unsatisfactory; and we must be contented to acknowledge that this great phenomenon is as yet unsolved. Ignorance is preferable to error; and he is less remote from truth who believes nothing, than he who believes what is wrong.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 276. FORD ED., iii, 118. (1782.)

2172. DELUSION, A policy of.—Warring against the principles of the great body of the American people, the delusion of the people is necessary to the dominant party. I see the extent to which that delusion has been already carried, and I see there is no length to which it may not be pushed by a party in possession of the revenues and the legal authorities of the United States, for a short time, indeed, but yet long enough to admit much particular mischief. There is no event, therefore, however atrocious, which may not be expected.—To SAMUEL SMITH. iv, 254. FORD ED., vii, 277. (M., 1798.) See X. Y. Z. PLOT.

2175. — — — The return of our citizens from the frenzy into which they had been wrought, partly by ill conduct in France, partly by artifices practiced on them, is almost entire, and will, I believe, become quite so.—To THOMAS PAINE. iv, 370. FORD ED., viii, 18. (W., March 1801.)

— DEMOCRACY.—See PARTIES, PEOPLE, REPRESENTATION, REPUBLICANS and SELF-GOVERNMENT.

2176. DEMOCRATIC SOCIETIES, Federalist condemnation of.—The denunciation of the Democratic Societies is one of the extraordinary acts of boldness of which we have seen so many from the faction of monarchs. It is wonderful, indeed, that the President [Washington] should have permitted himself to be the organ of such an attack on the freedom of discussion, the freedom of writing, printing and publishing. It must be a matter of rare curiosity to get at the modifications of these rights proposed by them, and to see what line their ingenuity would draw between democratical societies, whose avowed object is the nourishment of the republican principles of our Constitution, and the Society of the Cincinnati, a self-created one, carving out for itself hereditary distinctions, lowering over our Constitution eternally, meeting together in all parts of the Union, periodically, with closed doors, accumulating a capital in their separate treasury, corresponding secretly and regularly, and of which society the very persons denouncing the democrats are themselves the fathers, founders and high officers. Their sight must be perfectly dazzled by the glittering of crowns and coronets, not to see the extravagance of the proposition to suppress the friends of general freedom, while those who wish to confine that freedom to the few are permitted to go on in their principles and practices. I here put out of sight the persons whose misbehavior has been taken advantage of to slander the friends of popular rights; and I am happy to observe that as far as the circle of my observation and information extends, everybody has lost sight of them, and views the abstract attempt on their natural and constitutional rights in all its nakedness. I have never heard, or heard of, a single expression or opinion which did not condemn it as an inexcusable aggression.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 111. FORD ED., vi, 516. (M., Dec. 1794.)

2177. DEMOCRATIC SOCIETIES, Freedom of Speech and.—The attempt which has been made to restrain the liberty of our citizens meeting together, interchanging sentiments on what subjects they please, and stating their sentiments in the public papers, has come upon us a full century earlier than I expected. To demand the censors of public measures to be given up for punishment, is to renew the demand of the wolves in the fable that the sheep should give up their dogs as hostages of the peace and confidence established between them.—To WILLIAM BRANCH GILES. FORD ED., vi, 515. (M., Dec. 1794.)

2178. DEMOCRATIC SOCIETIES, Hamilton's Hostility to.—The servile copyist of Mr. Pitt thought he, too, must have his alarms, his insurrections, and plots against the Constitution. Hence the incredible fact that the freedom of association, of conversation, and of the press, should in the fifth year of our government, have been attacked under the form of a denunciation of the Democratic Societies, a measure which even England, as boldly as she is advancing to the establishment of an absolute monarchy, has not yet been bold enough to attempt.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 16. (M., May 1795.)

2179. DEMOCRATIC SOCIETIES, Proposed bill against.—We are in suspense in Virginia to see the fate and effect of Mr. Pitt's bill against democratic societies. I wish extremely to get at the true history of this effort to suppress freedom of meeting, speaking, writing and printing. * * * Pray get the outlines of the bill Sedgwick intended to have brought in for this purpose. This will enable us to judge whether we have the merit of the invention; whether we were really beforehand with the British minister on this subject, whether he took his hint from our proposition, or whether the concurrence in the sentiment is merely the result of the general truth that great men will think alike and act alike, though without intercommunication.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. iv, 132. FORD ED., vii, 65. (M., March 1796.)

2180. DEMOCRATS, Americans as.—We of the United States are constitutionally and conscientiously Democrats.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi, 589. FORD ED., x, 22. (P. F., 1816.)

2181. DEMOCRATS AND ARISTOCRATS.—The appellation of aristocrats and democrats is the true one expressing the essence of all [political parties].—To H. LEE. vii, 376. FORD ED., x, 318. (M., 1824.)

2182. DEMOCRATS, The People and.—Democrats consider the people as the safest depository of power in the last resort; they cherish them, therefore, and wish to leave in them all the powers to the exercise of which they are competent.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 391. FORD ED., x, 335. (M., 1825.)

2184. DENMARK, Prize Claims against.—Dr. Franklin, during his residence at this court [Versailles] was instructed by Congress to apply to the court of Denmark for a compensation for certain vessels and cargoes, taken from the English during the late war, by the American squadron under the command of Commodore Paul Jones, carried into a port of Denmark, and by order of the court of Denmark, redelivered to the English. Dr. Franklin made the application through Baron de Waltersdorff, at that time charged with other matters relative to the two countries of Denmark and the United States of America. Baron Waltersdorff, after having written to his court, informed Dr. Franklin that he was authorized to offer a compensation of ten thousand guineas. This was declined, because it was thought that the value of the prizes was the true measure of compensation, and that that ought to be inquired into. Baron de Waltersdorff left this court sometime after, on a visit only, as he expected, to Copenhagen, and the matter was suffered to rest till his return. This was constantly expected till you did me the honor of informing me that he had received another destination. It being now, therefore, necessary to renew our application, it is thought better that Commodore Paul Jones should repair in person to Copenhagen. His knowledge of the whole transaction will best enable him to represent it to that court, and the world has had too many proofs of the justice and magnanimity of his Danish Majesty to leave a doubt that he will order full justice to be done to those brave men who saw themselves deprived of the spoils, won by their gallantry, and at the hazard of their lives, and on whose behalf the justice and generosity of His Majesty is now reclaimed.—To BARON BLOME. ii, 13. (P., 1786.)

2186. DENNIE (Joseph), A Monarchist.—Among the [Federalist] writers, Dennie, the editor of the Portfolio, who was a kind of oracle with them, and styled "the Addison of America," openly avowed his preference of monarchy over all other forms of government, prided himself on the avowal, and maintained it by argument freely and without reserve in his publications.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 390. 2188. DEPORTATION ACT, Denounced.—By the act for the suppression of riots and tumults in the town of Boston (14 G. 3), passed also in the last session of Parliament, a murder committed there is, if the Governor pleases, to be tried in the court of King's Bench, in the island of Great Britain, by a jury of Middlesex. The witnesses, too, on receipt of such a sum as the Governor shall think it reasonable for them to expend, are to enter into recognizance to appear at the trial. This is, in other words, taxing them to the amount of their recognizance; and that amount may be whatever a Governor pleases. For who does his Majesty think can be prevailed on to cross the Atlantic for the sole purpose of bearing evidence to a fact? His expenses are to be borne, indeed, as they shall be estimated by a Governor; but who are to feed the wife and children whom he leaves behind, and who have had no other subsistence but his daily labor? Those epidemical disorders, too, so terrible in a foreign climate, is the cure of them to be estimated among the articles of expense, and their danger to be warded off by the almighty power of a Parliament? And the wretched criminal, if he happen to have offended on the American side, stripped of his privilege of trial by peers of his vicinage, removed from the place where alone full evidence could be obtained, without money, without counsel, without friends, without exculpatory proof, is tried before judges predetermined to condemn. The cowards who would suffer a countryman to be torn from the bowels of their society, in order to be thus offered a sacrifice to Parliamentary tyranny, would merit that everlasting infamy now fixed on the authors of the act!—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 133. FORD ED. i, 438. 2194. DEPORTATION OF ALIENS, Sedition laws and.—The imprisonment of a person under the protection of the laws of this Commonwealth [Kentucky], on his failure to obey the simple order of the President to depart out of the United States, as is undertaken by * * * [the] act, intituled "An Act concerning Aliens," is contrary to the Constitution, one amendment to which has provided that "no person shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law"; and that another having provided, that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to public trial, by an impartial jury, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence," the same act, undertaking to authorize the President to remove a person out of the United States, who is under the protection of the law, on his own suspicion, without accusation, without jury, without public trial, without confrontation of the witnesses against him, without hearing witnesses in his favor, without defence, without counsel, is contrary to the provision also of the Constitution, is therefore not law, but utterly void, and of no force; that transferring the power of judging any person, who is under the protection of the laws, from the courts to the President of the United States, as is undertaken by the same act concerning aliens, is against the article of the Constitution which provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in courts, the judges of which shall hold their offices during good behavior;" and * * * the said act is void for that reason also. And it is further to be noted, that this transfer of judiciary power is to that magistrate of the General Government who already possesses all the Executive, and a negative on all Legislative powers.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 467. FORD ED. vii, 297. 2198. DESERTERS, British, in Virginia.—The number of deserters from the British army who have taken refuge in this State [Virginia] is now considerably augmenting. These people, notwithstanding their coming over to us, being deemed in law alien enemies, and as such not admissible to be citizens, are not within the scope of the Militia and Invasion laws, under which citizens alone can be embodied.—To THE COUNTY LIEUTENANTS. 2199. DESERTERS, Political.—In all countries where parties are strongly marked, as the monocrats and republicans here, there will always be deserters from the one side to the other.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 27. (M., Sep. 1795.)

2200. DESERTERS, Punishment of.—The desertions of your militia have taken away the necessity of answering the question how they shall be armed. * * * I have sent expresses into all the counties from which those militia went, requiring the County Lieutenants to exert themselves in taking them; and such is the detestation with which they have been received, that I have heard from many counties they were going back of themselves. still think that all is not lost in France: that their retrogradation from a limited to an unlimited despotism is but to give themselves a new impulse. But I see not how or when. The press, the only tocsin of a nation, is completely silenced there, and all means of a general effort taken away. However, I am willing to hope, as long as anybody will hope with me; and I am entirely persuaded that the agitations of the public mind advance its powers, and that at every vibration between the points of liberty and despotism, something will be gained for the former. 2208. DETROIT, Contemplated Capture.—The exposed and weak state of our western settlements and the danger to which they are subject from the northern Indians, acting under the influence of the British post at Detroit, render it necessary for us to keep from five to eight hundred men on duty for their defence. This is a great and perpetual expense. Could that post be reduced and retained, it would cover all the States to the southeast of it. We have long meditated the attempt under the direction of Colonel Clark, but the expense would be so great that whenever we have wished to take it up, the circumstance has obliged us to decline it. Two different estimates make it amount to two millions of pounds, present money. We could furnish the men, provisions and every necessary, except powder, had we the money, or could the demands from us be so far supplied from other quarters as to leave it in our power to apply such a sum to that purpose; and, when once done, it would save annual expenditures to a great amount. When I speak of furnishing the men, I mean they should be militia; such being the popularity of Colonel [George Rogers] Clark, and the confidence of the Western people in him, that he could raise the requisite number at any time. We, therefore, beg leave to refer this matter to yourself to determine whether such an enterprise would not be for the general good, and if you think it would, to authorize it at the general expense. This is become the more reasonable if, as I understand, the ratification of the Confederation has been rested on our cession of a part of our Western claim; a cession which (speaking my private opinion) I verily believe will be agreed to if the quantity demanded is not unreasonably great. Should this proposition be approved of, it should be immediately made known to us, as the season is now coming on at which some of the preparations must be made.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 259. FORD ED., ii, 346. (R., 1780.)

2209. DETROIT, Expedition against.

The face of things has so far changed, as to leave it no longer optional in us to attempt or decline the expedition [against Detroit], but compels us to decide in the affirmative, and to begin our preparations immediately. The army the enemy at present have in the South, the reinforcements still expected there, and their determination to direct their future exertions to that quarter, are not unknown to you. The regular force, proposed on our part to counteract those exertions, is such, either from the real or supposed inability of this State, as by no means to allow a hope that it may be effectual. It is, therefore, to be expected that the scene of war will either be within our country, or very nearly advanced to it; and that our principal dependence is to be on militia, for which reason it becomes incumbent to keep as great a proportion of our people as possible free to act in that quarter. In the meantime, a combination is forming in the westward, which, if not diverted, will call thither a principal and most valuable part of our militia. From intelligence received, we have reason to expect that a confederacy of British and Indians, to the amount of two thousand men, is formed for the purpose of spreading destruction and dismay through the whole extent of our frontier in the Spring. * * * There seems to me but one method of preventing this, which is, to give the western enemy employment in their own country. The regular force Colonel Clark already has, with a proper draft from the militia beyond the Alleghany, and that of three or four of our most northern counties, will be adequate to the reduction of Fort Detroit, in the opinion of Colonel Clark. * * * We have, therefore, determined to undertake it, and commit it to his direction. Whether the expense of the enterprise shall be defrayed by the Continental or State expense, we will leave to be decided hereafter by Congress. * * * In the meantime, we only ask the loan of such necessities as, being already at Fort Pitt, will save time and an immense expense of transportation. * * * I hope your Excellency will think yourself justified in lending us this aid, without awaiting the effect of an application elsewhere, as such a delay would render the undertaking abortive. * * * Independent of the favorable effects which a successful enterprise against Detroit must produce to the United States in general, by keeping in quiet the frontier of the northern ones, and leaving our western militia at liberty to aid those of the South, we think the like friendly office performed by us to the States, whenever desired, and almost to the absolute exhausture of our own magazines, gives well-founded hopes that we may be accommodated on this occasion.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 279. FORD ED., ii, 375. (R., Dec. 1780.)

2210 DETROIT, Importance of.—If the post at Detroit be reduced we shall be quiet in future on our frontier, and thereby immense treasures of blood and money be saved; we shall be at leisure to turn our whole force to the rescue of our eastern country from subjugation; we shall divert through our own country a branch of commerce which the European States have thought worthy of the most important struggles and sacrifices, and in the event of peace on terms which have been contemplated by some powers, we shall form to the American Union a barrier against the dangerous extension of the British Province of Canada, and add to the Empire of liberty an extensive and fertile country, thereby converting dangerous enemies into valuable friends.—To GENERAL GEORGE R. CLARK. FORD ED., ii, 390. (R., Dec. 1780.)

2211. DETROIT, Instructions to Gen. Clark.—A powerful army forming by our enemies in the south renders it necessary for us to reserve as much of our militia as possible, free to act in that quarter. At the same time, we have reason to believe that a very extensive combination of British and Indian savages is preparing to invest our western frontier. To prevent the cruel murders and devastations which attend the latter species of war, and at the same time to prevent its producing a powerful diversion of our force from the southern quarter, in which they mean to make their principal effort, and where alone success can be decisive of their ultimate object, it becomes necessary that we aim the first stroke in the western country, and throw the enemy under the embarrassments of a defensive war rather than labor under them ourselves. We have, therefore, determined that an expedition shall be undertaken, under your command, at a very early season of the approaching year, into the hostile country beyond the Ohio, the principal object of which is to be the reduction of the British post at Detroit, and, incidental to it, the acquiring possession of Lake Erie.—To GENERAL GEORGE ROGERS CLARK. FORD ED., ii, 383. (R., Dec. 25, 1780.)

2212. ———. Should you succeed in the reduction of the Post, you are to promise protection to the persons and property of the French and American inhabitants, or of such at least as shall not, on tender, refuse to take the oath of fidelity to the Commonwealth. You are to permit them to continue under the laws and form of government under which they at present live, only substituting the authority of this Commonwealth in all instances in lieu of that of his British Majesty, and exercising yourself under that authority, till further order. Those powers which the British Commandant of the Post, or his principal in Canada, hath used regularly to exercise. To the Indian neighbors you will hold out either fear or friendship, as their disposition and your actual situation may render most expedient.—To GENERAL GEORGE ROGERS CLARK. FORD ED., ii, 389. (R., Dec. 1780.)

tends from about Saginaw bay southwardly to the Miami of the lakes, supposed to contain upwards of five millions of acres, with a prospect of obtaining, for the present, a breadth of two miles for a communication from the Miami to the Connecticut reserve. The Senate having advised and consented to this treaty, I now lay it before both Houses of Congress for the exercise of their constitutional powers as to the means of fulfilling it.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 94. (Jan. 1808.)

2214. DETROIT, War of 1812.—With respect to the unfortunate loss of Detroit and our army, I with pleasure see the animation it has inspired through our whole country, but especially through the Western States, and the determination to retrieve our loss and our honor by increased exertions.—TO THOMAS C. 2215. DICKINSON (John), Character.—A more estimable man, or truer patriot, could not have left us. Among the first of the advocates for the rights of his country when assailed by Great Britain, he continued to the last the orthodox advocate of the true principles of our new government, and his name will be consecrated in history as one of the great worthies of the Revolution. We ought to be grateful for having been permitted to retain the benefit of his counsel to so good an old age.—TO JOSEPH BRINGHURST. v, 249. (W., 1808.) See DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

2217. DICKINSON (John), Congress and.—Congress gave a signal proof of their indulgence to Mr. Dickinson, and of their great desire not to go too fast for any respectable part of our body, in permitting him to draw their second petition to the King according to his own ideas, and passing it with scarcely any amendment. The disgust against this humility was general; and Mr. Dickinson's delight at its passage was the only circumstance which reconciled them to it. The vote being passed, although further observation on it was out of order, he could not refrain from rising and expressing his satisfaction, and concluded by saying, "there is but one word, Mr. President, in the paper which I disapprove, and that is the word Congress"; on which Ben. Harrison rose and said, "there is but one word in the paper, Mr. President, of which I approve, and that is the word Congress."—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 11. FORD ED., i, 17. (1821.)

legislative, executive, and judiciary, civil and military of life, and of death, over our persons and over our properties; and in June, 1781, again under calamity, the same proposition was repeated, and wanted a few votes only of being passed. One who entered into this contest from a pure love of liberty, and a sense of injured rights, who determined to make every sacrifice, and to meet every danger for the reestablishment of those rights on a firm basis, who did not mean to expend his blood and substance for the wretched purpose of changing this master for that, but to place the powers of governing him in a plurality of hands of his own choice, so that the corrupt will of no one man might in future oppress him, must stand confounded and dismayed when he is told, that a considerable portion of that plurality had meditated the surrender of them into a single hand, and, in lieu of a limited monarch, to deliver him over to a despotic one! How must he find his efforts and sacrifices abused and baffled, if he may still, by a single vote, be laid prostrate at the feet of one man! In God's name, from whence have they derived this power? Is it from our ancient laws? None such can be produced. Is it from any principle in our new Constitution, expressed or implied? Every lineament expressed or implied, is in full opposition to it. Its fundamental principle is, that the State shall be governed as a Commonwealth. It provides a republican organization, proscribes under the name of prerogative the exercise of all powers undefined by the laws; places on this basis the whole system of our laws; and by consolidating them together, chooses that they should be left to stand or fall together, never providing for any circumstances, nor admitting that such could arise, wherein either should be suspended; no, not for a moment. Our ancient laws expressly declare, that those who are but delegates themselves, shall not delegate to others powers which require judgment and integrity in their exercise. Or was this proposition moved on a supposed right in the movers, of abandoning their posts in a moment of distress? The same laws forbid the abandonment of that post, even on ordinary occasions; and much more a transfer of their powers into other hands and other forms, without consulting the people. They never admit the idea that these, like sheep or cattle, may be given from hand to hand without an appeal to their own will. Was it from the necessity of the case? Necessities which dissolve a government, do not convey its authority to an oligarchy or a monarchy. They throw back, into the hands of the people, the powers they had delegated, and leave them as individuals to shift for themselves. A leader may offer, but not impose himself, nor be imposed on them. Much less can their necks be submitted to his sword, their breath be held at his will or caprice. The necessity which should operate these tremendous effects should at least be palpable and irresistible. Yet in both instances, where it was feared, or pretended with us, it was belied by the event.

* John Dickinson was one of the delegates from Delaware in the Continental Congress and in the proceedings leading up to the Declaration of Independence, he, to quote Jefferson (I, 11), "retained the hope of reconciliation with the mother country, and was unwilling it should be lessened by offensive temerities".—EDITOR.

It was belied, too, by the preceding experience of our sister States, several of whom had grappled through greater difficulties without abandoning their forms of government. When the proposition was first made, Massachusetts had found even the government of committees sufficient to carry them through an invasion. But we at the time of that proposition, were under no invasion. When the second was made, there had been added to this example those of Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, in all of which the republican form had been found equal to the task of carrying them through the severest trials. In this State alone did there exist so little virtue, that fear was to be fixed in the hearts of the people, and to become the motive of their exertions, and the principle of their government? The very thought alone was treason against the people; was treason against mankind in general; as riveting forever the chains which bow down their necks, by giving to their oppressors a proof, which they would have trumpeted through the universe, of the imbecility of republican government, in times of pressing danger, to shield them from harm. Those who assume the right of giving away the reins of government in any case, must be sure that the herd, whom they hand on to the rods and hatchet of the dictator, will lay their heads on the block, when he shall nod to them. But if our Assemblies supposed such a resignation in the people, I hope they mistook their character. I am of opinion, that the government, instead of being braced and invigorated for greater exertions under their difficulties, would have been thrown back upon the bungling machinery of county committees for administration, till a convention could have been called, and its wheels again set into regular motion. What a cruel moment was this for creating such an embarrassment, for putting to the proof, the attachment of our countrymen to republican government?—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 368. FORD ED., iii, 231. (1782.)

2220. DICTATOR, Misapplied Precedent for.—Those who meant well, of the advocates of this measure (and most of them meant well, for I knew them personally, had been their fellow-laborer in the common cause, and had often proved the purity of their principles), had been seduced in their judgment by the example of an ancient republic, whose constitution and circumstances were fundamentally different. They had sought this precedent in the history of Rome, where alone it was to be found, and where at length, too, it had proved fatal. They had taken it from a republic rent by the most bitter factions and tumults, where the government was of a heavy-handed unfeeling aristocracy, over a people ferocious and rendered desperate by poverty and wretchedness; tumults which could not be allayed under the most trying circumstances, but by the omnipotent hand of a single despot. Their constitution, therefore, allowed a temporary tyrant to be erected, under the name of a dictator; and that temporary tyrant, after a few examples, became perpetual. They misapplied this precedent to a people mild in their dispositions, patient under their trial, united for the public liberty, and affectionate to their leaders. But if from the constitution of the Roman government there resulted to their senate a power of submitting all their rights to the will of one man, does it follow that the Assembly of Virginia have the same authority? What clause in our Constitution has substituted that of Rome, by way of residuary provision, for all cases not otherwise provided for? Or if they may step ad libitum into any other form of government for precedents to rule us by, for what oppression may not a precedent be found in this world of the bellum omnium in omnia? Searching for the foundations of this proposition, I can find none which may pretend a color of right or reason, but the defect * * * that there being no barrier between the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments, the Legislature may seize the whole; that having seized it and possessing a right to fix their own quorum, they may reduce that quorum to one, whom they may call a chairman, speaker, dictator, or any other name they please.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 370. FORD ED., iii, 234. (1782.)

2221. DICTIONARY, An Anglo-Saxon.—There are several things wanting to promote this improvement. [The recovery of the lost Anglo-Saxon and other words.] To reprint the Saxon books in modern type; reform their orthography; publish in the same way the treasures still existing in manuscript. And more than all things we want a dictionary on the plan of Stephens or Scapula, in which the Saxon root, placed alphabetically, shall be followed by all its cognate modifications of nouns, verbs, &c., whether Anglo-Saxon, or found in the dialects of subsequent ages.—To J. EVELYN DENISON. vii, 418. (M., 1825.) See LANGUAGES.

2222. DICTIONARIES, Neology and.—Dictionaries are but the depositories of words already legitimated by usage. Society is the workshop in which new ones are elaborated. When an individual uses a new word, if ill-formed, it is rejected in society; if well formed, adopted, and after due time, laid up in the depository of dictionaries.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 175. (M., 1820.) See LANGUAGES.

2223. DIFFICULTIES, True way out of.—If you ever find yourself environed with difficulties and perplexing circumstances, out of which you are at a loss how to extricate yourself, do what is right, and be assured that that will extricate you the best out of the worst situations. Though you cannot see, when you take one step, what will be the next, yet follow truth, justice, and plain dealing, and never fear their leading you out of the labyrinth, in the easiest manner possible. The knot which you thought a Gordian one, will untie itself before you. Nothing is so mistaken as the supposition that a person is to extricate himself from a difficulty by intrigue, by chicanery, by dissimulation, by trimming, by an untruth, by an injustice. This increases the difficulties tenfold; and those, who pursue these methods, get themselves so involved at length, that they can turn no way but their infamy becomes more exposed.—To PETER CARR. i, 396. (P., 1785.)

2226. DIPLOMATIC ESTABLISHMENT, Economy in.—The new government has now for some time been under way. * * * Abuses under the old forms have led us to lay the basis of the new in a rigorous economy of the public contributions. This principle will show itself in our diplomatic establishments; and the rather, as at such a distance from Europe, and with such an ocean between us, we hope to meddle little in its quarrels or combinations. Its peace and its commerce are what we shall court; and to cultivate these, we propose to place at the courts of Europe most interesting to us diplomatic characters of economical grade, and shall be glad to receive like ones in exchange.—To M. DE PINTO. iii, 174. (N.Y., 1790.)

2230. DISCIPLINE, Education and.—The article of discipline is the most difficult in American education. Premature ideas of independence, too little repressed by parents, beget a spirit of insubordination, which is the great obstacle to science with us, and a principal cause of its decay since the Revolution. I look to it with dismay in our institution [the Virginia University] as a breaker ahead, which I am far from being confident we shall be able to weather.—To THOMAS COOPER. vii, 268. FORD ED., x, 244. (M., 1822.)

2231. — — — The rock which I most dread is the discipline of the institution [the University of Virginia], and it is that on most of our public schools labor. The insubordination of our youth is now the greatest obstacle to their education. We may lessen the difficulty, perhaps, by avoiding too much government, by requiring no useless observances, none which shall merely multiply occasion for dissatisfaction, disobedience and revolt by referring to the more discreet of themselves the minor discipline, the graver to the civil magistrates, as in Edinburgh.*—To GEORGE TICKNOR. vii, 301. 2234. DISCRETION, Exercise of.—In operations at such a distance [case of Naval Agent Eaton in Tripoli], it becomes necessary to leave much to the discretion of the agents employed, but events may still turn up beyond the limits of that discretion. Unable in such case to consult his government, a zealous citizen will act as he believes that would direct him were it apprised of the circumstances, and will take on himself the responsibility. In all these cases, the purity and patriotism of the motives should shield the agent from blame, and even secure the sanction where the error is not too injurious.†—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 56. the stage of public life (now twenty-four years ago), I came to a resolution never to engage while in public office in any kind of enterprise for the improvement of my fortune * * *. I have never departed from it in a single instance; and I have in multiplied instances found myself happy in being able to decide and to act as a public servant, clear of all interest, in the multiform questions that have arisen, wherein I have seen others embarrassed and biased by having got themselves into a more interested situation. Thus I have thought myself richer in contentment than I should have been with any increase of fortune. * * * My public career is now closing, and I will go through on the principle on which I have hitherto acted.—To ——. iii, 527. 2242. DISPUTATION, Avoid.—In stating prudential rules for our government in society, I must not omit the important one of never entering into dispute or argument with another. I never saw an instance of one of two disputants convincing the other by argument. I have seen many, on their getting warm, becoming rude, and shooting one another. Conviction is the effect of our own dispassionate reasoning, either in solitude, or weighing within ourselves, dispassionately, what we hear from others, standing uncommitted in argument ourselves. It was one of the rules which, above all others, made Dr. Franklin the most amiable of men in society, "never to contradict anybody." If he was urged to announce an opinion, he did it rather by asking questions, as if for information, or by suggesting doubts. When I hear another express an opinion which is not mine, I say to myself, he has a right to his opinion, as I to mine; why should I question it? His error does me no injury, and shall I become a Don Quixote, to bring all men by force of argument to one opinion? If a fact be misstated, it is probable he is gratified by a belief of it, and I have no right to deprive him of the gratification. If he wants information, he will ask it, and then I will give it in measured terms; but if he still believes his own story, and shows a desire to dispute the fact with me, I hear him and say nothing. It is his affair, not mine, if he prefers error.—To THOMAS JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. v, 390. FORD ED., ix, 232. (W., 1808.)

2243. DISPUTATION, Political.—There are two classes of disputants most frequently to be met with among us. The first is of young students, just entered the threshold of science, with a first view of its outlines, not yet filled up with the details and modifications which a further progress would bring to their knowledge. The other consists of the ill-tempered and rude men in society, who have taken up a passion for politics. From both of these classes of disputants, * * * keep aloof, as you would from the infected subjects of yellow fever or pestilence. Consider yourself, when with them, as among the patients of Bedlam, needing medical more than moral counsel. Be a listener only, keep within yourself, and endeavor to establish with yourself the habit of silence, especially on politics. In the fevered state of our country, no good can ever result from any attempt to set one of these fiery zealots to rights, either in fact or principle. They are determined as to the facts they will believe, and the opinions on which they will act. Get by them, therefore, as you would by an angry bull; it is not for a man of sense to dispute the road with such an animal. You will be more exposed than others to have these animals shaking their horns at you, because of the relation in which you stand with me. Full of political venom, and willing to see me and to hate me as a chief in the antagonistic party, your presence will be to them what the vomit grass is to the sick dog, a nostrum for producing ejaculation. Look upon them exactly with that eye, and pity them as objects to whom you can administer only occasional ease. My character is not within their power. It is in the hands of my fellow citizens at large, and will be consigned to honor or infamy by the verdict of the republican mass of our country, according to what themselves will have seen, not what their enemies and mine shall have said. Never, therefore, consider these puppies in politics as requiring any notice from you, and always show that you are not afraid to leave my character to the umpirage of public opinion.—To THOMAS JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. v, 391. FORD ED., ix, 232. (W., 1808.)

2245. DISSENSION, Evils of Political.—Political dissension is doubtless a less evil than the lethargy of despotism, but still it is a great evil, and it would be as worthy the efforts of the patriot as of the philosopher, to exclude its influence, if possible, from social life. The good are rare enough at best. There is no reason to subdivide them by artificial lines. But whether we shall ever be able so far to perfect the principles of society, as that political opinions shall, in its intercourse, be as inoffensive as those of philosophy, mechanics, or any other, may well be doubted.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 176. 2246. 2248. DOLLAR, Adaptedness for Unit.—In fixing the Unit of Money, these circumstances are of principal importance. 1. That it be of convenient size to be applied as a measure to the common money transactions of life. 2. That its parts and multiples be in an easy proportion to each other, so as to facilitate the money arithmetic. 3. That the unit and its parts, or divisions, be so nearly of the value of some of the known coins, as that they may be of easy adoption for the people. The Spanish dollar seems to fulfil all these conditions. Taking into our view all money transactions, great and small, I question if a common measure of more convenient size than the Dollar could be proposed. The value of 100, 1,000, 10,000 dollars is well estimated by the mind; so is that of the tenth or the hundredth of a dollar. Few transactions are above or below these limits. The expediency of attending to the size of the money Unit will be evident to anyone who will consider how inconvenient it would be to a manufacturer or merchant, if, instead of the yard for measuring cloth, either the inch or the mile had been made the Unit of Measure.*—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 162. FORD ED., iii, 446. (1784.) See DECIMAL SYSTEM.

* Parton in his Life of Jefferson says: "Two years before, Gouverneur Morris, a clerk in the office of his uncle Robert Morris, had conceived the most happy idea of applying the decimal system to the notation of money. But it always requires several men to complete one great thing. The details of the system devised by Gouverneur Morris were so cumbersome and awkward as almost to neutralize the simplicity of the leading idea. Jefferson rescued the conception by proposing our present 10 and cents; the dollar to be the Unit 'silver coin.'"—EDITOR.

2249. — — — The Unit, or Dollar, is a known coin, and the most familiar of all, to the minds of the people. It is already adopted from South to North; has identified our currency, and therefore happily offers itself as a Unit already introduced. Our public debt, our requisitions, and their appointments, have given it actual and long possession of the place of Unit. The course of our commerce, too, will bring us more of this than of any other foreign coin, and, therefore, renders it more worthy of attention. I know of no Unit which can be proposed in competition with the dollar, but the Pound. But what is the Pound? 1547 grains of fine silver in Georgia; 1289 grains in Virginia, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts and New Hampshire; 1031 1-4 grains in Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania and New Jersey; 966 3-4 grains in North Carolina and New York. Which of these shall we adopt? To which State give that preeminence of which all are so jealous? And on which impose the difficulties of a new estimate of their corn, their cattle and other commodities? Or shall we hang the pound sterling, as a common badge, about all their necks? This contains 1718 3-4 grains of pure silver. It is difficult to familiarize a new coin to the people; it is more difficult to familiarize them to a new coin with an old name. Happily, the dollar is familiar to them all, and is already as much referred to for a measure of value, as are their respective provincial pounds.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 165. FORD ED., iii, 448. (1784.)

2250. DOLLAR, Advantages as Unit.—The Financier [Robert Morris] * * * seems to concur with me in thinking his smallest fractional division too minute for a Unit and, therefore, proposes to transfer that denomination to his largest silver coin, containing 1000 of the units first proposed, (1440) and worth about 4s. 2d. lawful, or 25-36 of a Dollar. The only question then remaining between us is, whether the Dollar, or this coin, be best for the Unit. We both agree that the ease of adoption with the people, is the thing to be aimed at. As to the Dollar, events have overtaken and superseded the question. It is no longer a doubt whether the people can adopt it with ease; they have adopted it, and will have to be turned out of that into another tract of calculation, if another Unit be assumed. They have now two Units, which they use with equal facility, viz., the Pound of their respective State, and the Dollar. The first of these is peculiar to each State; the second, happily, common to all. In each State, the people have an easy rule of converting the pound of their State into dollars, or dollars into pounds; and this is enough for them, without knowing how this may be done in every State of the Union. Such of them as live near enough the borders of their State to have dealings with their neighbors, learn also the rule of their neighbors; thus, in Virginia and the Eastern States, where the dollar is 6s. or 3-10 of a pound, to turn pounds into dollars, they multiply by 10 and divide by three. To turn dollars into pounds, they multiply by 3 and divide by 10. Those in Virginia who live near to Carolina, where the dollar is 8s. or 4-10 of a pound, learn the operation of that State, which is a multiplication by 4, and division by 10, et e converso. Those who live near Maryland, where the dollar is 7s. 6d. or 3-8 of a pound, multiply by 3, and divide by 8, et e converso. All these operations are easy, and have been found, by experience, not too much for the arithmetic of the people, when they have occasion to convert their old Unit into dollars, or the reverse.—SUPPLEMENTARY EXPLANATIONS. i, 171. FORD ED., iii, 455. (1784.) See MONEY, UNIT.

2251. — —. In the States where the dollar is 3-10 of a pound, this Unit [of the Financier] will be 5-24. Its conversion into the pound, then, will be by a multiplication of 5 and a division by 24. In the States where the dollar is 3-8 of a pound, this Unit will be 25-96 of a pound, and the operation must be to multiply by 25, and divide by 96, et e converso. Where the dollar is 4-10 of a pound, this Unit will be 5-18. The simplicity of the fraction and, of course, the facility of conversion and reconversion is, therefore, against this Unit, and in favor of the dollar, in every instance. The only advantage it has over the dollar, is, that it will in every case, express our farthing without a remainder; whereas, though the dollar and its decimals will do this in many cases, it will not in all. But, even in these, by extending your notation one figure further, to wit, to thousands, you approximate to perfect accuracy within less than the two-thousandth part of a dollar; an atom in money which every one would neglect. Against this single inconvenience, the other advantages of the dollar are more than sufficient to preponderate. This Unit will present to the people a new coin, and whenever they endeavor to estimate its value by comparing it with a Pound, or with a Dollar, the Units they now possess, they will find the fraction very compound, and, of course, less accommodated to their comprehension and habits than the dollar. Indeed, the probability is, that they could never be led to compute in it generally.—SUPPLEMENTARY EXPLANATIONS. i, 171. FORD ED., iii, 455. (1784.)

2252. DOLLAR, Coinage.—If we adopt the Dollar for our Unit, we should strike four coins, one of gold, two of silver, and one of copper, viz.: 1. A golden piece, equal in value to ten dollars;* 2. The Unit or Dollar itself, of silver: 3. The tenth of a Dollar, of silver also: 4. The hundredth of a Dollar, of copper.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 163. FORD ED., iii, 447. (1784.)

2253. — —. Perhaps it would not be amiss to coin three more pieces of silver, one of the value of five-tenths, or half a dollar, one of the value of two-tenths, which would be equal to the Spanish pistereen, and one of the value of five coppers, which would be equal to the Spanish half-bit. We should then have five silver coins, viz.:

* Jefferson subsequently added the five-dollar gold coin to the list.—EDITOR.

1. The Unit or Dollar;
2. The half dollar or five-tenths;
3. The double-tenth, equal to 2, or one-fifth of a dollar, or to the pistereen;
4. The tenth, equal to a Spanish bit;
5. The five copper piece, equal to .5, or one-twentieth of a dollar, or the half bit.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 166. FORD ED., iii, 450. (1784.)

2254. DOLLAR, Copper coinage and.—The hundredth [of a dollar], or copper, will differ little from the copper of the four Eastern States, which is 1-108 of a dollar; still less from the penny of New York and North Carolina, which is 1-96 of a dollar; and somewhat more from the penny or copper of Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland, which is 1-90 of a dollar. It will be about the medium between the old and the new coppers of these States, and will, therefore, soon be substituted for them both. In Virginia, coppers have never been in use. It will be as easy, therefore, to introduce them there of one value as of another. The copper coin proposed will be nearly equal to three-fourths of their penny, which is the same with the penny lawful of the Eastern States.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 165. FORD ED., iii, 449. (1784.)

2255. — —. The Financier [Robert Morris] supposes that the 1-100 part of a dollar is not sufficiently small, where the poor are purchasers or vendors. If it is not, make a smaller coin. But I suspect that it is small enough. Let us examine facts, in countries where we are acquainted with them. In Virginia, where our towns are few, small, and, of course, their demand for necessities very limited, we have never yet been able to introduce a copper coin at all. The smallest coin which anybody will receive there is the half-bit, or the 1-20 of a dollar. In those States where the towns are larger and more populous, a more habitual barter of small wants has called for a copper coin of 1-90, 1-96, or 1-108 of a dollar. In England, where the towns are many and populous, and where ages of experience have matured the conveniences of intercourse, they have found that some wants may be supplied for a farthing, or 1-208 of a dollar, and they have accommodated a coin to this want. This business is evidently progressive. In Virginia, we are far behind. In some other States, they are further advanced, to wit, to the appreciation of 1-90, 1-96, 1-108 of a dollar. To this most advanced state, then, I accommodated my smallest coin in the decimal arrangement, as a money of payment, corresponding with the money of account. I have no doubt the time will come when a smaller coin will be called for. When that comes, let it be made. It will probably be the half of the copper I suppose, that is to say, 5-1000 or .005 of a dollar, this being very nearly the farthing of England. But it will be time enough to make it, when the people shall be ready to receive it.—SUPPLEMENTARY EXPLANATIONS. i, 173. FORD ED., iii, 456. (1784.)

2257. DOLLAR, Grains of Silver in.—If we determine that a Dollar shall be our Unit, we must then say with precision what a Dollar is. This coin, struck at different times, of different weights and fineness, is of different values. Sir Isaac Newton's assay and representation to the Lords of the Treasury, in 1717, of those which he examined, make their values as follows:

| | | |
|--------------------------------|-----------|---|
| The Seville piece | dwt. gra. | |
| of eight..... | 17-12 | containing 387 grains of pure silver |
| The Mexico piece | | |
| of eight..... | 17-10 | 5-9 containing 385 1-2 grains of pure silver. |
| The Pillar piece of eight..... | 17-9 | containing 385 3-4 grains of pure silver. |
| The new Seville piece | | |
| of eight..... | 14- | containing 308 7-10 grains of pure silver. |

The Financier states the old Dollar as containing 376 grains of fine silver, and the new 365 grains. If the Dollars circulating among us be of every date equally, we should examine the quantity of pure metal in each, and from them form an average for our Unit. This is a work proper to be committed to mathematicians as well as merchants, and which should be decided on actual and accurate experiment.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 167. FORD ED., iii, 451. (1784.) See GOLD AND SILVER.

2258. ——. Congress, in 1786, established the Money Unit at 375.64 Troy grains of pure silver. It is proposed to enlarge this by about the third of a grain in weight, or a mill in value; that it is to say, to establish it at 376 (or, more exactly, 375.989343) instead of 375.64 grains; because it will be shown that this, as the unit of coin, will link in system with the units of length, surface, capacity, and weight, whenever it shall be thought proper to extend the decimal ratio through all these branches. It is to preserve the possibility of doing this, that this very minute alteration is proposed. * * * Let it be declared, therefore, that the money unit or dollar of the United States, shall contain 371.262 American grains of pure silver.—COINAGE, WEIGHTS AND MEASURES REPORT. vii, 487. (July 1790.)

2259. ——. Let the Money Unit, or dollar, contain eleven-twelfths of an ounce of pure silver. This will be 376 Troy grains (or more exactly, 375.989343 Troy grains), which will be about a third of a grain (or more exactly, .349343 of a grain) more than the present unit. This, with the twelfth of alloy already established, will make the dollar or of the weight of an ounce, or of a cubic inch of rain water, exactly. The series of mills, cents, dimes, dollars, and eagles, to remain as already established.—COINAGE, WEIGHTS AND MEASURES REPORT. vii, 490. (July 1790.)

2260. ——. The pure silver in a dollar * * * [is] fixed by law at 347½ grains, and all debts and contracts * * * [are] bottomed on that value * * * —To DR. ROBERT PATTERSON. vi, 22. (M., Nov. 1811.)

2261. DOLLAR, Proportion of Alloy.—Some alloy is necessary to prevent the coin from wearing too fast; too much, fills our pockets with copper, instead of silver. The silver coin assayed by Sir Isaac Newton, varied from 1 1-2 to 76 pennyweights alloy, in the pound Troy of mixed metal. The British standard has 18 dwt.; the Spanish coins assayed by Sir Isaac Newton, have from 18 to 19 1-2 dwt.; the new French crown has in fact 19 1-2, though by edict, it should have 20 dwt., that is 1-12. The taste of our countrymen will require that their furniture plate should be as good as the British standard. Taste cannot be controlled by law. Let it then give the law, in a point which is indifferent to a certain degree. Let the Legislature fix the alloy of furniture plate at 18 dwt., the British standard, and Congress that of their coin at one ounce in the pound, the French standard. This proportion has been found convenient for the alloy of gold coin, and it will simplify the system of our mint to alloy both metals in the same degree. The coin, too, being the least pure, will be the less easily melted into plate. These reasons are light, indeed, and, of course, will only weigh if no heavier ones can be opposed to them.—NOTES ON A MONEY UNIT. i, 167. FORD ED., iii, 451. (1784.)

2263. ——. I concur with you in thinking that * * * the alloy should be the same in both metals.—To ALEXANDER HAMILTON. iii, 330. (Feb. 1792.)

2264. DOLLAR, Reducing Value of.—With respect to the dollar, it must be admitted by all the world, that there is great uncertainty in the meaning of the term, and therefore all the world will have justified Congress for their first act of removing the uncertainty by declaring what they understand by the term; but the uncertainty once removed, exists no longer, and I very much doubt now a right to change the value, and especially to lessen it. It would lead to so easy a mode of paying off their debts. Besides, the parties injured by this reduction of the value would have so much matter to urge in support of the first point of fixation.—To ALEXANDER HAMILTON. iii, 330. (1792.)

2265. ——. Should it be thought that Congress may reduce the value of the dollar, I should be for adopting for our unit, instead of the dollar, either one ounce of pure silver, or one ounce of standard silver, so as to keep the unit of money a part of the system of measures, weights and coins.—To ALEXANDER HAMILTON. iii, 330. (1792.)

2266. DOLLAR, Stopping Coinage.—I should approve of your employing the Mint on small silver coins, rather than on dollars and gold coins, so far as the consent of those who employ it can be obtained. It would be much more valuable to the public to be supplied with abundance of dimes and half dimes, which would stay among us, than with dollars and eagles which leave us immediately. Indeed I wish the law authorized the making two-cent and three-cent pieces of silver, and golden dollars, which would all be large enough to handle, and would be a great convenience to our own citizens.—To ROBERT PATTERSON. v, 61. (W., March 1807.)

2267. DOLLAR, Summary Review of measures.—Congress as early as January 7, 1782, had turned their attention to the moneys current in the several States, and had directed the Financier, Robert Morris, to report to them a table of rates at which the foreign coins should be received at the treasury. That officer, or rather his assistant, Gouverneur Morris, answered them on the 15th, in an able and elaborate statement of the denominations of money current in the several States, and of the comparative value of the foreign coins chiefly in circulation with us. He went into the consideration of the necessity of establishing a standard of value with us, and of the adoption of a money Unit. He proposed for that Unit, such a fraction of pure silver as would be a common measure of the penny of every State, without leaving a fraction. This common divisor he found to be the 1-1440 of a dollar, or 1-1600 of the crown sterling. The value of a dollar was, therefore, to be expressed by 1440 units, and of a crown by 1600; each Unit containing a quarter of a grain of fine silver. Congress turning again their attention to this subject the following year, the Financier, by a letter of April 30, 1783, further explained and urged the Unit he had proposed; but nothing more was done on it until the ensuing year, when it was again taken up, and referred to a committee, of which I was a member. The general views of the Financier were sound, and the principle was ingenious on which he proposed to found his Unit; but it was too minute for ordinary use, too laborious for computation, either by the head or in figures. The price of a loaf of bread, 1-20 of a dollar, would be 72 units. A pound of butter 1-5 of a dollar, 288 units. A horse or bullock of eighty dollars value would require a notation of six figures, to wit, 115,200, and the public debt, suppose of eighty millions, would require twelve figures, to wit, 115,200,000,000 units. Such a system of money-arithmetic would be entirely unmanageable for the common purposes of Society. I propose, therefore, instead of this, to adopt the Dollar as our Unit of account and payment, and that its divisions and sub-divisions should be in the decimal ratio. I wrote some Notes on the subject, which I submitted to the consideration of the Financier. I received his answer and adherence to his general system, only agreeing to take for his Unit one hundred of those he first proposed, so that a Dollar should be 14 40-100, and a crown 16 units. I replied to this, and printed my notes and reply on a flying sheet, which I put into the hands of the members of Congress for consideration, and the Committee agreed to report on my principle. This was adopted the ensuing year, and is the system which now prevails.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 52. FORD ED., i, 73. (1820.) See MONEY, UNIT.

2268. DOUBT, Caution in.—In case of doubt, it is better to say too little than too much.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., v, 369. (Pa., 1791.)

2270. DRAWBACKS, Evils of.—With respect to the interests of the United States in this exuberant commerce which is now bringing war on us, we concur perfectly. It brings us into collision with other powers in every sea, and will force us into every war of the European powers. The converting this great agricultural country into a city of Amsterdam.—a mere headquarters for carrying on the commerce of all nations with one another, is too absurd. Yet this is the real object of the drawback system.—it enriches a few individuals, but lessens the stock of native productions, by withdrawing from them all the hands thus employed. It is essentially interesting to us to have shipping and seamen enough to carry our surplus produce to market; but beyond that, I do not think we are bound to give it encouragement by drawbacks or premiums. I wish you may be right in supposing that the trading States would now be willing to give up the drawbacks, and to denationalize all ships taking foreign articles on board for any other destination than the United States, on being secured by discriminating duties, or otherwise in the exclusive carriage of the produce of the United States. I should doubt it. Were such a proposition to come from them, I presume it would meet with little difficulty. Otherwise, I suppose it must wait till peace, when the right of drawback will be less valued than the exclusive carriage of our own produce.—To BENJAMIN STODDERT. v, 426. FORD ED., ix, 245. (W., Feb. 1809.)

2271. DRAWBACKS, Introduction of.

—This most heterogeneous principle was transplanted into ours from the British system by a man [Alexander Hamilton] whose mind was really powerful, but chained by native partialities to everything English; who had formed exaggerated ideas of the superior perfection of the English constitution, the superior wisdom of their government, and sincerely believed it for the good of this country to make them their model in everything; without considering that what might be wise and good for a nation essentially commercial, and entangled in complicated intercourse with numerous and powerful neighbors, might not be so for one essentially agricultural, and insulated by nature from the abusive governments of the old world.—To WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. vii, 6. FORD ED., x, 34. (M., 1816.)

2272. DRAWBACKS, Repeal of.

—The inordinate extent given to commerce among us by our becoming the factors of the whole world, has enabled it to control the agricultural and manufacturing interests. When a change of circumstances shall reduce it to an equilibrium with these, to the carrying our produce only, to be exchanged for our wants, it will return to a wholesome condition for the body politic, and that beyond which it should never be encouraged to go. The repeal of the drawback system will either effect this, or bring sufficient sums into the treasury to meet the wars we shall bring on by our covering every sea with our vessels. But this must be the work of peace. The correction will be after my day, as the error originated before it.—To LARKIN SMITH. v, 441. (M., April 1809.)

2273. DRAWBACKS, Wars and.

—I returned from Europe after our government had got under way, and had adopted from the British code the law of drawbacks. I early saw its effects in the jealousies and vexations of Britain; and that, retaining it, we must become, like her, an essentially warring nation, and meet, in the end, the catastrophe impending over her. No one can doubt that this alone produced the Orders of Council, the depredations which preceded, and the war which followed them. Had we carried but our own produce, and brought back but our own wants, no nation would have troubled us. * * * When war was declared, and especially after Massachusetts, who had produced it, took side with the enemy waging it, I pressed on some confidential friends in Congress to avail us of the happy opportunity of repealing the drawbacks and I do rejoice to find that you are in that sentiment. * * * It is one of three great measures necessary to insure us permanent prosperity. It preserves our peace.—To WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. vii, 7. FORD ED., x, 35. (M., 1816.)

2274. DREAMS, Hints from.

—We sometimes from dreams pick up some hint worth improving by * * * reflection.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., x, 249. (M., 1823.)

2275. DREAMS, Utopian.

—Mine, after all, may be an Utopian dream, but being innocent, I have thought I might indulge in it till I go to the land of dreams, and sleep there with the dreamers of all past and future times.*—To M. CORREA. vii, 95. (P.F., 1817.)

2276. DRESS, Economy and.

—The article of dress is perhaps that in which economy is the least to be recommended. It is so important [in married life] to each to continue to please the other, that the happiness of both requires the most pointed attention to whatever may contribute to it—and the more as time makes greater inroads on our person. Yet, generally, we become slovenly in proportion as personal decay requires the contrary.—To MARY JEFFERSON EPPES. D. L. J. 247 (Pa., 1798.)

2277. DRESS, Women's.—Some ladies think they may, under the privileges of the déshabille, be loose and negligent of their dress in the morning. But be you, from the moment you rise till you go to bed, as cleanly and properly dressed as at the hours of dinner or tea.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. D. L. J. 71. (1783.)

— DRUNKARDS.—See INTEMPERANCE.

2278. DUANE (William), Assistance to.

—The zeal, the disinterestedness, and the abilities with which you have supported the great principles of our [political] revolution, the persecutions you have suffered, and the firmness and independence with which you have suffered them, constitute too strong a claim on the good wishes of every friend of elective government to be effaced by a solitary case of difference in opinion. Thus I think, and thus I believed my much-esteemed friend Lieper would have thought; and I am the more concerned he does not, as it is so much more in his power to be useful to you than in mine. His residence, and his standing at the great seat of the moneyed institutions, command a credit with them, which no inhabitant of the country, and of agricultural pursuits only, can have. The two or three banks in our uncommercial State are too distant to have any relations with the farmers of Albemarle. We are persuaded you have not overrated the dispositions of this State to support yourself and your paper. They have felt its services too often to be indifferent in the hour of trial. They are well aware that the days of danger are not yet over. And I am sensible that if there were any means of bringing into concert the good will of the friends of the "Aurora" scattered over this State, they would not deceive your expectations. One month sooner might have found such an opportunity in the assemblage of our Legislature in Richmond. But that is now dispersed not to meet again under a twelvemonth. We, here, are but one of a hundred counties, and on consultation with friends of the neighborhood, it is their opinion that if we can find an endorser resident in Richmond, ten (for that is indispensable) or twelve persons of this county would readily engage, as you suggest, for their $100 each, and some of them for more. It is believed that the republicans in that city can and will do a great deal more; and perhaps their central position may enable them to communicate with other counties. We have written to a distinguished friend to the cause of liberty there to take the lead in the business, as far as concerns that place; and for our own, we are taking measures for obtaining the aid of the bank of the same place. In all this I am merely a cipher. Forty years of almost constant absence from the State have made me a stranger in it, have left me a solitary tree, from around which the axe of time has felled all the companions of its youth and growth. I have, however, engaged some active and zealous friends to do what I could not. * * * But our support can be but partial, and far short, both in time and measure, of your difficulties. They will be little more than evidences of our friendship.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 575. FORD ED., ix, 311. (M., 1811.)

* Jefferson was discussing his popular and higher education plans for Virginia.—EDITOR.

2279. DUANE (William), Character of.—I believe Duane to be a very honest man and sincerely republican; but his passions are stronger than his prudence, and his personal as well as general antipathies render him very intolerant. These traits lead him astray, and require his readers, even those who value him for his steady support of the republican cause, to be on their guard against his occasional aberrations.—To WILLIAM WIRT. v, 595. FORD ED., ix, 319. (M., 1811.)

2280. DUANE (William), Defection of.—After so long a course of steady adherence to the general sentiments of the republicans, it would afflict me sincerely to see you separate from the body, become auxiliary to the enemies of our government, who have to you been the bitterest enemies, who are now chuckling at the prospect of division among us, and, as I am told, are subscribing for your paper.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 592. FORD ED., ix, 316. (M., April 1811.)

2281. DUANE (William), Office for.—Duane's defection from the republican ranks, his transition to the federalists, and giving triumph, in an important State, to wrong over right, have dissolved, of his own seeking, his connection with us. Yet the energy of his press when our cause was laboring, and all but lost under the overwhelming weight of its powerful adversaries, its unquestionable effect in the revolution produced in the public mind, which arrested the rapid march of our government towards monarchy, overweigh in fact the demerit of his desertion, when we had become too strong to suffer from it sensibly. He is, in truth, the victim of passions which his principles were not strong enough to control. Although, therefore, we are not bound to clothe him with the best robe, to put a ring on his finger, and to kill the fatted calf for him, yet neither should we leave him to eat husks with the swine.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., x, 275. (M. 1823.)

2282. ——. I received a letter from some friend of yours who chose to be anonymous, suggesting that your situation might be bettered, and the government advantaged by availing itself of your services in some line. I immediately wrote to a friend whose situation enabled him to attend to this. I have received no answer but hope it is kept in view. I am long since withdrawn from the political world, think little, read less, and know all but nothing of what is going on; but I have not forgotten the past, nor those who were fellow laborers in the gloomy hours of federal ascendancy when the spirit of republicanism was beaten down, its votaries arraigned as criminals, and such threats denounced as posterity would never believe.

* From a letter recommending Duane for office.—EDITOR.

My means of service are slender; but such as they are, if you can make them useful to you in any solicitation, they shall be sincerely employed.—To WILLIAM DUANE. FORD ED., x, 276. (M., 1824.)

2283. DUEL, Murder by.—Whosoever committeth murder by way of duel shall suffer death by hanging; and if he were the challenger, his body, after death, shall be gibbeted. He, who removeth it from the gibbet, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and the officer shall see that it be replaced.—CRIMES BILL. i, 150. FORD ED., ii, 207. (1779.)

2284. DUER (William), Failure of.—The stock-jobbing speculations have occupied some of our countrymen to such a degree as to give sincere uneasiness to those who would rather see their capitals employed in commerce, manufactures, buildings and agriculture. The failure of Mr. Duer, the chief of that description of people, has already produced some other bankruptcies, and more are apprehended. He had obtained money from great numbers of small tradesmen and farmers, tempting them by usurious interest, which has made the distress very extensive.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. FORD ED., v, 502. (Pa., April 1792.)

2285. ——. Duer, the King of the alley, is under a sort of check. The stocksellers say he will rise again. The stockbuyers count him out, and the credit and fate of the nation seem to hang on the desperate throws and plunges of gambling scoundrels.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 455. (Pa., 1792.)

2286. DUER (William), Outbreak against.—It was reported here [Philadelphia] last night, that there had been a collection of people round the place of Duer's confinement, of so threatening an appearance, as to call out the Governor and militia, and to be fired on by them, and that several of them were killed. I hope it is not true. Nothing was wanting to fill up the criminality of this paper system, but to shed the blood of those whom it had cheated of their substance.—To FRANCIS EPPES. FORD ED., v, 508. (April 1792.)

2287. DUER (William), Threats of.—Duer now threatens that, if he is not relieved by certain persons, he will lay open to the world such a scene of villainy as will strike it with astonishment.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 213. (Pa., 1793.)

2288. DUMAS (C. W. F.), Agency of.—Would it not be worth while to continue the agency of Dumas? * * * He is undoubtedly in the confidence of some one who has a part in the Dutch government, and who seems to allow him to communicate to us.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 8. (P., 1784.)

2289. ——. Mr. Dumas, very early in the [Revolutionary] war, was employed first by Dr. Franklin, afterwards by Mr. Adams, to transact the affairs of the United States in Holland. Congress never passed any express vote of confirmation, but they opened a direct correspondence with Mr. Dumas, sent him orders to be executed, confirmed and augmented his salary, made that augmentation retrospective, directed him to take up his residence in their hotel at the Hague, and passed such other votes from time to time as established him de facto their agent at the Hague. On the change in the organization of our government in 1789, no commission nor new appointment took place with respect to him, though it did in most other cases; yet the correspondence with him from the office of Foreign Affairs has been continued, and he has regularly received his salary.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 331. FORD ED., v, 437. (Pa., 1792.)

2290. DUMAS (C. W. F.), Congress and.—On the 18th of this month, I received a letter from his Excellency, the Count de Vergennes, expressing the interest which he takes in your welfare, and recommending you to Congress.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. i, 528. FORD ED., iv, 190. (P., 1786.)

2291. ——. I am pressed on so many hands to recommend Dumas to the patronage of Congress, that I cannot avoid it. Everybody speaks well of him, and his zeal in our cause. Anything done for him will gratify this court [France], and the patriotic party in Holland, as well as some distinguished individuals.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. i, 557. (P., 1786.)

2292. ——. I enclose you a letter from the Count de Vergennes in favor of Mr. Dumas. With the services of this gentleman to the United States, yourself and Dr. Franklin are better acquainted than I am. Those he has been able to render towards effecting the late alliance between France and the United Netherlands are the probable ground of the present application.—To JOHN JAY. i, 524. (P., 1786.)

2293. ——. I was gratified with the receipt of your favor * * * containing a copy of the resolution of Congress of October 24th, 1785, in your favor, and which I wish had been more so.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. i, 528. (P., 1786.)

2294. DUMAS (C. W. F.), Holland and.—Besides former applications to me in favor of Dumas, the Rhingrave of Salm (the effective minister of the government of Holland, while their two ambassadors here are ostensible, and) who is conducting secret arrangements for them with this court, presses his interests on us. It is evident the two governments make a point of it. You ask why they do not provide for him themselves? I am not able to answer the question, but by a conjecture that Dumas's particular ambition prefers an appointment from us. I know all the difficulty about this application which Congress has to encounter. I see the reasons against giving him the primary appointment at that court, and the difficulty of his accommodating himself to a subordinate one. Yet I think something must be done in it to gratify this court [France], of which we must be always asking favors. In these countries, personal favors weigh more than public interest. The minister who has asked a gratification for Dumas, has embarked his own feelings and reputation in that demand. I do not think it was discreet by any means. But this reflection might, perhaps, aggravate a disappointment. I know not really what you can do; but yet hope something will be done.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 568. FORD ED., iv, 226. (P., 1786.)

2295. ——. Dumas is a great favorite both of Holland and France.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 526. (P., 1786.)

2296. DUMOURIEZ (C. F.), Apostacy of.—From the steadiness of the French people on the defection of so popular and capital a commander as Dumouriez, we have a proof that nothing can shake their republicanism.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 8. FORD ED., vi, 325. (1793.)

2297. DUMOURIEZ (C. F.), A scoundrel.—Dumouriez was known to be a scoundrel in grain. I mentioned this from the beginning of his being placed at the head of the armies; but his victories at length silenced me. His apostasy has now proved that an unprincipled man, let his other fitnesses be what they will, ought never to be employed. It has proved, too, that the French army, as well as nation, cannot be shaken in their republicanism. Dumouriez's popularity put it as severe a proof as could be offered.—To DR. GEORGE GILMER. iv, 5. FORD ED., vi, 324. (Pa., 1793.)

2298. DUMOURIEZ (C. F.), Without Virtue.—No confidence in Dumouriez's virtue opposes the story that he has gone over to the Austrians; for he has none.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. FORD ED., vi, 267. (Pa., 1793.)

2300. DUNMORE (Lord), Defeated.—Lord Dunmore has commenced hostilities in Virginia. That people bore with everything, till he attempted to burn the town of Hampton. They opposed and repelled him, with considerable loss on his side, and none on ours. It has raised our countrymen into a perfect phrenzy.—To JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 203. FORD ED., i, 492. (Pa., November 1775.)

2301. DUPLICITY, Disdained.—I disdain everything like duplicity.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 194. FORD ED., vii, 166. (M., 1797.)

2302. DUPONT DE NEMOURS, America and.—I pray you to cherish Dupont. He has the best disposition for the continuance of friendship between the two nations, and perhaps you may be able to make a good use of him.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 434. FORD ED., viii, 147. (W., 1802.)

2303. DUPONT DE NEMOURS, Confidence in.—You will perceive the unlimited confidence I repose in your good faith, and in your cordial dispositions to serve both countries, when you observe that I leave the letters for Chancellor Livingston open for your perusal. The first page respects a cipher, as do the loose sheets folded with the letter. These are interesting to him and myself only, and therefore are not for your perusal. It is the second, third, and fourth pages which I wish you to read, to possess yourself of completely, and then seal the letter with wafers stuck under the flying seal, that it may be seen by nobody else if any accident should happen to you. I wish you to be possessed of the subject, because you may be able to impress on the government of France the inevitable consequences of their taking possession of Louisiana; and though, as I here mention, the cession of New Orleans and the Floridas to us would be a palliation, yet I believe it would be no more, and that this measure will cost France, and perhaps not very long hence, a war which will annihilate her on the ocean, and place that element under the despotism of two nations, which I am not reconciled to the more because my own would be one of them.—To M. DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 435. (W., April 1802.)

2304. DUPONT DE NEMOURS, Louisiana Purchase and.—The confidence which the government of France reposes in you, will undoubtedly give great weight to your information [with respect to Louisiana]. An equal confidence on our part, founded on your knowledge of the subject, your just views of it, your good dispositions towards this country, and my long experience of your personal faith and friendship, assure me that you will render between us all the good offices in your power. The interests of the two countries being absolutely the same as to this matter, your aid may be conscientiously given. It will often, perhaps, be possible for you, having a freedom of communication, omnibus horis, which diplomatic gentlemen will be excluded from by forms, to smooth difficulties by representations and reasonings, which would be received with more suspicion from them. You will thereby render great good to both countries.—To P. S. DUPONT DE NEMOURS. iv, 457. FORD ED., viii, 205. (W., Feb. 1803.)

2305. DUPUIS (C. F.), Works of.—Your undertaking [to read] the twelve volumes of Dupuis, is a degree of heroism to which I could not have aspired even in my younger days. I have been contented with the humble achievement of reading the analysis of his work by Destutt Tracy, in two hundred pages octavo. I believe I should have ventured on his own abridgment of the work, in one octavo volume, had it ever come to my hands; but the marrow of it in Tracy has satisfied my appetite; and even in that, the preliminary discourse of the analyser himself, and his conclusion, are worth more in my eye than the body of the work. For the object of that seems to be to smother all history under the mantle of allegory. If histories so unlike as that of Hercules and Jesus, can, by a fertile imagination and allegorical interpretations, be brought to the same tally, no line of distinction remains between fact and fancy.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 38. (M., 1816.)

2306. DUTIES, Discriminating.—It is true we must expect some inconvenience in practice from the establishment of discriminating duties. But in this, as in so many other cases, we are left to choose between two evils. These inconveniences are nothing when weighed against the loss of wealth and loss of force, which will follow our perseverance in the plan of indiscriminate. When once it shall be perceived that we are either i. the system, or in the habit, of giving equal advantages to those who extinguish our commerce and navigation by duties and prohibitions, as to those who treat both with liberality and justice, liberality and justice will be converted by all into duties and prohibitions. It is not to the moderation and justice of others we are to trust for fair and equal access to market with our productions, or for our due share in the transportation of them; but to our means of independence, and the firm will to use them. Nor do the inconveniences of discrimination merit consideration. * * * Perhaps not a commercial nation on earth is without them.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 650. FORD ED., vi, 483. (Dec. 1793.)

2307. — — — Between nations who favor our productions and navigation and those who do not favor them, one distinction alone will suffice; one set of moderate duties for the first, and a fixed advance on these as to some articles; and prohibitions as to others, for the last.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 650. FORD ED., vi, 483. (Dec. 1793.)

2308. — — — If the commercial regulations had been adopted which our Legislature were at one time proposing, we should at this moment have been standing on such an eminence of safety and respect as ages can never recover. But having wandered from that, our object should now be to get back, with as little loss as possible, and, when peace shall be restored to the world, endeavor so to form our commercial regulations as that justice from other nations shall be their mechanical result.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 177. FORD ED., vii, 129. (Pa., May 1797.)

2309. — — — To those [nations] who refuse the admission [to the West Indies] we must refuse our commerce, or load theirs by odious discriminations in our ports.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 351. FORD ED., iv, 58. (P., 1785.)

2310. DUTIES, Prohibitory.—Should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties and regulations, it behoves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties and regulations, also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 647. FORD ED., vi, 480. (Dec. 1793.)

2311. DUTIES, Reciprocal.—Some nations not yet ripe for free commerce in all its extent, might still be willing to mollify its restrictions and regulations for us, in proportion to the advantages which an intercourse with us might offer. Particularly they may concur with us in reciprocating the duties to be levied on each side, or in compensating any excess of duty by equivalent advantages of another nature.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 646. FORD ED., vi, 479. (Dec. 1793.)

2312. DUTIES, Retaliatory.—Massachusetts has passed an act, the first object of which seemed to be, to retaliate on the British commercial measures, but in the close of it, they impose double duties on all goods imported in bottoms not wholly owned by citizens of our States. New Hampshire has followed the example. This is much complained of here [France], and will probably draw retaliating measures from the States of Europe, if generally adopted in America. or not corrected by the States which have adopted it. It must be our endeavor to keep them quiet on this side the water, under the hope that our countrymen will correct this step; as I trust they will do. It is no ways akin to their general system.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. i, 475. (P., 1785.) See TARIFF.

2318. DUTIES (Governmental), Division of.—In government, as well as in every other business of life, it is by division and subdivision of duties alone, that all matters, great and small, can be managed to perfection. And the whole is cemented by giving to every citizen, personally, a part in the administration of the public affairs.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 13. FORD ED., x, 41. (M., 1816.)

— DUTIES, Natural.—See DUTY and NATURAL RIGHTS.

2314. DUTY, Ability and.—A debt of service is due from every man to his country proportioned to the bounties which nature and fortune have measured to him.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 152. FORD ED., vii, 94. (M., 1796.) See OFFICE.

2315. DUTY, Administrative.—On taking this station [Presidency] on a former occasion. I declared the principles on which I believed it my duty to administer the affairs of our commonwealth. My conscience tells me that I have, on every occasion, acted up to that declaration, according to its obvious import, and to the understanding of every candid mind.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 40. FORD ED., viii, 342. (1805.)

2316. ——. It was my lot to be placed at the head of the column which made the first breach in the ramparts of federalism, and to be charged, on that event, with the duty of changing the course of the government from what we deemed a monarchical to its republican tack. This made me the mark for every shaft which calumny and falsehood could point against me. I bore them with resignation, as one of the duties imposed on me by my post. But * * * it was among the most painful duties from which I hoped to find relief in retirement.—To MARK LANGDON HILL. vii, 154. (M., 1820.)

2317. DUTY, Age and.—I should not shrink from the post of duty, had not the decays of nature withdrawn me from the list of combatants.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 211. FORD ED., x, 188. (M., 1821.)

2318. DUTY vs. COMFORT.—Renounce your domestic comforts for a few months, and reflect that to be a good husband and good father at this moment, you must be also a good citizen.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 189. FORD ED., vii, 151. (Pa., 1797.)

2319. DUTY, Danger and.—I would really go away [from Philadelphia] because I think there is rational danger [from the "allow fever"], but that I had before anticipated that I should not go till the beginning of October, and I do not like to exhibit the appearance of panic. Besides that, I think there might serious ills proceed from there being not a single member of the administration in place.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vi, 419. (Sep. 1793.)

2320. DUTY, Filial.—A lively and lasting sense of filial duty is more effectually impressed on the mind of a son or daughter by reading King Lear, than by all the dry volumes of ethics and divinity that ever were written.—To ROBERT SKIPWITH. FORD ED., i, 398. (1771.)

2321. DUTY, Fulfilled.—I determined to set out for Virginia as soon as I could clear my own letter files. I have now got through it so as to leave not a single letter unanswered, or anything undone, which is in a state to be done.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 428. (1793.)

2322. DUTY, Honest discharge of.—He who has done his duty honestly, and according to his best skill and judgment, stands acquitted before God and man.—THE BATTLE CASE. viii, 602. (1812.)

2323. DUTY, Imperial.—Only aim to do your duty, and mankind will give you credit where you fail.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

2324. DUTY TO MANKIND.—We have, willingly, done injury to no man; and have done for our country the good which has fallen in our way, so far as commensurate with the faculties given us. That we have not done more than we could, cannot be imputed to us as a crime before any tribunal. I look, therefore, to the crisis as one "qui summum nec metuit diem nec optat."—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 154. (1820.)

2325. ——. I have done for my country, and for all mankind, all that I could do. and I now resign my soul, without fear, to my God; my daughter, to my country.—RAYNER'S LIFE OF JEFFERSON. 554. (1826.)

2326. DUTY, Men of eminence and.—Some men are born for the public. Nature by fitting them for the service of the human race on a broad scale, has stamped them with the evidences of her destination and their duty.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 455. FORD ED., viii, 190. (W., 1803.)

2327. DUTY, Merit and.—If it be found that I have done my duty as other faithful citizens have done, it is all the merit I claim.—R. To A GEORGETOWN REPUBLICANS. viii, 159. (1809.)

history of man has ever yet presented to his contemplation, I claim nothing more, for the part I have acted in it, than a common merit of having, with others, faithfully endeavored to do my duty in the several stations allotted to me.—R. To A. VIRGINIA ASSEMBLY. viii, 148. (1809.)

2329. DUTY, Natural.—Every man is under the natural duty of contributing to the necessities of the society; and this is all the laws should enforce on him.—To F. W. GILMER. vii, 3. FORD ED., x, 32. (M., 1816.)

2330. — — — No man having a natural right to be the judge between himself and another, it is his natural duty to submit to the umpirage of an impartial third.—To F. W. GILMER. vii, 3. FORD ED., x, 32. (M., 1816.) See NATURAL RIGHTS.

2331. DUTY, Obstacles and.—The zealous citizen, unable to do his duty so soon as was prescribed, will do it as soon as he can.—LETTER TO MEMBERS OF VA. ASSEMBLY. FORD ED., ii, 434. (R., 1781.)

2332. DUTY, Office and.—Could I have persuaded myself that public offices were made for private convenience, I should undoubtedly have preferred a continuance in the French mission, which placed me nearer to you; but believing, on the contrary, that a good citizen should take his stand where the public authority marshals him, I have acquiesced.—To MADAME LA DUCHESSE D'AUVILLE. iii, 134. FORD ED., v, 153. (N. Y., 1790.)

2333. DUTY, Rank and.—I think with the Romans of old, that the general of to-day should be a common soldier to-morrow, if necessary.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 155. FORD ED., vii, 99. (1797.)

2334. DUTY, Rewards for.—The first of all our consolations is that of having faithfully fulfilled our duties; the next, the approbation and good will of those who have witnessed it.—To JAMES FISBACK. v, 471. (M., 1809.)

2335. DUTY, Right and.—Our part is to pursue with steadiness what is right, turning neither to right nor left for the intrigues or popular delusions of the day, assured that the public approbation will in the end be with us.—To GENERAL BRECKENRIDGE. vii, 238. (M., 1822.)

2336. DUTY, Silent performance of.—The attaching circumstance of my present office [Minister to France] is that I can do its duties unseen by those for whom they are done.—To F. HOPKINSON. ii, 587. FORD ED., v, 78. (P., 1780.)

2337. — — — My great wish is to go on in a strict but silent performance of my duty; to avoid attracting notice, and to keep my name out of newspapers.—To F. HOPKINSON. ii, 587. FORD ED., v, 78. (P., 1780.)

2338. DUTY, Suborned from.—Those whom the Constitution had placed as guards to its portals are sophisticated or suborned from their duties.—To DR. J. B. STUART. vii, 65. (M., 1817.)

2339. EARTH, Belongs to the Living.—The ground * * * I suppose to be self-evident, "that the earth belongs in usufruct to the living"; that the dead have neither powers nor rights over it. The portion occupied by any individual ceases to be his when himself ceases to be, and reverts to the society.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 103. FORD ED., v, 116. (P., 1789.)

2340. — — — The earth belongs always to the living generation. They may manage it, and what proceeds from it, as they please, during their usufruct.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 106. FORD ED., v, 121. (P., 1789.)

2341. — — — The principle that the earth belongs to the living and not to the dead, is of very extensive application and consequences in every country, and most especially in France. It enters into the resolution of the questions, whether the nation may change the descent of lands holden in tail? Whether they may change the appropriation of lands given anciently to the Church, to hospitals, colleges, orders of chivalry, and otherwise in perpetuity? whether they may abolish the charges and privileges attached on lands, including the whole catalogue, ecclesiastical and feudal; it goes to hereditary offices, authorities and jurisdictions; to hereditary orders, distinctions and appellations; to perpetual monopolies in commerce, the arts or sciences; with a long train of et ceteras; and it renders the question of reimbursement a question of generosity and not of right. In all these cases the legislature of the day could authorize such appropriations and establishments for their own time, but no longer; and the present holders, even where they or their ancestors have purchased, are in the case of bona fide purchasers of what the seller had no right to convey.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 107. FORD ED., v, 122. (P., 1789.)

2342. — — — The earth belongs to the living, not to the dead. The will and the power of man expire with his life, by nature's law. Some societies give it an artificial continuance, for the encouragement of industry; some refuse it, as our aboriginal neighbors, whom we call barbarians. The generations of men may be considered as bodies or corporations. Each generation has the usufruct of the earth during the period of its continuance. When it ceases to exist the usufruct passes on to the succeeding generation, free and unencumbered, and so on, successively, from one generation to another forever.—To JOHN WAYLES EPPES. vi, 136. FORD ED., ix, 389. (M., June 1813.)

2343. — — — This corporeal globe, and everything upon it, belong to its present cor-

poreal inhabitants, during their generation.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 16. FORD ED., x. 44. (M., 1816.)

2344. ——. Our Creator made the earth for the use of the living and not of the dead. Those who exist not have no use, or right in it, no authority or power over it.—To THOMAS EARLE. vii, 310. (M., 1823.)

2345. EARTH, Equal Rights in.—The earth is given as a common stock for man to labor and live on.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 36. (Pa., 1785.)

2346. ——. If, for the encouragement of industry, we allow the earth to be appropriated, we must take care that other employment be provided to those excluded from the appropriation. If we do not, the fundamental right to labor the earth returns to the employed.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 36. (P., 1785.)

2347. EARTH, God's Gift.—The soil is the gift of God to the living.—To JOHN W. EFFES. vi, 138. FORD ED., ix, 391. M., 1813.) See GENERATIONS.

2348. EARTH, Internal Heat of.—The term "central heat" does of itself give us a false idea of Buffon's hypothesis. If it means a heat lodged in the centre of the earth, and diffusing its warmth from thence to the extremities, then certainly it would be less in proportion to the distance from that centre, and, of course, less under the equator than the poles, on high mountains than in deep valleys. But Buffon's theory is that this earth was once in a state of hot fusion, and that it has been, and still continues to be cooling. What is the course of this process? A heated body being surrounded by a colder one, whether solid or fluid, the heat, which is itself a fluid, flows into the colder body equally from every point of the hotter. Hence if a heated spheroid of iron cools to a given degree, in a given space of time, an inch deep from its surface in one point, it has in the same time done the same in any and every other point. In a given time more, it will be cooled all around to double that depth. So that it will always be equally cooled at equal depths from the surface. This would be the case with Buffon's earth, if it were a smooth figure without unevennesses. But it has mountains and valleys. The tops of mountains will cool to greater depths in the same time than the sides of mountains, and than plains in proportion as the line A. B. is longer than A. C. or D. E. or F. G. In the valley line H. I., on depth of the same temperature, will be the same as on a plain. This, however, is very different from Buffon's opinion. He says that the earth, being thinnest at the poles, will cool sooner there than under the equator, where it is thicker. If my idea of the process of cooling be right, his is wrong, and his whole theory in the Epochs of Nature, is overset.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iii, 369. (A., 1784.)

2349. EARTH, Theory of Creation.—I give one answer to all theorists. That is as follows: They all suppose the earth a created existence. They must suppose a Creator then; and that He possessed power and wisdom to a great degree. As He intended the earth for the habitation of animals and vegetables, is it reasonable to suppose He made two jobs of His creation, that He first made a chaotic lump and set it into motion, and then, waiting the ages necessary to form itself—that when it had done this, He stepped in a second time, to create the animals and plants which were to inhabit it? As a hand of a Creator is to be called in, it may as well be called in at one stage of the process as another. We may as well suppose He created the earth at once, nearly in the state in which we see it, fit for the preservation of the beings He placed on it. But, it is said, we have a proof that He did not create it in its present solid form, but in a state of fluidity; because its present shape of an oblate spheroid is precisely that which a fluid mass, revolving on its axis, would assume; but I suppose the same equilibrium between gravity and centrifugal force, which would determine a fluid mass into the form of an oblate spheroid, would determine the wise Creator of that mass, if he made it in a solid state, to give it the same spheroidal form. A revolving fluid will continue to change its shape, till it attains that in which its principles of contrary motion are balanced; for if you suppose them not balanced, it will change its form. Now, the balanced form is necessary for the preservation of a revolving solid. The Creator, therefore, of a revolving solid, would make it an oblate spheroid, that figure alone admitting a perfect equilibrium. He would make it in that form for another reason; that is, to prevent a shifting of the axis of rotation. Had He created the earth perfectly spherical, its axis might have been perpetually shifting, by the influence of the other bodies of the system, and by placing the inhabitants of the earth successively under its poles, it might have been depopulated; whereas, being spheroidal, it has but one axis on which it can revolve in equilibrio. Suppose the axis of the earth to shift forty-five degrees; then cut it into one hundred and eighty slices, making every section in the plane of a circle of latitude perpendicular to the axis: every one of these slices, except the equatorial one, would be unbalanced, as there would be more matter on one side of its axis than on the other. There could be but one diameter drawn through such a slice which would divide it into two equal parts; on every other possible diameter, the parts would hang unequal. This would produce an irregularity in the diurnal motion. We may, therefore, conclude it impossible for the poles of the earth to shift, if it was made spheroidically, and that it would be made spheroidically, though solid, to obtain this end. I use this reasoning only on the supposition that the earth has had a beginning. I am sure I shall read your conjectures on this subject with great pleasure, though I bespeak, beforehand, a right to indulge my natural incredulity and scepticism.—To CHARLES THOMSON, ii, 68. FORD ED., iv, 338. (P., 1786.)

2350. EAST INDIES, Trade to.—Philadelphia and New York have begun trade to the East Indies. Perhaps Boston may follow their example. But their importations will be sold only to the country adjacent to them. For a long time to come, the States south of the Delaware will not engage in a direct commerce with the East Indies. They neither have, nor will have ships or seamen for their other commerce; nor will they buy East India goods of the northern States. Experience shows that the States never bought foreign goods of one another. The reasons are that they would, in so doing, pay double freight and charges; and again that they would have to pay mostly in cash what they could obtain for commodities in Europe. I know that the American merchants have looked with some anxiety to the arrangements to be taken with Portugal, in expectation that they could, through her, get their East India articles on better and more convenient terms; and I am of opinion, Portugal will come in for a good share of this traffic with the southern States, if they facilitate our payments.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 493. (P., 1785.)

2351. EAST AND WEST LINE, Meaning of.—On the question what is an east and west line? which, you say, has been a subject of discussion in the papers, I presume * * * that the parties have differed only in applying the same appellation to different things. The one defines an east and west line to be on a great circle of the earth, passing through the point of departure, its nadir point, and the centre of the earth, its plane rectangular, to that of the meridian of departure. The other considers an east and west line to be a line on the surface of the earth, bounding a plane at right angles with its axis, or a circle of latitude passing through the point of departure, or in other words, a line which, from the point of departure, passes every meridian at a right angle. Each party, therefore, defining the line he means, may be permitted to call it an east and west one, or at least it becomes no longer a mathematical but a philological question of the meaning of the words east and west. The last is what was meant probably by the east and west line in the treaty of Ghent. The same has been the understanding in running the numerous east and west lines which divide our different States. They have been run by observations of latitude at very short intervals, uniting the points of observation by short direct lines, and thus constituting in fact part of a polygon of very short sides.—To CHILES TERRIL. vii, 260. (M., 1822.)

2352. ECONOMY, Domestic.—Domestic economy * * * [is] of more solid value than anything else.—To MRS. EPPES. D. L. J. 127. (P., 1787.)

2353. — — —. In household economy, the mothers of our country are generally skilled, and generally careful to instruct their daughters. We all know its value, and that diligence and dexterity in all its processes are inestimable treasures. The order and economy of a house are as honorable to the mistress as those of the farm to the master, and if either be neglected, ruin follows, and children destitute of the means of living.—To N. BURWELL. vii, 103. FORD ED., x, 106. (M., 1818.)

2354. ECONOMY, An Essential Principle.—Economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened, I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently [one] which ought to shape its administration.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 4. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.)

2355. — — —. To expend the public money with the same care and economy [that] we would practice with our own, * * * [is one of] the land marks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 21. FORD ED., viii, 187. (Dec. 1802.)

2356. — — —. The same prudence, which, in private life, would forbid our paying our money for unexplained projects, forbids it in the disposition of the public moneys.—To SHELTON GILLIAM. v, 301. (W., 1808.)

2357. ECONOMY, Evil of want of.—We see in England the consequences of the want of economy; their laborers reduced to live on a penny in the shilling of their earnings, to give up bread, and resort to oatmeal and potatoes for food; and their landholders exiling themselves to live in penury and obscurity abroad, because at home the government must have all the clear profits of their land. In fact, they see the fee simple of the island transferred to the public creditors, all its profits going to them for the interest of their debts. Our laborers and landholders must come to this also, unless they severely adhere to the economy you recommend.—To GOVERNOR PLUMER. vii, 19. (M., 1816.)

2358. ECONOMY, Happiness and.—If we can prevent the government from wasting the labors of the people, under the pretence of taking care of them, they must become happy.—To THOMAS COOPER. iv, 453. FORD ED., viii, 178. (W., 1802.)

2359. ECONOMY, Honesty and.—A rigid economy of the public contributions, and absolute interdiction of all useless expenses, will go far towards keeping the government honest and unoppressive.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 325. FORD ED., x, 280. (M., 1823.)

2361. ECONOMY, Insisting on.—We shall push Congress to the uttermost in economizing.—To NATHANIEL MACON. iv, 397. (W., May 1801.)

2362. ECONOMY, Liberty and.—We must make our election between economy and liberty, or profusion and servitude.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 14. FORD ED., x, 41. (M., 1816.)

2363. ECONOMY, Necessity for.—[We are] conscious that our endeavors to reconcile economy and the public wants must meet with the approbation of every person, who attends at all to the dangers impending over us from circumscribed finances.—To THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 337. (R., 1780.)

2364. ECONOMY vs. NEW LOANS.—I learn with great satisfaction that wholesome economies have been found, sufficient to relieve us from the ruinous necessity of adding annually to our debt by new loans. The deviser of so salutary a relief deserves truly well of his country.—To SAMUEL SMITH. vii, 284. FORD ED., x, 251. (M., 1823.) See LOANS.

2365. ECONOMY, Political.—In so complicated a science as political economy, no one axiom can be laid down as wise and expedient for all times and circumstances, and for their contraries.—To BENJAMIN AUSTIN. vi, 523. FORD ED., x, 10. (M., Jan. 1816.)

2366. — — — Political economy in modern times assumed the form of a regular science first in the hands of the political sect in France, called the Economists. They made it a branch only of a comprehensive system on the natural order of societies. Quesnay first, Gournay, Le Frosne, Turgot, and Dupont de Nemours, the enlightened, philanthropic, and venerable citizen, now of the United States, led the way in these developments, and gave to our inquiries the direction they have since observed. Many sound and valuable principles established by them have received the sanction of general approbation. Some, as in the infancy of a science might be expected, have been brought into question, and have furnished occasion for much discussion. Their opinions on production, and on the proper subjects of taxation, have been particularly controverted; and whatever may be the merit of their principles of taxation, it is not wonderful they have not prevailed; not on the questioned score of correctness, but because not acceptable to the people, whose will must be the supreme law. Taxation is, in fact, the most difficult function of government, and that against which their citizens are most apt to be refractory. The general aim is, therefore, to adopt the mode most consonant with the circumstances and sentiments of the country. Adam Smith, first in England, published a rational and systematic work on Political Economy, adopting generally the ground of the Economists, but differing on the subjects before specified. The system being novel, much argument and detail seemed then necessary to establish principles which now are assented to as soon as proposed. Hence his book, admitted to be able, and of the first degree of merit, has yet been considered as prolix and tedious. In France, John Baptisté Say has the merit of producing a very superior work on the subject of Political Economy. His arrangement is luminous, ideas clear, style perspicuous, and the whole subject brought within half the volume of Smith's work. Add to this considerable advances in correctness and extension of principles. The work of Senator [Destutt] Tracy, now announced, comes forward with all the lights of his predecessors in the science, and with the advantages of further experience, more discussion, and greater maturity of subjects. It is certainly distinguished by important traits: a cogency of logic which has never been exceeded in any work, a rigorous enchainment of ideas, and constant recurrence to it to keep it in the reader's view, a fearless pursuit of truth whithersoever it leads, and a diction so correct that not a word can be changed but for the worse * * * —INTRODUCTION TO DESTUTT TRACY'S POLITICAL ECONOMY. vi, 570. (1816.) See TRACY.

2367. ECONOMY, Prodigality vs.—To reform the prodigalities of our predecessors is * * * peculiarly our duty, and to bring the government to a simple and economical course.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 455. FORD ED., viii, 191. (W., 1803.)

2368. ECONOMY, A Republican virtue.—I place economy among the first and most important of republican virtues.—To GOVERNOR PLUMER. vii, 19. (M. 1816.)

2369. — — — I am for a government rigorously frugal and simple, applying all the possible savings of the public revenue to the discharge of the national debt.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.)

2370. ECONOMY, Rigorous.—The new government has now, for some time, been under way. * * * Abuses under the old forms have led us to lay the basis of the new in a rigorous economy of the public contributions.—To M. DE PINTO. iii, 174. (N. Y., 1790.)

2371. — — — We are endeavoring to reduce he government to the practice of a rigorous economy, to avoid burthening the people, and arming the magistrate with a patronage of money, which might be used to corrupt and undermine the principles of our government.—To M. PICTET. iv, 463. (W., 1803.)

2372. — — — I may err in my measures, but never shall deflect from the intention to fortify the public liberty by every possible means, and to put it out of the power of the few to riot on the labors of the many.—To JUDGE TYLER. iv, 548. (W., 1804.)

2373. ECONOMY vs. TAXATION.—When, merely by avoiding false objects of expense, we are able, without a direct tax, without internal taxes, and without borrowing to make large and effectual payments toward the discharge of our public debt and the emancipation of our posterity from that moral cancer, it is an encouragement of the highest order, to proceed as we have begun, in substituting economy for taxation, and in pursuing what is useful for a nation placed as we are, rather than what is practiced by others under different circumstances.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE, viii, 19. FORD ED., viii, 185. (Dec. 1802.)

2374. ECONOMY, Wisdom of.—Our public economy is such as to offer drudgery and subsistence only to those entrusted with its administration,—a wise and necessary precaution against the degeneracy of the public servants.—To M. DE MEUNIER. FORD ED., vii, 14. (M., 1795.)

2375. EDEN (William), Hatred of the United States.—Mr. Eden is appointed ambassador from England to Madrid. To the hatred borne us by his court and country is added a recollection of the circumstances of the unsuccessful embassy to America, of which he made a part. I think he will carry to Madrid dispositions to do us all the ill he can.—To JOHN JAY, ii, 158. (P., 1787.)

2376. — — — We had often * * * occasions of knowing each other. His peculiar bitterness towards us had sufficiently appeared, and I had never concealed from him that I considered the British as our natural enemies, and as the only nation on earth who wished us ill from the bottom of their souls. And I am satisfied that were our continent to be swallowed up by the ocean, Great Britain would be in a bonfire from one end to the other.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL, ii, 323. FORD ED., iv, 469. (P., 1787.)

2377. — — — Mr. Eden sets out in a few days for Madrid. You will have to oppose in him the most bitter enemy against our country that exists. His late and sudden elevation makes the remembrance of the contempt we showed to his mission in America rankle the more in his breast.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. FORD ED., iv, 453. (P., 1787.)

2378. EDITORS, Contention and.—The printers can never leave us in a state of perfect rest and union of opinion. They would be no longer useful and would have to go to the plow.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY, iv, 392. FORD ED., viii, 43. (W., March 1801.)

2379. — — — A coalition of sentiments is not for the interest of the printers. They, * * *, live by the zeal they can kindle, and the schisms they can create. It is contest of opinion in politics * * * which makes us take great interest in them, and bestow our money liberally on those who furnish aliment to our appetite.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY, iv, 391. FORD ED., viii, 42. (W., March 1801.)

2380. EDITORS, Ferocity of.—Our printers raven on the agonies of their victims, as wolves do on the blood of the lamb.—To JAMES MONROE, v, 598. FORD ED., ix, 324. (M., 1811.)

2381. EDITORS, Government, People and.—The printers and the public are very different personages. The former may lead the latter a little out of their track, while the deviation is insensible; but the moment they usurp their direction and that of their government, they will be reduced to their true places.—To JAMES MONROE, v, 598. FORD ED., ix, 324. (M., May 1811.)

2382. EDITORS, Independence of.—I think an editor should be independent, that is, of personal influence, and not be moved from his opinions on the mere authority of any individual. But with respect to the general opinion of the political section with which he habitually accords, his duty seems very like that of a member of Congress.—To WILLIAM DUANE, v, 591. FORD ED., ix, 315. (M., 1811.)

2383. EDITORS, Jefferson's Relations with.—In your letter it is said that, for certain services performed by Mr. James Lyon and Mr. Samuel Morse, formerly editors of the Savannah Republican, I promised them the sum of one thousand dollars. This is totally unfounded. I never promised to any printer on earth the sum of one thousand dollars, nor any other sum, for certain services performed, or for any services which that expression would imply. I have had no accounts with printers but for their newspapers, for which I have paid always the ordinary price and no more. I have occasionally joined in moderate contributions to printers, as I have done to other descriptions of persons, distressed or persecuted, not by promise, but the actual payment of what I contributed.—To JAMES L. EDWARDS, vi, 8. (M., 1811.)

2384. — — — I take the liberty of requesting a letter from you bearing testimony to the truth of my never having made to you, or within your knowledge or information, any such promise to yourself, your partner Morse, or any other. My confidence in your character leaves me without a doubt of your honest aid in repelling this base and bold attempt to fix on me practices to which no honors or powers in this world would ever have induced me to stoop. I have solicited none, intrigued for none. Those which my country has thought proper to confide to me have been of their own mere motion, unasked by me. Such practices as this letter-writer imputes to me, would have proved me unworthy of their confidence.—To JAMES LYON, vi, 10. (M., 1811.) See NEWSPAPERS.

2385. EDUCATION, Abuses of power and.—Education is the true corrective of abuses of constitutional power.—To WILLIAM C. JARVIS, vii, 179. FORD ED., x, 161. (M., 1820.)

2387. EDUCATION, Course of.—I have never thought a boy should undertake abstruse or difficult sciences, such as mathematics in general, till fifteen years of age at soonest. 2388. EDUCATION, Devotion to.—A system of general instruction, which shall reach every description of our citizens from the richest to the poorest, as it was the earliest, so will it be the latest of all the public concerns in which I shall permit myself to take an interest. Nor am I tenacious of the form in which it shall be introduced. Be that what it may, our descendants will be as wise as we are, and will know how to amend and amend it, until it shall suit their circumstances. Give it to us then in any shape, and receive for the inestimable boon the thanks of the young and the blessings of the old, who are past all other services but prayers for the prosperity of their country, and blessings for those who promote it.—To JOSEPH C. 2390. EDUCATION, Female.—A plan of female education has never been a subject of systematic contemplation with me. It has occupied my attention so far only as the education of my own daughters occasionally required. Considering that they would be placed in a country situation, where little aid could be obtained from abroad, I thought it essential to give them a solid education, which might enable them, when become mothers, to educate their own daughters, and even to direct the course for sons, should their fathers be lost, or incapable, or inattentive. * * * A great obstacle to good education is the ordinate passion prevalent for novels, and the time lost in that reading which should be instructively employed. When this poison infects the mind it destroys its tone and revolts it against wholesome reading. Reason and fact, plain and unadorned, are rejected. Nothing can engage attention unless dressed in all the figments of fancy, and nothing so bedecked comes amiss. The result is a bloated imagination, sickly judgment, and disgust towards all the real businesses of life. This mass of trash, however, is not without some distinction; some few modelling their narratives, although fictitious, on the incidents of real life, have been able to make them interesting and useful vehicles of a sound morality. Such, I think, are Marmonet's new Moral Tales, but not his old ones, which are really immoral. Such are the writings of Miss Edgeworth, and some of those of Madame Genlis. For a like reason, too, much poetry should not be indulged. Some is useful for forming style and taste. Pope, Dryden, Thomson, Shakespeare, and of the French Molière, Racine, the Corneilles, may be read with pleasure and improvement. The French language, become that of the general intercourse of nations, and from their extraordinary advances, now the depository of all science, is an indispensable part of education for both sexes. * * * The ornaments, too, and the amusements of life, are entitled to their portion of attention. These, for a female, are dancing, drawing, and music. The first is a healthy exercise, elegant and very attractive for young people. Every affectionate parent would be pleased to see his daughter qualified to participate with her companions, and without awkwardness at least, in the circles of festivity, of which she occasionally becomes a part. It is a necessary accomplishment, therefore, although of short use; for the French rule is wise, that no lady dances after marriage. This is founded in solid physical reasons, gestation and nursing leaving little time to a married lady when this exercise can be either safe or innocent. Drawing is thought less of in this country than in Europe. It is an innocent and engaging amusement, often useful, and a qualification not to be neglected in one who is to become a mother and an instructor. Music is invaluable where a person has an ear. Where they have not, it should not be attempted. It furnishes a delightful recreation for the hours of respite from the cares of the day, and lasts us through life. The taste of this country, too, calls for this accomplishment more strongly than for either of the others. I need say nothing of household economy, in which the mothers of our country are generally skilled, and generally careful to instruct their daughters. We all know its value, and that diligence and dexterity in all its processes are inestimable treasures. The order and economy of a house are as honorable to the mistress as those of the farm to the master, and if either be neglected, ruin follows, and children destitute of the means of living.—To N. 2395. EDUCATION, Higher.—I do most anxiously wish to see the highest degrees of education given to the higher degrees of genius, and to all degrees of it, so much as may enable them to read and understand what is going on in the world, and to keep their part of it going on right; for nothing can keep it right but their own vigilant and distrustful superintendence.—To MANN PAGE. iv, 119. FORD ED., vii, 24. (M., 1795.)

2396. ——. The greatest good [of the people] requires, that while they are instructed in general, competently to the common business of life, others should employ their genius with necessary information to the useful arts, to inventions for saving labor and increasing our comforts, to nourishing our health, to civil government, military science, &c.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vii, 187. FORD ED., x, 166. (P.F., 1820.)

2397. ——. When sobered by experience, I hope our successors will turn their attention to the advantages of education. I mean of education on the broad scale, and not that of the petty academies, as they call themselves, which are started up in every neighborhood, and where one or two men, possessing Latin and sometimes Greek, a knowledge of the globes, and the first six books of Euclid, imagine and communicate this as the sum of science. They commit their pupils to the theatre of the world, with just taste enough of learning to be alienated from industrious pursuits, and not enough to do service in the ranks of science. * * * I hope the necessity will at length be seen of establishing institutions here, as in Europe, where every branch of science useful at this day, may be taught in its highest degree.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 356. FORD ED., ix, 464. (M., July 1814.)

2398. EDUCATION, Jefferson's Bills on.—The bill [on Education in the Revised Code of Virginia] proposes to lay off every county into small districts of five or six miles square, called hundreds, and in each of them to establish a school for teaching reading, writing, and arithmetic. The tutor to be supported by the hundred, and every person in it entitled to send their children three years gratis, and as much longer as they please, paying for it. These schools to be under a visitor who is annually to choose the boy of best genius in the school, of those whose parents are too poor to give them further education, and to send him forward to one of the grammar schools, of which twenty are proposed to be erected in different parts of the country, for teaching Greek, Latin, geography, and the higher branches of numerical arithmetic. Of the boys thus sent in any one year, trial is to be made at the grammar schools one or two years, and the best genius of the whole selected, and continued six years, and the residue dismissed. By this means twenty of the best geniuses will be raked from the rubbish annually, and be instructed at the public expense, so far as the grammar schools go. At the end of six years instruction, one-half are to be discontinued (from among whom the grammar schools will probably be supplied with future masters); and the other half, who are to be chosen for the superiority of their parts and disposition, are to be sent and continued three years in the study of such sciences as they shall choose, at William and Mary College. * * * The ultimate result of the whole scheme of education would be the teaching all the children of the State reading, writing, and common arithmetic; turning out ten annually of superior genius, well taught in Greek, Latin, geography, and the higher branches of arithmetic; turning out ten others annually, of still superior parts, who, to those branches of learning, shall have added such branches of the sciences as their genius shall have led them to; the further furnishing to the wealthier part of the people convenient schools at which their children may be educated at their own expense.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 388. FORD ED., iii, 251. (1782.)

2399. ——. I have sketched and put into the hands of a member a bill, delineating a practicable plan, entirely within the means they [the Virginia Legislature] already have on hand, destined to this object. My bill proposes: 1. Elementary schools in every county, which shall place every householder within three miles of a school. 2. District colleges, which shall place every father within a day's ride of a college where he may dispose of his son. 3. An university in a healthy and central situation, with the offer of the lands, buildings, and funds of the Central College, if they will accept that place for their establishment. In the first will be taught reading, writing, common arithmetic, and general notions of geography. In the second, ancient and modern languages, geography fully, a higher degree of numerical arithmetic, mensuration, and the elementary principles of navigation. In the third, all the useful sciences in their highest degree. To all of which is added a selection from the elementary schools of subjects of the most promising genius, whose parents are too poor to give them further education, to be carried at the public expense through the colleges and university. The object is to bring into action that mass of talents which lies buried in poverty in every country, for want of the means of development, and thus give activity to a mass of mind, which, in proportion to our population, shall be the double or treble of what it is in most countries. The expense of the elementary schools for every county, is proposed to be levied on the wealth of the county, and all children rich and poor, to be educated at these three years gratis. * * * This is, in fact and substance, the plan I proposed in a bill forty years ago, but accommodated to the circumstances of this, instead of that day.—To M. CORREA. vii. 94. (P. F., 1817.)

2400. EDUCATION, Jefferson's Explanation of.—The general objects of this law are to provide an education adapted to the years, to the capacity, and the condition of every one, and directed to their freedom and happiness. Specific details were not proper for the law. These must be the business of the visitors entrusted with its execution. The first stage of this education being the schools of the hundreds, wherein the great mass of the people will receive their instruction, the principal foundations of future order will be laid here. Instead, therefore, of putting the Bible and the Testament into the hands of the children at an age when their judgments are not sufficiently matured for religious inquiries, their memories may here be stored with the most useful facts from Grecian, Roman, European and American history. The first elements of morality, too, may be instilled into their minds: such as, when further developed as their judgments advance in strength, may teach them how to work out their own greatest happiness, by showing them that it does not depend on the condition of life in which chance has placed them, but is always the result of a good conscience, good health, occupation, and freedom in all just pursuits. Those whom either the wealth of their parents or the adoption of the State shall destine to higher degrees of learning, will go on to the grammar schools, which constitute the next stage, there to be instructed in the languages. The learning Greek and Latin, I am told, is going into disuse in Europe. I know not what their manners and occupations may call for; but it would be very ill-judged in us to follow their example in this instance. There is a certain period of life, say from eight to fifteen or sixteen years of age, when the mind, like the body is not yet firm enough for laborious and close operations. If applied to such, it falls an early victim to premature exertion; exhibiting, indeed, at first, in these young and tender subjects, the flattering appearance of their being men while they are yet children, but ending in reducing them to be children when they should be men. The memory is then most susceptible and tenacious of impressions; and the learning of languages being chiefly a work of memory, it seems precisely fitted to the powers of this period, which is long enough, too, for acquiring the most useful languages, ancient and modern. I do not pretend that language is science. (It is only an instrument for the attainment of science. But that time is not lost which is employed in providing tools for future operation; more especially, as in this case, the books put into the hands of the youth for this purpose may be such as will, at the same time, impress their minds with useful facts and good principles. If this period be suffered to pass in idleness, the mind becomes lethargic and impotent, as would the body it inhabits, if unexercised during the same time. The sympathy between body and mind during their rise, progress, and decline, is too strict and obvious to endanger our being misled, while we reason from the one to the other.

As soon as they are of sufficient age, it is supposed they will be sent from the grammar schools to the university, which constitutes our third and last stage, there to study those sciences which may be adapted to their views. By that part of our plan which prescribes the selection of the youths of genius from among the classes of the poor, we hope to avail the State of those talents which nature has sown as liberally among the poor as the rich, but which perish without use, if not sought for and cultivated. But of all the views of this law none is more important, none more legitimate, than that of rendering the people, the safe, as they are the ultimate, guardians of their own liberty. For this purpose the reading in the first stage, where they will receive their whole education, is proposed, as has been said, to be chiefly historical. History, by apprising them of the past, will enable them to judge of the future; it will avail them of the experience of other times and other nations; it will qualify them as judges of the actions and designs of men; it will enable them to know ambition under every disguise it may assume; and knowing it, to defeat its views. In every government on earth is some trace of human weakness, some germ of corruption and degeneracy, which cunning will discover, and wickedness insensibly open, cultivate and improve. Every government degenerates when trusted to the rulers of the people alone. The people themselves, therefore, are its only safe depositories. And to render even them safe, their minds must be improved to a certain degree. This indeed is not all that is necessary, though it be essentially necessary. An amendment of our Constitution must have come in aid of the public education. The influence over government must be shared among all the people. If every individual which composes their mass participates of the ultimate authority, the government will be safe; because the corrupting the whole mass will exceed any private resources of wealth; and public ones cannot be provided but by levies on the people. In this case every man would have to pay his own price. The government of Great Britain has been corrupted, because but one man in ten has a right to vote for members of parliament. The sellers of the government, therefore, get nine-tenths of their price clear. It has been thought that corruption is restrained by confining the right of suffrage to a few of the wealthier of the people; but it would be more effectually restrained, by an extension of that right, to such members as would bid defiance to the means of corruption.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 388. I am not a friend to placing young men in populous cities, because they acquire there habits and partialities which do not contribute to the happiness of their after life.—To DOCTOR WISTAR. v, 104. FORD ED., ix, 70. (W., 1807.)

will be wisely formed, and honestly administered, in proportion as those who form and administer them are wise and honest: whence it becomes expedient for promoting the public happiness that those persons, whom nature has endowed with genius and virtue, should be rendered by liberal education worthy to receive, and able to guard the sacred deposit of the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens; and that they should be called to that charge without regard to wealth, birth or other accidental condition or circumstance; but the indigence of the greater number disabling them from so educating, at their own expense, those of their children whom nature has fitly formed and disposed to become useful instruments for the public, it is better that such should be sought for and educated at the common expense of all, than that the happiness of all should be confined to the weak or wicked.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. of their own country, to rescue it from the degradation of becoming the Barbary of the Union, and of falling into the ranks of our own negroes. To that condition it is fast sinking. We shall be in the hands of the other States, what our indigenous predecessors were when invaded by the science and arts of Europe. The mass of education in Virginia, before the Revolution, placed her with the foremost of her Sister Colonies. What is her education now? Where is it? The little we have we import, like beggars, from other States; or import their beggars to bestow on us their miserable crumbs. And what is wanting to restore us to our station among our confederates? Not more money from the people. Enough has been raised by them, and appropriated to this very object. It is that it should be employed understandingly, and for their greatest good.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vii, 186. FORD ED., x, 165. (P.F., 1820.)

2408. — Six thousand common schools in New York, fifty pupils in each, three hundred thousand in all; one hundred and sixty thousand dollars annually paid to the masters; forty established academies, with two thousand two hundred and eighteen pupils; and five colleges with seven hundred and eighteen students; to which last classes of institutions seven hundred and twenty thousand dollars have been given; and the whole appropriations for education estimated at two and a half millions of dollars! What a pigmy to this is Virginia become, with a population almost equal to that of New York! And whence this difference? From the difference their rulers set on the value of knowledge, and the prosperity it produces. But still, if a pigmy, let her do what a pigmy may do.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vii, 188. FORD ED., x, 167. dawn of day.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. vi. 592. FORD ED., x, 25. (P. F., 1816.)

2413. — — — Nobody can doubt my zeal for the general instruction of the people. Who first started that idea? I may surely say, myself. Turn to the bill in the Revised Code, which I drew more than forty years ago, and before which the idea of a plan for the education of the people, generally, had never been suggested in this State. There you will see developed the first rudiments of the whole system of general education we are now urging and acting on: and it is well known to those with whom I have acted on this subject, that I never have proposed a sacrifice of the primary to the ultimate grade of instruction. Let us keep our eye steadily on the whole system.—To GENERAL BRECKENRIDGE. vii, 205. (M., 1821.) See PEOPLE.

2414. EDUCATION, Perversion of power and.—The most effectual means of preventing the perversion of power into tyranny are to illuminate, as far as practicable, the minds of the people.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. (1799.)

2415. EDUCATION, Power and.—All the States but our own are sensible that knowledge is power. The Missouri question is for power. The efforts now generally making in all the States to advance their science is for power, while we are sinking into the barbarism of our Indian aborigines, and expect like them to oppose by ignorance the overwhelming mass of light and science by which we shall be surrounded. It is a comfort that I am not to live to see this.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. FORD ED., x, 155. (M., 1820.)

2416. EDUCATION, Progress through.—I look to the diffusion of light and education as the resource most to be relied on for ameliorating the condition, promoting the virtue, and advancing the happiness of man.—To C. C. BLATCHLY. vii, 263. (M., 1822.) See 2386.

2417. EDUCATION, The Republic and.—I have two great measures at heart, without which no republic can maintain itself in strength. 1. That of general education, to enable every man to judge for himself what will secure or endanger his freedom. 2. To divide every county into hundreds, of such size that all the children of each will be within reach of a central school in it.—To JOHN TYLER. v, 525. FORD ED., ix, 277. (M., 1810.)

2418. EDUCATION, Safety in.—The information of the people at large can alone make them the safe, as they are the sole depository of our political and religious freedom.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 541. (M., 1810.)

2419. EDUCATION, Self-sufficiency and.—Our post-revolutionary youth are born under happier stars than you and I were. They acquire all learning in their mother's womb, and bring it into the world ready made. The information of books is no longer necessary; and all knowledge which is not innate, is in contempt, or neglect at least. Every folly must run its round; and so, I suppose, must that of self-learning and self-sufficiency; of rejecting the knowledge acquired in past ages, and starting on the new ground of intuition.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 355. FORD ED., ix, 464. (M., 1814.)

2420. EDUCATION, Suffrage and.—There is one provision [in the new constitution of Spain] which will immortalize its inventors. It is that which, after a certain epoch, disfranchises every citizen who cannot read and write. This is new, and is the fruitful germ of the improvement of everything good, and the correction of everything imperfect in the present constitution. This will give you an enlightened people, and an energetic public opinion which will control and enchain the aristocratic spirit of the government.—To CHEVALIER DE OUIS. vi, 342. (M., 1814.)

2421. EDUCATION, Suitable.—Promote in every order of men the degree of instruction proportioned to their condition, and to their views in life.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vii, 189. FORD ED., x, 167. (P. F., 1820.)

2422. EDUCATION, System and.—The truth is that the want of common education with us is not from our poverty, but from the want of an orderly system. More money is now paid for the education of a part than would be paid for that of the whole, if systematically arranged.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vii, 188. FORD ED., x, 167. (P. F., 1820.)

2423. EDUCATION, Taxes for.—The tax which will be paid for the purpose of education is not more than the thousandth part of what will be paid to kings, priests and nobles who will rise up among us if we leave the people in ignorance.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 7. FORD ED., iv, 269. (P., 1786.)

2424. — — — If the Legislature would add to the literary fund a perpetual tax of a cent a head on the population of the State, it would set agoing at once, and forever maintain, a system of primary or ward schools, and an university where might be taught, in its highest degree, every branch of science useful in our time and country; and it would rescue us from the tax of toriyism, fanaticism, and indifference to their own State, which we now send our youth to bring from those of New England.—To CHARLES YANCEY. vi, 517. 2426. EDUCATION, The Wealthy and.—What will be the retribution of the wealthy individual [for his support of general education]? 1. The peopling of his neighborhood with honest, useful and enlightened citizens, understanding their own rights and firm in their perpetuation. 2. When his own descendants become poor, which they generally do within three generations (no law of primogeniture now perpetuating wealth in the same families), their children will be educated by the then rich, and the little advance he now makes to poverty, while rich himself, will be repaid by the then rich, to his descendants when become poor, and thus give them a chance of rising again. This is a solid consideration, and should go home to the bosom of every parent. This will be seed sowed in fertile ground. It is a provision for his family looking to distant times, and far in duration beyond what he has now in hand for them. Let every man count backward in his own family, and see how many generations he can go, before he comes to the ancestor who made the fortune he now holds. Most will be stopped at the first generation, many at the second, few will reach the third, and not one in the State [of Virginia] go beyond the fifth.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. FORD ED., x, 100. ELECTION, Short Periods of.—A government by representatives, elected by the people at short periods, was our object; and our maxim at that day was, “where annual election ends, tyranny begins”; nor have our departures from it been sanctioned by the happiness of their effects.—To SAMUEL ADAMS. iv, 321. FORD ED., vii, 425. (Pa., Feb. 1800.)

2435. — — — A representative government, responsible at short periods of election, * * * produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind.—R. To A. VERMONT LEGISLATURE. viii, 121. (1807.)

2436. — — — The rights [of the people] to the exercise and fruits of their own industry, can never be protected against the selfishness of rulers not subject to their control at short periods.—To ISAAC H. TIFFANY. vii, 32. (M., 1816.)

2437. — — — Submit the members of the Legislature to approbation or rejection at short intervals.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 11. FORD ED., x, 30. (M., 1816.)

2438. ELECTION, Congress and.—Short elections will keep Congress right.—To THOMAS RITCHIE. vii, 102. FORD ED., x, 170. (M., 1820.)

2439. — — — The Legislative and executive branches may sometimes err, but elections and dependence will bring them to rights.—To ARCHIBALD THWEAT. vii, 199. FORD ED., x, 184. (M., 1821.)

2440. ELECTIONS, Federal Interference with.—Till the event of the [Presidential] election is known, it is too soon for me to say what should be done in such atrocious cases as those you mention of Federal officers obstructing the operation of the State governments. One thing I will say, that as to the future, interferences with elections, whether of the State or General Government, by officers of the latter, should be deemed cause of removal; because the constitutional remedy by the elective principle becomes nothing, if it may be smothered by the enormous patronage of the General Government.—To GOVERNOR THOMAS M'KEAN. iv, 350. FORD ED., vii, 486. (W., Feb. 1801.)

2441. — — — I proposed soon after coming into office to enjoin the executive officers from intermeddling with elections, as inconsistent with the true principles of our Constitution. It was laid over for consideration; but late occurrences prove the propriety of it, and it is now under consideration.—To DE WITT CLINTON. FORD ED., viii, 322. (W., Oct. 1804.)

2442. ——. I think the officers of the Federal Government are meddling too much with the public elections. Will it be best to admonish them privately or by proclamation?—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 559. FORD ED., viii, 320. (M., Sep. 1804.)

2443. ——. You mention that "Dr. Logan had informed the person that he had just received a letter from you [me], exhorting him to use all his influence to procure the reelection of Governor McKean, for that to displace him would be extremely injurious to the republican cause." Whatever may be the personal esteem I entertain for Governor McKean, and the harmony with which we acted when members of the same body. I never conceived that that would justify my taking sides against Mr. Snyder, or endeavoring in any way to influence the free choice of the State. I, therefore, have never written any such letter, nor a letter of such import to any mortal. And further, my long and intimate acquaintance with Dr. Logan, and my knowledge of his strict honor, leave the fullest conviction in my mind that there has been some mistake in the hearing, understanding, or quoting his words.—To THOMAS LIET. FORD ED., viii, 354. (M., Aug. 1805.)

2444. ELECTIONS, Intermeddling with.—From a very early period of my life I determined never to intermeddle with elections of the people, and have invariably adhered to this determination. In my own country, where there have been so many elections in which my inclinations were enlisted, I yet never interfered. I could the less do it in the present instance, your people so very distant from me, utterly unknown to me, and to whom I also am unknown; and above all, I a stranger, to presume to recommend one who is well known to them. The people could not but put this question to me, "who are you, pray"?—To CHARLES CLAY. iii, 469. FORD ED., vi, 111. (M., 1792.)

2445. ELECTIONS, Patronage and.—Every officer of the government may vote at elections according to his conscience; but we should betray the cause committed to our care, were we to permit the influence of official patronage to be used to overthrow that cause.—To LEVI LINCOLN. iv, 451. FORD ED., viii, 176. (W., October 1802.) See PATRONAGE.

2446. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1796), Candidature of Jefferson.—My name was brought forward, without concert or expectation on my part, on my salvation I declare it.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 151. FORD ED., vii, 93. (M., Dec. 1796.)

2447. ——. I had neither claims nor wishes on the subject, though I know it will be difficult to obtain belief of this. When I retired from the office of Secretary of State, it was in the firmest contemplation of never more returning to Philadelphia. There had indeed been suggestions in the public papers, that I was looking towards a succession to the President's chair, but feeling a consciousness of their falsehood, and observing that the suggestions came from hostile quarters, I considered them as intended merely to excite public odium against me. I never in my life exchanged a word with any person on the subject, till I found my name brought forward generally, in competition with that of Mr. Adams. Those with whom I then communicated could say, if it were necessary, whether I met the call with desire, or even with a ready acquiescence, and whether from the moment of my first acquiescence, I did not devoutly pray that the very thing might happen which has happened.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 170. FORD ED., vii, 119. (Pa., May 1797.)

2448. ——. The first wish of my heart was that you should have been proposed for the administration of the government. On your declining it, I wish anybody rather than myself.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 150. FORD ED., vii, 91. (M., Dec. 17, 1796.)

2449. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1796), Dispute over.—It seems possible, that the Representatives may be divided. This is a difficulty from which the Constitution has provided no issue. It is both my duty and inclination, therefore, to relieve the embarrassment, should it happen: and in that case, I pray you, and authorize you fully, to solicit on my behalf that Mr. Adams may be preferred. He has always been my senior, from the commencement of my public life, and the expression of the public will being equal, this circumstance ought to give him the preference. And when so many motives will be operating to induce some of the members to change their vote, the addition of my wish may have some effect to preponderate the scale.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 150. FORD ED., vii, 91. (M., Dec. 17, 1796.)

2450. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1796), Eastern States and.—I have no expectation that the Eastern States will suffer themselves to be so much outwitted, as to be made the tools for bringing in Pinckney instead of Adams. I presume they will throw away their Second Vote. In this case, it begins to appear possible, that there may be an equal division where I had supposed the republican vote would have been considerably minor.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 150. FORD ED., vii, 91. (M., Dec. 17, 1796.)

2451. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1796), Jefferson's Vote.—I shall highly value, indeed, the share which I may have had in the late vote, as an evidence of the share I hold in the esteem of my countrymen. But in this point of view, a few votes more or less will be little sensible, and in every other, the minor will be preferred by me to the major vote.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 152. FORD ED., vii, 94. (M., Dec. 1796.)

2452. ——. I value highly, indeed, the part my fellow-citizens gave me in their late vote, as an evidence of their esteem, and I am happy in the information you are so kind as to give, that many in the Eastern quarter entertain the same sentiment.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. iv, 168. FORD ED., vii, 117. (M., Feb. 1797.)

2453. ——. I value the late vote highly; but it is only as the index of the place I hold in the esteem of my fellow citizens. In this point of view, the difference between sixty-eight and seventy-one votes is little sensible, and still less that between the real vote, which was sixty-nine and seventy; because one real elector in Pennsylvania was excluded from voting by the miscarriage of the votes, and one who was not an elector was admitted to vote.—To C. F. VOLNEY. iv, 158. (M., 1797.)

2454. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1796), A Pseudo-President and.—I observe doubts are still expressed as to the validity of the Vermont election. Surely, in so great a case, substance, and not form, should prevail. I cannot suppose that the Vermont constitution has been strict in requiring particular forms of expressing the legislative will. As far as my disclaimer may have any effect, I pray you to declare it on every occasion, foreseen or not foreseen by me, in favor of the choice of the people substantially expressed, and to prevent the phenomenon of a Pseudo-President at so early a day.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., vii, 105. (M., January 16, 1797.)

2455. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1796), Result of.—I have never one moment doubted the result. I knew it was impossible Mr. Adams should lose a vote north of the Delaware, and that the free and moral agency of the South would furnish him an abundant supplement.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 151. FORD ED., vii, 93. (M., Dec. 27, 1796.)

2456. — — — The event of the election has never been a matter of doubt in my mind. I knew that the Eastern States were disciplined in the schools of their town meetings to sacrifice differences of opinion to the great object of operating in phalanx, and that the more free and moral agency practiced in the other States would always make up the supplement of their weight. Indeed the vote comes much nearer to an equality than I had expected.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 154. FORD ED., vii, 98. (M., Jan. 1797.)

2457. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1796), Vice-Presidency.—On principles of public respect I should not have refused [the Presidency]; but I protest before my God, that I shall, from the bottom of my heart, rejoice at escaping.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 151. FORD ED., vii, 93. (M., Dec. 1796.) See VICE-PRESIDENCY.

2458. — — — There is nothing I so anxiously hope as that my name may come out either second or third. These would be indifferent to me; as the last would leave me at home the whole year, and the other two-thirds of it.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 150. FORD ED., vii, 91. (M., Dec. 1796.)

2459. — — — I have no ambition to govern men; no passion which would lead me to delight to ride in a storm. Flumina amo, sylvasque, inglorius. My attachment to my home has enabled me to make the calculation with rigor, perhaps with partiality, to the issue which keeps me there. The newspapers will permit me to plant my corn, peas, &c., in hills or drills as I please (and my oranges, by-the-by, when you send them), while our eastern friend will be struggling with the storm which is gathering over us; perhaps be shipwrecked in it. This is certainly not a moment to covet the helm.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 152. FORD ED., vii, 94. (M., Dec. 1796.)

2460. — — — It is difficult to obtain full credit to declarations of disinclination to honors, and most so with those who still remain in the world. But never was there a more solid unwillingness, founded on rigorous calculation, formed in the mind of any man, short of peremptory refusal. No arguments, therefore, were necessary to reconcile me to a relinquishment of the first office, or acceptance of the second. No motive could have induced me to undertake the first, but that of putting our vessel upon her republican tack, and preventing her being driven too far to leeward of her true principles. And the second is the only office in the world about which I cannot decide in my own mind, whether I had rather have it or not have it. Pride does not enter into the estimate. For I think with the Romans of old, that the General of to-day should be a common soldier to-morrow, if necessary. But as to Mr. Adams, particularly, I would have no feelings which would revolt at being placed in a secondary station to him. I am his junior in life, I was his junior in Congress, his junior in the diplomatic line, and lately his junior in our civil government.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 154. FORD ED., vii, 98. (M., Jan. 1797.) See 74.

2461. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Action of Adams.—Mr. Adams embarrasses us. He keeps the offices of State and War vacant, but has named Bayard, Minister Plenipotentiary to France, and has called an unorganized Senate to meet the fourth of March.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 356. FORD ED., vii, 495. (W., Feb. 18, 1801.)

2462. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Appointments and.—If the [choice] falls on me, I shall be embarrassed by finding the offices vacant, which cannot be even temporarily filled but with the advice of the Senate, and that body is called on the fourth of March, when it is impossible for the new members of Kentucky, Georgia, and South Carolina to receive notice in time to be here. * * * If the difficulties of the election, therefore, are got over, there are more and more behind, until new elections shall have regenerated the constituted authorities.—To TENCH COXE. iv, 352. FORD ED., vii, 488. (W., Feb. 1801.)

2463. — — — Should [the federalists] yield the election, I have reason to expect, in the outset, the greatest difficulties as to nominations. The late incumbents, running away from their offices and leaving them vacant, will prevent my filling them without the previous advice of the Senate. How this difficulty is to be got over I know not.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 355. FORD ED., vii, 491. (W., Feb. 1801.)

2464. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Balloting in House.—This is the morning of the election by the House of Representatives. For some time past, a single individual had declared he would, by his vote, make up the ninth State. On Saturday last he changed, and it stands at present eight one way, six the other, and two divided. Which of the two will be elected, and whether either, I deem perfectly problematical; and my mind has long been equally made up for any one of the three events. * * * The defects of our Constitution under circumstances like the present, appear very great.—To TENCH COXE. iv, 352. FORD ED., vii, 488. (W., Feb. 11, 1801.)

2465. — — — This is the fourth day of the ballot, and nothing done; nor do I see any reason to suppose the six and a half States here will be less firm, as they call it, than your thirteen Senators; if so, and the Government should expire on the 3d of March, by the loss of its head, there is no regular provision for reorganizing it, nor any authority but in the people themselves. They may authorize a couvention to reorganize and even amend the machine. There are ten individuals in the House of Representatives, any one of whom, changing his vote, could save us this troublesome operation.—To DR. B. S. BARTON. iv, 353. FORD ED., vii, 490. (W., Feb. 1801.)

2466. ——. Four days of balloting have produced not a single change of a vote. Yet it is confidently believed by most that tomorrow there is to be a coalition. I know of no foundation for this belief. To JAMES MONROE. iv, 354. FORD ED., vii, 490. (W., Feb. 15, 1801.)

2467. ——. After exactly a week's balloting there at length appeared ten States for me, four for Burr, and two voted blanks. This was done without a single vote coming over. Morris, of Vermont, withdrew, so that Lyon's vote became that of the State. The four Maryland federalists put in blanks, so that the vote of the four republicans became that of their State. Mr. Hager, of South Carolina (who had constantly voted for me) withdrew by agreement, his colleagues agreeing in that case to put in blanks. Bayard, the sole member of Delaware, voted blank. They had before deliberated whether they would come over in a body, when they saw they could not force Burr on the republicans, or keep their body entire and unbroken to act in phalanx on such ground of opposition as they shall hereafter be able to conjure up. Their vote showed what they had decided on, and is considered as a declaration of perpetual war; but their conduct has completely left them without support.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iv, 358. FORD ED., vii, 497. (W., Feb. 19, 1801.)

2468. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Burr and.—The federalists were confident, at first, they could debauch Colonel Burr from his good faith by offering him their vote to be President, and having seriously proposed it to him. His conduct has been honorable and decisive, and greatly embarrasses them.—To MARY JEFFERSON EFFES. FORD ED., vii, 478. (W., Jan. 1801.)

2469. ——. Had the election terminated in the elevation of Mr. Burr, every republican would, I am sure, have acquiesced in a moment; because, however it might have been variant from the intentions of the voters, yet it would have been agreeable to the Constitution. No man would more cheerfully have submitted than myself, because I am sure the administration would have been republican, and the chair of the Senate permitting me to be at home eight months in the year, would, on that account, have been much more consonant to my real satisfaction.—To THOMAS MCKEAN. iv, 368. FORD ED., viii, 12. (W., March 1801.)

2470. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Demanding Terms.—Many attempts have been made to obtain terms and promises from me. I have declared to them unequivocally, that I would not receive the government on capitulation, that I would not go into it with my hands tied.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 354. FORD ED., vii, 491. (W., Feb. 1801.) See 78.

2471. ——. Aaron Burr, in a suit between him and Cheetham, has had a deposition of Mr. Bayard taken which seems to have no relation to the suit nor to any other object but to calumniate me. Bayard pretends to have addressed to me during the pending of the Presidential election in Feb. 1801, through General Samuel Smith, certain conditions on which my election might be obtained, and that General Smith after conversing with me gave answers from me. This is absolutely false. No proposition of any kind was ever made to me on that occasion by General Smith, nor any answer authorized by me. And this fact General Smith affirms at this moment. * * * But the following transactions took place about the same time, that is to say, while the Presidential election was in suspense in Congress, which, though I did not enter at the time [in the Anas], made such an impression on my mind that they are now as fresh as to their principal circumstances as if they had happened yesterday. Coming out of the Senate chamber one day I found Gouverneur Morris on the steps. He stopped me and began a conversation on the strange and portentous state of things then existing, and went on to observe that the reasons why the minority of States were so opposed to my being elected were that they apprehended that, 1. I should turn all federalists out of office. 2. Put down the Navy. 3. Wipe off the public debt and 4. * * * That I need only to declare, or authorize my friends to declare, that I would not take these steps, and instantly the event of the election would be fixed. I told him that I should leave the world to judge of the course I meant to pursue by that which I had pursued hitherto; believing it to be my duty to be passive and silent during the present scene; that I should certainly make no terms, should never go into the office of President by capitulation, nor with my hands tied by any conditions which should hinder me from pursuing the measures which I should deem for the public good. It was understood that Gouverneur Morris had entirely the direction of the vote of Lewis Morris of Vermont, who by coming over to Matthew Lyon would have added another vote and decided the election. About the same time, I called on Mr. Adams. We conversed on the state of things. I observed to him, that a very dangerous experiment was then in contemplation, to defeat the Presidential election by an act of Congress declaring the right of the Senate to name a President of the Senate, to devolve on him the government during any interregnum; that such a measure would probably produce resistance by force, and incalculable consequences, which it would be in his power to prevent by negating such an act. He seemed to think such an act justifiable, and observed it was in my power to fix the election by a word in an instant, by declaring I would not turn out the federal officers, nor put down the Navy, nor sponge the national debt. Finding his mind made up as to the usurpation of the government by the President of the Senate, I urged it no further, observed the world must judge as to myself of the future by the past, and turned the conversation to something else. About the same time, Dwight Foster of Massachusetts called on me in my room one night, and went into a very long conversation on the state of affairs, the drift of which was to let me understand that the fears above-mentioned were the only obstacle to my election, to all of which I avoided giving any answer the one way or the other. From this moment he became most bitterly and personally opposed to me, and so has ever continued. I do not recollect that I ever had any particular conversation with General Samuel Smith on this subject. Very possibly I had, however, as the general subject and all its parts were the constant themes of conversation in the private tête à tête with our friends.

* MS. cut out.—FORD EDITION NOTE.

But certain I am, that neither he, nor any other republican, ever uttered the most distant hint to me about submitting to any conditions, or giving any assurance to anybody; and still more certainly, was neither he nor any other person ever authorized by me to say what I would or would not do.—ANAS. ix, 209. FORD ED., i, 312. (April 1806.)

2472. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Doubt Concerning.—South Carolina (the only State about which there was uncertainty), has given a republican vote, and saved us from the consequences of the annihilation of Pennsylvania.—To JOHN BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 342. FORD ED., vii, 469. (W., Dec. 1800.)

2473. ———. The election in South Carolina has in some measure decided the great contest. Though as yet we do not know the actual votes of Tennessee, Kentucky and Vermont, yet we believe the votes to be on the whole, J. 73, B. 73, A. 65, P. 64. Rhode Island withdrew one from P. There is a possibility that Tennessee may withdraw one from B., and Burr writes that there may be one vote in Vermont for J. But I told the latter impossible, and the former not probable; and that there will be an absolute parity between the two Republican candidates.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 342. FORD ED., vii, 470. (W., Dec. 19, 1800.)

2474. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Efforts to Defeat.—A strong portion in the House of Representatives will prevent an election if they can. I rather believe they will not be able to do it, as there are six individuals of moderate character, any one of whom coming over to the republican vote will make a ninth State.—To THOMAS M'KEAN. iv, 350. FORD ED., vii, 486. (W., Feb. 1801.)

2475. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Federalists yield.—The minority in the House of Representatives, after seeing the impossibility of electing Burr, the certainty that a legislative usurpation would be resisted by arms, and a recourse to a convention to reorganize and amend the government, held a consultation on this dilemma, whether it would be better for them to come over in a body and go with the tide of the times, or by a negative conduct suffer the election to be made by a bare majority, keeping their body entire and unbroken, to act in phalanx on such ground of opposition as circumstances shall offer; and I know their determination on this question only by their vote of yesterday. [Feb. 17.] Morris, of Vermont, withdrew, which made Lyon's vote that of his State. The Maryland federalists put in four blanks, which made the positive ticket of their colleagues the vote of the State. South Carolina and Delaware put in six blanks. So there were ten States for one candidate, four for another, and two blanks. We consider this, therefore, as a declaration of war, on the part of this band. But their conduct appears to have brought over to us the whole body of federalists, who, being alarmed with the danger of a dissolution of the government, had been made most anxiously to wish the very administration they had opposed, and to view it, when obtained, as a child of their own. They [illegible] too their quondam leaders separated fairly from them, and themselves relegated under other banners. Even Hamilton and Higginson have been partisans for us. This circumstance, with the unbounded confidence which will attach to the new ministry, as soon as known, will start us on right ground.*—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 355. FORD ED., vii, 494. (W., Feb. 18, 1801.)

2476. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Military Force and.—How happy that our army had been disbanded! What might have happened otherwise seems rather a subject of reflection than explanation.—To NATHANIEL NILES REGISTER. iv, 377. FORD ED., viii, 24. (W., March 1801.)

2477. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), National Convention and.—I have been above all things, solaced by the prospect which opened on us, in the event of a non-election of a President; in which case, the Federal Government would have been in the situation of a clock or watch run down. There was no idea of force, nor of any occasion for it. A convention, invited by the republican members of Congress, with the virtual President and Vice-President, would have been on the ground in eight weeks, would have repaired the Constitution where it was defective, and wound it up again. This peaceable and legitimate resource, to which we are in the habit of implicit obedience, superseding all appeal to force, and being always within our reach, shows a precious principle of self-preservation in our composition, till a change of circumstances shall take place, which is not within prospect at any definite period.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 374. FORD ED., viii, 22. (W., March 1801.)

2479. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Parity of Vote.—[The prospect of a parity between the two republican candidates] has produced great dismay and gloom on the republican gentlemen here, and exultation in the federalists, who openly declare they will prevent an election, and will name a President of the Senate pro tem. by what they say would only be a stretch of the Constitution.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 343. FORD ED., vii, 470. (W., Dec. 19, 1800.)

2480. ———. We are brought into dilemma by the probable equality of the two Republican candidates. The federalists in Congress mean to take advantage of this, either to prevent an election altogether, or reverse what has been understood to have been the wishes of the people as to the President and Vice-President; wishes which the Constitution did not permit them specially to designate. The latter alternative still gives us a Republican administration. The former, a suspension of the Federal Government, for want of a head. This opens to us an abyss, at which every sincere patriot must shudder.—To JOHN BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 342. FORD ED., vii, 469. (W., Dec. 1800.)

2481. ——. Although we have not official information of the votes for President, and cannot have until the first week in February, yet the state of the votes is given on such evidence, as satisfies both parties that the two republican candidates stand highest. From South Carolina we have not even heard of the actual vote; but we have learned who were appointed electors, and with sufficient certainty how they would vote. It is said they would withdraw from yourself one vote. It has also been said that a General Smith, of Tennessee, had declared that he would give his second vote to Mr. Gallatin, not from any indisposition towards you, but extreme reverence to the character of Mr. Gallatin. It is also surmised that the vote of Georgia will not be entire. Yet nobody pretends to know these things of a certainty, and we know enough to be certain that what it is surmised will be withheld, will still leave you four or five votes at least above Mr. Adams. However, it was badly managed not to have arranged with certainty what seems to have been left to hazard. It was the more material, because I understand several of the high-flying federalists have expressed their hope that the two republican tickets may be equal, and their determination, in that case, to prevent a choice by the House of Representatives (which they are strong enough to do), and let the government devolve on a President of the Senate. Decency required that I should be so entirely passive during the late contest that I never once asked whether arrangements had been made to prevent so many from dropping votes intentionally, as might frustrate half the republican wish; nor did I doubt, till lately, that such had been made.—To AARON BURR. iv, 340. FORD ED., vii, 466. (W., Dec. 1800.)

2482. ——. It seems tolerably well ascertained (though not officially) that the two republican candidates * * * have a decided majority; probably of 73 to 65, but equally probable that they are even between themselves, and that the federalists are disposed to make the most of the embarrassment this occasions, by preventing any election by the House of Representatives. It is far from certain that nine representatives in that House can be got to vote for any candidate. What the issue of such a dilemma may be cannot be estimated.—To CAESAR RODNEY. FORD ED., vii, 472. (W., Dec. 1800.)

2483. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Party Amalgamation and.—The suspension of public opinion [pending the election in the House of Representatives], the alarm into which it threw all the patriotic part of the federalists, the danger of the dissolution of our Union, and unknown consequences of that, brought over the great body of them to wish with anxiety and solicitude for a choice to which they had before been strenuously opposed. In this state of mind, they separated from their congressional leaders, and came over to us; and the manner in which the last ballot was given has drawn a fixed line of separation between them and their leaders. When the election took effect, it was the most desirable of events to them. This made it a thing of their choice, and finding themselves aggregated with us accordingly, they are in a state of mind to be consolidated with us, if no intemperate measures on our part revolt them again. I am persuaded that weeks of ill-judged conduct here, has strengthened us more than years of prudent and conciliatory administration could have done.—To THOMAS LOMAX. iv, 361. FORD ED., vii, 500. (W., Feb. 1801.)

2484. ——. Our information from all quarters is that the whole body of federalists concurred with the republicans in the last elections, and with equal anxiety. They had been made to interest themselves so warmly for the very choice, which while before the people they opposed, that when obtained it came as a thing of their own wishes, and they find themselves embodied with the republicans, and their quondam leaders separated from them; and I verily believe they will remain embodied with us, so that this conduct of the minority has done in one week what very probably could hardly have been effected by years of mild and impartial administration.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iv, 359. FORD ED., vii, 359. (W., Feb. 1801.)

2485. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), The People and.—The order and good sense displayed * * * in the momentous crisis which lately arose, really bespeak a strength of character in our nation which augurs well for the duration of our Republic; and I am much better satisfied now of its stability than I was before it was tried.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 374. FORD ED., viii, 22. (W., March 1801.)

2486. ——. The character which our fellow citizens have displayed on this occasion, gives us everything to hope for the permanence of our government.—To GENERAL WARREN. iv, 376. (W., 1801.)

2487. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), A President pro tem.—The federalists appear determined to prevent an election, and to pass a bill giving the government to Mr. Jay, appointed Chief Justice, or to Marshall as Secretary of State. Yet I am rather of opinion that Maryland and Jersey will give the seven republican majorities.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 344. FORD ED., vii, 473. (W., Dec. 1800.)

2488. ——. The prospect of preventing [the Senate from naming a President pro tem.] is as follows: Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Vermont, Pennsylvania, and New York can be counted on for their vote in the House of Representatives, and it is thought by some that Baer of Maryland, and Linn, of New Jersey, will come over. Some even count on Morris, of Vermont. But you must know the uncertainty of such a dependence under the operation of caucuses and other federal engines. The month of February, therefore, will present us storms of a new character. Should they have a particular issue, I hope you will be here a day or two. At least, before the 4th of March. I know that your appearance on the scene before the departure of Congress, would assuage the minority, and inspire in the majority confidence and joy unbounded, which they would spread far and wide on their journey home. Let me beseech you, then, to come with a view of staying perhaps a couple of weeks, within which time things might be put into such a train, as would permit us both to go home for a short time, for removal.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 343. FORD ED., vii, 470. (W., Dec. 1800.)

2489. ——. We do not see what is to be the issue of the present difficulty. The federalists, among whom those of the republican section are not the strongest, propose to prevent an election in Congress, and to transfer the government by an act to the C. J. (Jay) or Secretary of State, or to let it devolve on the President pro tem. of the Senate, till next December, which gives them another year's predominance, and the chances of future events.—To TENCH COXE. iv, 345. FORD ED., vii, 475. (W., Dec. 1800.)

2490. ——. If the federalists could have been permitted to pass a law for putting the government into the hands of an officer, they would certainly have prevented an election. But we thought it best to declare openly and firmly, one and all, that the day such an act passed, the middle States would arm, and that no such usurpation, even for a single day, should be submitted to. This first shook them; and they were completely alarmed at the resource for which we declared, to wit, a convention to reorganize the Government and to amend it. The very word "convention" gives them the horrors, as in the present democratic spirit of America, they fear they should lose some of the favorite morsels of the Constitution.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 354. FORD ED., vii, 490. (W., Feb. 1801.)

2491. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), The Republic and.—The storm [Presidential election] we have passed through proves our vessel indestructible.—To M. DE LAFAYETTE. iv, 363. (W., March 1801.)

2492. ——. We have passed through an awful scene in this country. * * * A few hardy spirits stood firm to their posts, and the ship has breasted the storm.—To M. DE LAFAYETTE. iv, 363. (W., March 1801.)

2493. ——. The late chapter of our history furnishes a lesson to man perfectly new. The times have been awful, but they have proved an useful truth, that the good citizen must never despair of the commonwealth. How many good men abandoned the deck, and gave up the vessel as lost.—To NATHANIEL NILES. iv, 376. FORD ED., viii, 24. (W., March 1801.)

2494. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Republicans and.—The republicans propose to press forward to an election. If they fail in this, a concert between the two higher candidates may prevent the dissolution of the government and danger of anarchy, by an operation, bungling indeed and imperfect, but better than letting the Legislature take the nomination of the Executive entirely from the people.—To TENCH COXE. iv, 345. FORD ED., vii, 475. (W., Dec. 1800.)

2495. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1800), Usurpation and.—In the event of an usurpation, I was decidedly with those who were determined not to permit it. Because that precedent once set, would be artificially reproduced, and end soon in a dictator. Virginia was bristling up, I believe. I shall know the particulars from Governor Monroe, whom I expect to meet in a short visit I must make home.—To THOMAS MCKEAN. iv, 369. FORD ED., viii, 12. (W., March 1801.)

2496. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1804), Appeal to country.—The abominable slanders of my political enemies have obliged me to call for that verdict [on my conduct] from my country in the only way it can be obtained, and if obtained, it will be my sufficient voucher to the rest of the world and to posterity, and leave me free to seek, at a definite time, the repose I sincerely wished to have retired to now. I suffer myself to make no inquiries as to the persons who are to be placed on the rolls of competition for the public favor. Respect for myself, as well as for the public, requires that I should be the silent and passive subject of their consideration.—To THOMAS MCKEAN. FORD ED., viii, 293. (W., Jan. 1804.)

2497. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1804), Non-Interference with.—[I said to Colonel Burr] that in the election now coming on, I was observing the same conduct [as in 1800]; held no councils with anybody respecting it, nor suffered anyone to speak to me on the subject, believing it my duty to leave myself to the free discussion of the public; that I do not at this moment know, nor have ever heard, who were to be proposed as candidates for the public choice, except so far as could be gathered from the newspapers.—THE ANAS. ix, 205. FORD ED., i, 302. (January 1804.)

2498. ——. I never interfered directly or indirectly, with my friends or any others, to influence the election either for him [Aaron Burr] or myself. I considered it as my duty to be merely passive, except that in Virginia I had taken some measures to procure for him the unanimous vote of that State, because I thought any failure there might be imputed to me.—THE ANAS. ix, 205. FORD ED., i, 302. (1804.)

2499. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1808), Neutrality of Jefferson.—I see with infinite grief a contest arising between yourself and another, who have been very dear to each other, and equally so to me. I sincerely pray that these dispositions may not be affected between you; with me I confidently trust they will not. For independently of the dictates of public duty, which prescribe neutrality to me, my sincere friendship for you both will ensure its sacred observance. I suffer no one to converse with me on the subject. I already perceive my old friend Clinton, estranging himself from me. No doubt lies are carried to him, as they will be to the other two candidates, under forms which, however false, he can scarcely question. Yet, I have been equally careful as to him also, never to say a word on this subject. The object of the contest is a fair and honorable one, equally open to you all; and I have no doubt the personal conduct of all will be so chaste, as to offer no ground of dissatisfaction with each other. But your friends will not be as delicate. I know too well from experience the progress of political controversy, and the exacerbation of spirit into which it degenerates, not to fear the continuance of your mutual esteem. One piquing thing said draws on another, that a third, and always with increasing acrimony, until all restraint is thrown off, and it becomes difficult for yourselves to keep clear of the toils in which your friends will endeavor to interlace you, and to avoid the participation in their passions which they will endeavor to produce. A candid recollection of what you know of each other will be the true corrective. With respect to myself, I hope they will spare me. My longings for retirement are so strong, that I with difficulty encounter the daily drudgeries of my duty. But my wish for retirement itself is not stronger than that of carrying into it the affections of all my friends. I have ever viewed Mr. Madison and yourself as two principal pillars of my happiness. Were either to be withdrawn, I should consider it as among the greatest calamities which could assail my future peace of mind. I have great considence that the candor and high understanding of both will guard me against this misfortune, the bare possibility of which has so far weighed on my mind, that I could not be easy without unburthening it.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 247. FORD ED., ix, 177. (W., Feb. 1808.)

2500. ——. In the present contest in which you are concerned I feel no passion, I take no part, I express no sentiment. Whichever of my friends is called to the supreme cares of the nation, I know that they will be wisely and faithfully administered, and as far as my individual conduct can influence, they shall be cordially supported.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 255. (March 1808.)

2501. ——. The Presidential question is clearly up daily, and the opposition subsiding. It is very possible that the suffrage of the nation may be undivided. But with this question it is my duty not to intermeddle.—To MERIWETHER LEWIS. v, 321. FORD ED., ix, 200. (W., July 1808.)

2502. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1816), Good Feeling in.—I have been charmed to see that a Presidential election now produces scarcely any agitation. On Mr. Madison's election there was little, on Monroe's all but none. In Mr. Adams's time and mine, parties were so nearly balanced as to make the struggle fearful for our peace. But since the decided ascendancy of the republican body, federalism has looked on with silent but unresisting anguish. In the middle, southern and western States, it is as low as it ever can be; for nature has made some men monarchists and tories by their constitution, and some, of course, there always will be.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. vii, 80. FORD ED., x, 92. (M., 1817.)

2503. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1824), Constitutional Construction and.—I hope the choice [of the next President] will fall on some real republican, who will continue the administration on the express principles of the Constitution, unadulterated by constructions reducing it to a blank to be filled with what everyone pleases, and what never was intended.—To SAMUEL H. SMITH. FORD ED., x, 264. (M., Dec. 1823.)

2504. ——. On the question of the next Presidential election, I am a mere looker-on. I never permit myself to express an opinion, or to feel a wish on the subject. I indulge a single hope only, that the choice may fall on one who will be a friend of peace, of economy, of the republican principles of our Constitution, and of the salutary distribution of powers made by that between the general and the local governments.—To SAMUEL SMITH. vii, 286. FORD ED., x, 253. (M., 1823.)

2505. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1824), Lafayette's visit and.—The eclat of Lafayette's visit has almost merged the Presidential question on which nothing scarcely is said in our papers. That question will lie ultimately between Crawford and Adams; but, at the same time, the vote of the people will be so distracted by subordinate candidates, that possibly they may make no election, and let it go to the House of Representatives. There, it's thought, Crawford's chance is best.—To RICHARD RUSH. vii, 380. FORD ED., x, 322. (M., October 1824.)

2506. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1824), Militarism and.—This Presidential election has given me few anxieties. With you this must have been impossible, independently of the question, whether we are at last to end our days under a civil or a military government.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 387. (M., 1825.)

2507. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1824), Passiveness of Jefferson.—In the Presidential election I am entirely passive. * * * Both favorites are republican, both will administer the government honestly.—To THOMAS LEIPER. FORD ED., x, 299. (M., 1824.)

2508. ELECTIONS (Presidential, 1824), Sectionalism in.—Who is to be the next President? * * * The question will be ultimately reduced to the northernmost and southernmost candidate. The former will get every federal vote in the Union, and many republicans; the latter, all of those denominated of the old school; for you are not to believe that these two parties are amalgamated, that the lion and the lamb are lying down together.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 325. FORD ED., x, 280. (M., 1823.)

— ELECTORAL COLLEGE.—See PRESIDENCY.

— ELECTRICITY.—See VEGETATION.

2509. ELLSWORTH (Oliver), Resignation.—Ellsworth remains in France for the benefit of his health. He has resigned his office of Chief Justice. Putting these two things together, we cannot misconstrue his views. He must have had great confidence in Mr. Adams's continuance to risk such a certainty as he held.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 343. FORD ED., vii, 471. (W., Dec. 1800.)

2510. ELOQUENCE, Models of.—In a country and government like ours, eloquence is a powerful instrument, well worthy of the special pursuit of our youth. Models, indeed, of chaste and classical oratory are truly too rare with us; nor do I recollect any remarkable in England. Among the ancients the most perfect specimens are perhaps to be found in Livy, Sallust and Tacitus. Their pith and brevity constitute perfection itself for an audience of sages, on whom froth and fancy would be lost in air. But in ordinary cases, and with us particularly, more development is necessary. For senatorial eloquence, Demosthenes is the finest model; for the bar, Cicero. The former had more logic, the latter more imagination. Of the eloquence of the pen, we have fine samples in English. Robertson, Sterne, Addison, are of the first merit in the different characters of composition. Hume, in the circumstance of style, is equal to any; but his tory principles spread a cloud over his many and great excellences. The charms of his style and matter have made tories of all England, and doubtful republicans here.—To G. W. SUMMERS. vii, 231. (M., 1822.)

— EMANCIPATION.—See COLONIES, SLAVERY.

2511. EMBARGO, Action advised.—The communications * now made [to Congress] showing the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened on the high seas, and elsewhere, from the belligerent powers of Europe, and it being of great importance to keep in safety these essential resources, I deem it my duty to recommend the subject to the consideration of Congress, who will doubtless perceive all the advantages which may be expected from an inhibition of the departure of our vessels from the ports of the United States. Their wisdom will also see the necessity of making every preparation for whatever events may grow out of the present crisis.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii; 89. FORD ED., ix, 169. (Dec. 18. 1807.)

* The decrees of the French government of November 21, 1806, and of Spain, February 10, 1807, with the orders of the British government of January and November, 1807.—EDITOR.

2512. ——. Although the decree of the French government of November 21 [1807] comprehended, in its literal terms, the commerce of the United States, yet the prompt explanation by one of the ministers of that government that it was not so understood, and that our treaty would be respected, the practice which took place in the French ports conformably with that explanation, and the recent interference of that government to procure in Spain a similar construction of a similar decree there, had given well-founded expectation that it would not be extended to us; and this was much strengthened by the consideration of their obvious interests. But the information from our minister at Paris * * * is, that it is determined to extend the effect of that decree to us; and it is probable that Spain and the other Atlantic and Mediterranean States of Europe will cooperate in the same measure. The British regulations had before reduced us to a direct voyage to a single port of their enemies, and it is now believed they will interdict all commerce whatever with them. A proclamation, too, of that government (not officially, indeed, communicated to us, yet so given out to the public as to become a rule of action with them) seems to have shut the door on all negotiation with us, except as to the single aggression on the Chesapeake. The sum of these mutual enterprises on our national rights is that France, and her allies, reserving for further consideration the prohibiting our carrying anything to the British territories, have virtually done it, by restraining our bringing a return cargo from them; and Great Britain, after prohibiting a great proportion of our commerce with France and her allies, is now believed to have prohibited the whole. The whole world is thus laid under interdict by these two nations, and our vessels, their cargoes and crews, are to be taken by the one or the other, for whatever place they may be destined, out of our own limits. If, therefore, on leaving our harbors we are certainly to lose them, is it not better, as to vessels, cargoes, and seamen, to keep them at home? This is submitted to the wisdom of Congress, who alone are competent to provide a remedy.—TO JOHN MASON. v, 217. (Dec. 1807.)

2513. ——. These decrees and orders,* taken together, want little of amounting to a declaration that every neutral vessel found on the high seas, whatsoever be her cargo, and whatsoever foreign port be that of her departure or destination, shall be deemed lawful prize; and they prove, more and more, the expediency of retaining our vessels, our seamen, and property, within our own harbors, until the dangers to which they are exposed can be removed or lessened.—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 100. FORD ED., ix, 185. (March 1808.)

* Jefferson sent with this message an additional decree of Bonaparte, dated December 17, 1807, and a similar decree of the King of Spain, dated January 3, 1808.—EDITOR.

— EMBARGO, Adams (J. Q.) and.—See 2587.

2514. EMBARGO, Alternative of war. —The alternative was between that and war, and, in fact, it is the last card we have to play, short of war.*—TO LEVI LINCOLN. v, 265. (W., March 1808.)

2515. ——. Could the alternative of war, or the Embargo, have been presented to the whole nation, as it occurred to their representatives, there could have been but the one opinion that it was better to take the chance of one year by the Embargo, within which the orders and decrees producing it may be repealed, or peace take place in Europe, which may secure peace to us.—TO BENJAMIN SMITH. v, 293. FORD ED., ix, 194. (M., May 1808.)

2516. ——. All regard to the rights of others having been thrown aside, the belligerent powers have beset the highway of commercial intercourse with edicts which, taken together, expose our commerce and mariners, under almost every destination, a prey to their fleets and armies. Each party, indeed, would admit our commerce with themselves, with a view of associating us in their war against the other. But we have wished war with neither. Under these circumstances were passed the laws of which you complain, by those delegated to exercise the powers of legislation for you, with every sympathy of a common interest in exercising them faithfully. In reviewing these measures, therefore, we should advert to the difficulties out of which a choice was of necessity to be made. To have submitted our rightful commerce to prohibitions and tributary exactions from others, would have been to surrender our independence. To resist them by armies was war, without consulting the state of things or the choice of the nation. The alternative preferred by the Legislature of suspending a commerce placed under such unexampled difficulties, besides saving to our citizens their property, and our mariners to their country, has the peculiar advantage of giving time to the belligerent nations to revise a conduct as contrary to their interests as it is to our rights.—REPLY TO A BOSTON REPEAL REQUEST. viii, 134. (Aug. 1808.)

2517. ——. We have to choose between the alternatives of Embargo and war. There is indeed one and only one other, that is submission and tribute. For all the federal propositions for trading to the places permitted by the edicts of the belligerents, result in fact in submission, although they do not choose to pronounce the naked word.—TO MR. LETUE. v, 384. (W., Nov. 1808.)

2518. ——. The measures respecting our intercourse with foreign nations were the result of a choice between two evils, either to call and keep at home our seamen and property, or suffer them to be taken under the edicts of the belligerent powers. How a difference of opinion could arise between these alternatives is still difficult to explain on any acknowledged ground; and I am persuaded that when the storm and agitation characterizing the present

* "The Embargo," says Morse in his Life of Jefferson, "was a civilized policy, worthy of respect. Moreover, it was a sensible policy. Jefferson alone understood in that time the truth, which is now more generally appreciated, that by sheer growth in population, wealth and industry, a nation gains the highest degree of substantial power and authority." —EDITOR.

prejudice shall have yielded to reason its usurped place, and especially when posterity shall pass its sentence on the present times, justice will be rendered to the course which has been pursued. To the advantages derived from the choice which was made will be added the improvements and discoveries made and making in the arts, and the establishments in domestic manufacture, the effects whereof will be permanent and diffused through our wide-extended continent.—R. to A. MARYLAND CITIZENS. viii, 164. (1809.)

2519. EMBARGO, Amendments to law.—If, on considering the doubts I shall suggest, you shall still think your draft of a supplementary Embargo law sufficient, in its present form, I shall be satisfied. 1. Is not the first paragraph against the Constitution, which says no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another? You might put down those ports as ports of entry, if that could be made to do. 2. Could not your second paragraph be made to answer by making it say, that no clearance shall be furnished to any vessel laden with provisions or lumber, to go from one port to another of the United States, without special permission, &c. In that case, we might lay down rules for the necessary removal of provisions and lumber, inland, which should give no trouble to the citizens, but refuse licenses for all coasting transportation of those articles but on such applications from a Governor as may ensure us against any exportation but for the consumption of his State. Portsmouth, Boston, Charleston, and Savannah, are the only ports which cannot be supplied inland. I should like to prohibit collections, also, made evidently for clandestine importation. 3. I would rather strike out the words, "in conformity with treaty," in order to avoid any express recognition at this day of that article of the British treaty. It has been so flagrantly abused as to excite the Indians to war against us, that I should have no hesitation in declaring it null, as soon as we see means of supplying the Indians ourselves. I should have no objections to extend the exception to the Indian furs purchased by our traders and sent into Canada.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v. 267. FORD ED., ix, 189. (W., March 1808.)

2520. EMBARGO, Approval of.—It is a circumstance of great satisfaction that the proceedings of the government are approved by the respectable Legislature of Massachusetts, and especially the late important measure of the Embargo. The hearty concurrence of the States in that measure, will have a great effect in Europe.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. v. 252. (W., March 1808.)

2521. — — —. Through the body of our country generally our citizens appear heartily to approve and support the Embargo.—To BENJ. SMITH. v. 294. FORD ED., ix, 195. (M., May 1808.)

2522. — — —. I see with satisfaction that this measure of self-denial is approved and supported by the great body of our real citizens, that they meet with cheerfulness the temporary privations it occasions.—R. to A. NEW HAMPSHIRE LEGISLATURE. viii, 131. (1808.)

2523. — — —. The Embargo appears to be approved, even by the federalists of every quarter except yours. [Massachusetts.] To LEVI LINCOLN. v. 265. (W., March 1808.)

2524. — — —. That the Embargo is approved by the body of republicans through the Union, cannot be doubted. It is equally known that a great proportion of the federalists approve of it; but as they think it an engine which may be used advantageously against the republican system, they countenance the clamors against it.—To D. C. BRENT. v. 305. (W., June 1808.)

2525. — — —. While the opposition to the late laws of Embargo has in one quarter amounted almost to rebellion and treason, it is pleasing to know that all the rest of the nation has approved of the proceedings of the constituted authorities. The steady union * * * of our fellow citizens of South Carolina, is entirely in their character. They have never failed in fidelity to their country and the republican spirit of the Constitution. Never before was that union more needed or more salutary than under our present crisis.—To MR. LETUE. v. 384. (W., Nov. 1808.)

2526. EMBARGO, Authority to suspend.—The decrees and orders of the belligerent nations having amounted nearly to declarations that they would take our vessels wherever found, Congress thought it best, in the first instance, to break off all intercourse with them. They * * * passed an act authorizing me to suspend the Embargo whenever the belligerents should revoke their decrees or orders as to us. The Embargo must continue, therefore, till they meet again in November, unless the measures of the belligerents should change. When they meet again, if these decrees and orders still continue, the question which they will have to decide will be, whether a continuance of the Embargo or war will be preferable.—To WILLIAM LYMAN. v. 279. (W., April 1808.)

2527. — — —. If they repeal their orders, we must repeal our Embargo. If they make satisfaction for the Chesapeake, we must revoke our proclamation and generalize its operation by a law. If they keep up impressions, we must adhere to non-intercourse, manufacturer's and a navigation act.—To JAMES MADISON. v. 361. FORD ED., ix, 208. (M., Sep. 1808.)

2528. EMBARGO, Averts war.—The immediate danger * * * of a rupture with England, is postponed for this year. This is effected by the Embargo, as the question was simply between that and war.—To CHARLES PINCKNEY. v. 266. (W., March 1808.)

2529. — — —. The Embargo, keeping at home our vessels, cargoes and seamen, saves us the necessity of making their capture the cause of immediate war; for, if going to England, France had determined to take them, if to any other place, England was to take them. Till they return to some sense of moral duty, therefore, we keep within ourselves. This gives time. Time may produce peace in Europe; peace in Europe removes all causes of difference, till another European war; and by that time our debt may be paid, our revenues clear, and our strength increased.—To JOHN TAYLOR. v. 227. (W., Jan. 1808.)

2530. EMBARGO, Belligerent Powers and.—I take it to be an universal opinion that war will become preferable to a continuance of the Embargo after a certain time. Should we not, then, avail ourselves of the intervening period to procure a retraction of the obnoxious decrees peaceably, if possible? An opening is given us by both parties, sufficient to form a basis for such a proposition. I wish you, therefore, to consider the following course of proceeding, to wit: To instruct our ministers at Paris and London to propose immediately to both those powers a declaration on both sides that these decrees and orders shall no longer be extended to vessels of the United States, in which case we shall remain faithfully neutral; but, without assuming the air of menace, to let them both perceive that if they do not both withdraw these orders and decrees, there will arrive a time when our interests will render war preferable to a continuance of the Embargo; that when that time arrives, if one has withdrawn and the other not, we must declare war against that other; if neither shall have withdrawn, we must take our choice of enemies between them. This, it will certainly be our duty to have ascertained by the time Congress shall meet in the fall or beginning of winter; so that taking off the Embargo, they may decide whether war must be declared, and against whom.—To JAMES MADISON. v, 257. FORD ED., ix, 179. (W., March 1808.) See 2558.

2531. EMBARGO, Benefits of.—It has rescued from capture an important capital, and our seamen from the jails of Europe. It has given time to prepare for defence, and has shown to the aggressors of Europe that evil, as well as good actions, recoil on the doers.—R. to A. PITTSBURG REPUBLICANS. viii, 141. (1808.)

2532. — — — I have been highly gratified with the late general expressions of public sentiment in favor of a measure which alone could have saved us from immediate war, and give time to call home eighty millions of property, twenty or thirty thousand seamen, and two thousand vessels. These are now nearly at home, and furnish a great capital, much of which will go into manufactures, and seamen to man a fleet of privateers, whenever our citizens shall prefer war to a longer continuance of the Embargo. Perhaps, however, the whole of the ocean may be tired of the solitude it has made on that element, and return to honest principles; and his brother robber on the land may see that, as to us, the grapes are sour.—To JOHN LANGDON. FORD ED., ix, 201. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2533. — — — It alone could have saved us from immediate war, and give time to call home eighty millions of property, twenty or thirty thousand seamen, and two thousand vessels. These are now nearly at home, and furnish a great capital, much of which will go into manufactures and remain to man a fleet of privateers, whenever our citizens shall prefer war to a longer continuance of the Embargo. Perhaps, however, the whole of the ocean may be tired of the solitude it has made on that element, and return to honest principles, and that his brother robber on the land may see that, as to us, the grapes are sour.—To GOVERNOR JOHN LANGDON. viii, 132. FORD ED., ix, 201. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2534. — — — We have the satisfaction, to reflect that in return for the privations by the measure, and which our fellow citizens in general have borne with patriotism, it has had the important effects of saving our mariners and our vast mercantile property, as well as of affording time for prosecuting the defensive and provisional measures called for by the occasion. It has demonstrated to foreign nations the moderation and firmness which govern our councils, and to our citizens the necessity of uniting in support of the laws and the rights of their country, and has thus long frustrated those usurpations and spoliation which, if resisted, involve war; if submitted to, sacrificed a vital principle of our national independence.—EIGHTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 105. FORD ED., ix, 219. (1808.)

2535. — — — By withdrawing a while from the ocean we have suffered some loss; but we have gathered home our immense capital, exposed to foreign depredation, we have saved our seamen from the jails of Europe, and gained time to prepare for the defence of our country.—R. to A. CONNECTICUT REPUBLICANS. viii, 140. (Nov. 1808.)

2536. — — — The edicts of the two belligerents, forbidding us to be seen on the ocean, we met by an Embargo. This gave us time to call home our seamen, ships and property, to levy men and put our seaports into a certain state of defence.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 432. (W., March 1809.)

— EMBARGO, Bonaparte's views on.—See 861.

2537. EMBARGO, Coasting trade and.—With respect to the coasting trade, my wish is only to carry into full effect the intentions of the Embargo laws. I do not wish a single citizen in any of the States to be deprived of a meal of bread, but I set down the exercise of commerce, merely for profit, as nothing when it carries with it the danger of defeating the objects of the Embargo.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 207. (M., May 1808.)

2538. EMBARGO, Coercion of Europe.—The resolutions of the republican citizens of Boston are worthy of the ancient character of the sons of Massachusetts, and of the spirit of concord with her sister States, which, and which alone, carried us successfully through the Revolutionary war, and finally placed us under that national government, which constitutes the safety of every part, by uniting for its protection the powers of the whole. The moment for exerting these united powers, to repel the injuries of the belligerents of Europe, seems likely to be pressed upon us.—To WILLIAM EUSTIS. v, 410. FORD ED., ix, 235. (W., Jan. 1809.)

2539. EMBARGO, Congress and.—The House of Representatives passed last night a bill for the meeting of Congress on the 22d of May. This substantially decides the course they mean to pursue; that is, to let the Embargo continue till then, when it will cease, and letters of marque and reprisal be issued against such nations as shall not then have repealed their obnoxious edicts. The great majority seem to have made up their minds on this, while there is considerable diversity of opinion on the details of preparation; to wit, naval force, volunteers, army, non-intercourse.—To THOMAS LIEFER. v, 417. FORD ED., ix, 238. (W., January 21, 1809.)

2540. EMBARGO, Duration of.—The embargo may go on a certain time, perhaps through the year, without the loss of property to our citizens, but only its remaining unemployed on their hands. A time would come, however, when war would be preferable to a continuance of the Embargo.—To CHARLES PINCKNEY. v, 266. (W., March 1808.)

2541. ——. The absurd opinion has been propagated, that this temporary and necessary arrangement was to be a permanent system, and was intended for the destruction of commerce. The sentiments expressed in the paper you were so kind as to enclose to me, [address of Boston republicans] show that those who have concurred in them have judged with more candor the intentions of their government, and are sufficiently aware of the tendency of the excitements and misrepresentations which have been practiced on this occasion.—To Dr. WILLIAM EUSTIS. v, 410. FORD ED., ix, 235. (W., January 1809.)

2542. EMBARGO, Effect on Industry.—Of the several interests composing those of the United States, that of manufactures would, of course, prefer to war a state of non-intercourse, so favorable to their rapid growth and prosperity. Agriculture, although sensibly feeling the loss of market for its produce, would find many aggravations in a state of war. Commerce and navigation, or that portion which is foreign, in the inactivity to which they are reduced by the present state of things, certainly experience their full share in the general inconvenience; but whether war would to them be a preferable alternative, is a question their patriotism would never hastily propose. It is to be regretted, however, that overlooking the real sources of the sufferings, the British and French edicts which constitute the actual blockade of our foreign commerce and navigation, they have, with too little reflection, imputed them to laws which have saved them from greater, and have preserved for our own use our vessels, property and seamen, instead of adding them to the strength of those with whom we might eventually have to contend. The Embargo, giving time to the belligerent powers to revise their unjust proceedings, and to listen to the dictates of justice, of interest and reputation, which equally urge the correction of their wrongs, has availed our country of the only honorable expedient for avoiding war; and should a repeal of these edicts supersede the cause for it, our commercial brethren will become sensible that it has consulted their interests, however against their own will. It will be unfortunate for their country if, in the meantime, these their expressions of impatience, should have the effect of prolonging the very sufferings which have produced them, by exciting a fallacious hope that we may, under any pressure, relinquish our equal right of navigating the ocean, go to such ports only as others may prescribe, and there pay the tributary exactions they may impose; an abandonment of national independence and of essential rights, revolting to every manly sentiment. While these edicts are in force, no American can ever consent to a return of peaceable intercourse with those who maintain them.—To THE CITIZENS OF BOSTON. viii, 136. (Aug. 1808.)

2543. EMBARGO, Enforcing.—I am for going substantially to the object of the law, and no further; perhaps a little more earnestly because it is the first expedient, and it is of great importance to know its full effect.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 292. (M., May 1808.)

2544. ——. We have such complaints of the breach of Embargo by fraud and force of our northern water line, that I must pray your cooperation with the Secretary of the Treasury by rendezvousing as many new recruits as you can in that quarter.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 322. (W., July 1808.)

2545. ——. I am clearly of opinion this law ought to be enforced at any expense, which may not exceed our appropriation.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 336. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2546. ——. In the support of the Embargo laws, our only limit should be that of the appropriations of the department.—To ROBERT SMITH. v, 337. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2547. ——. The great leading object of the Legislature was, and ours in execution of it ought to be, to give complete effect to the Embargo laws. They have bidden agriculture, commerce, navigation, to bow before that object, to be nothing when in competition with it. Finding all their endeavors at general rules to be evaded, they finally gave us the power of detention as the panacea, and I am clear we ought to use it freely that we may, by a fair experiment, know the power of this great weapon, the Embargo.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 287. (May 1808.)

2548. ——. It is important to crush every example of forcible opposition to the law.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 271. (1808.)

2549. ——. The pressure of the Embargo, although sensibly felt by every description of our fellow citizens, has yet been cheerfully borne by most of them, under the conviction that it was a temporary evil, and a necessary one to save us from greater and more permanent evils,—the loss of property and surrender of rights. But it would have been more cheerfully borne, but for the knowledge that, while honest men were religiously observing it, the unprincipled along our sea-coast and frontiers were fraudulently evading it; and that in some parts they had even dared to break through it openly, by an armed force too powerful to be opposed by the collector and his assistants. To put an end to this scandalous insubordination to the laws, the Legislature has authorized the President to empower proper persons to employ militia, for preventing or suppressing armed or riotous assemblages of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, or opposing or violating the Embargo laws. He sincerely hopes that, during the short time which these restrictions are expected to continue, no other instances will take place of a crime of so deep a dye. But it is made his duty to take the measures necessary to meet it. He, therefore, requests you, as commanding officer of the militia of your State, to appoint some officer of the militia, of known respect for the laws, in or near to each port of entry within your State, with orders, when applied to by the collector of the district, to assemble immediately a sufficient force of his militia, and to employ them efficaciously to maintain the authority of the laws respecting the Embargo.

He has referred this appointment to your Excellency because your knowledge of characters, or means of obtaining it, will enable you to select one who can be most confided in to exercise so serious a power, with all the discretion, the forbearance, the kindness even, which the enforcement of the law will possibly admit,—ever to bear in mind that the life of a citizen, is never to be endangered, but as the last melancholy effort for the maintenance of order and obedience to the laws.—To THE GOVERNORS OF THE STATES. v, 413. FORD ED., ix, 237. (W., Jan. 1809.)

2550. EMBARGO, Evasions of.—The evasions of the preceding Embargo laws went so far towards defeating their objects, and chiefly by vessels clearing out coast-wise, that Congress, by their act of April 25th, authorized the absolute detention of all vessels bound coast-wise with cargoes exciting suspicions of an intention to evade those laws. There being few towns on our sea-coast which cannot be supplied with flour from their interior country, shipments of flour become generally suspicious and proper subjects of detention. Charleston is one of the few places on our seaboard which need supplies of flour by sea for its own consumption. That it may not suffer by the cautions we are obliged to use, I request of your Excellency, whenever you deem it necessary that your present or any future stock should be enlarged, to take the trouble of giving your certificate in favor of any merchant in whom you have confidence, directed to the collector of any port, usually exporting flour, from which he may choose to bring it, for any quantity which you may deem necessary for consumption beyond your interior supplies, enclosing to the Secretary of the Treasury at the same time a duplicate of the certificate as a check on the falsification of your signature. In this way we may secure a supply of the real wants of our citizens, and at the same time prevent those wants from being made a cover for the crimes against their country which unprincipled adventurers are in the habit of committing.*—To THE GOVERNOR OF SOUTH CAROLINA. v, 286. (W., May 1808.)

2551. ——. Should these reasonable precautions [to insure adequate supplies of flour] be followed, as is surmised in your letter, by an artificial scarcity, with a view to promote turbulence of any sort or on any pretext, I trust for an ample security against this danger to the character of my fellow citizens of Massachusetts, which has, I think, been emphatically marked by obedience to law, and a love of order. And I have no doubt that whilst we do our duty, they will support us in it. The laws enacted by the General Government, have made it our duty to have the Embargo strictly enforced, for the general good; and we are sworn to execute the laws. If clamor ensue, it will be from the few only, who will clamor whatever we do.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. v, 341. FORD ED., ix, 206. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2552. ——. The belligerent edicts rendered our Embargo necessary to call home our ships, our seamen and property. We expected some effect too from the coercion of interest. Some it has had; but much less on account of evasions, and domestic opposition to it.—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. v, 433. (W., March 1809.)

2553. EMBARGO, Exports and.—After fifteen months' continuance it is now discontinued, because, losing $50,000,000 of exports annually by it, it costs more than war, which might be carried on for a third of that, besides what might be got by reprisal. War, therefore, must follow if the edicts are not repealed before the meeting of Congress in May.—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. v, 433. (W., March 1809.)

* A similar notification was sent to the Governors of New Orleans, Georgia, Massachusetts and New Hampshire.—EDITOR.

2554. EMBARGO, Fair trial of.—My principle is that the convenience of our citizens shall yield reasonably, and their taste greatly to the importance of giving the present experiment so fair a trial that on future occasions our legislators may know with certainty how far they may count on it as an engine for national purposes.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 309. (W., July 1808.)

2555. EMBARGO, Federalists and.—The federalists during their short-lived ascendancy have, by forcing us from the Embargo, inflicted a wound on our interests which can never be cured, and on our affections which will require time to cicatrize. I ascribe all this to one pseudo-republican, Story. He came on (in place of Crowningshield, I believe) and stayed only a few days; long enough, however, to get complete hold of Bacon, who, giving in to his representations, became panic-struck, and communicated his panic to his colleagues, and they to a majority of the sound members of Congress. They believed in the alternative of repeal or civil war, and produced the fatal measure of repeal.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 529. FORD ED., ix, 277. (M., July 1810.) See 2568, 2587.

2556. EMBARGO, Foreign subjects and.—The principle of our indulgence of vessels to foreign ministers was, that it was fair to let them send away all their subjects caught here by the Embargo, and who had no other means of getting away.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 347. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2557. EMBARGO, Foreign trade and.—The Embargo laws will have hastened the day when an equilibrium between the occupations of agriculture, manufactures and commerce, shall simplify our foreign concerns to the exchange only of that surplus which we cannot consume for those articles of reasonable comfort, or convenience, which we cannot produce.—R. to A. PENNSYLVANIA CITIZENS. viii, 163. (1809.)

2558. EMBARGO, France, England and.—Our ministers at London and Paris were instructed to explain to the respective governments there, our disposition to exercise the authority in such manner as would withdraw the pretext on which the aggressions were originally founded, and open a way for a renewal of that commercial intercourse which it was alleged on all sides had been reluctantly obstructed. As each of those governments had pledged its readiness to concur in renouncing a measure which reached its adversary through the incontestable rights of neutrals only, and as the measure had been assumed by each as a retaliation for an asserted acquiescence in the aggressions of the other, it was reasonably expected that an occasion would have been seized by both for evincing the sincerity of their profession, and for restoring to the commerce of the United States its legitimate freedom. The instructions to our ministers with respect to the different belligerents were necessarily modified with reference to their different circumstances, and to the condition annexed by law to the Executive power of suspension, requiring a degree of security to our commerce which would not result from a repeal of the decrees of France. Instead of a pledge, therefore, of a suspension of the Embargo as to her in case of such a repeal, it was presumed that a sufficient inducement might be found in other considerations, and particularly in the change produced by a compliance with our just demands by one belligerent, and a refusal by the other, in the relations between the other and the United States. To Great Britain, whose power on the ocean is so ascendant, it was deemed not inconsistent with that condition to state explicitly, that on her rescinding her orders in relation to the United States their trade would be opened with her, and remain shut to her enemy, in case of his failure to rescind his decrees also. From France no answer has been received, nor any indication that the requested change in her decrees is contemplated. The favorable reception of the proposition to Great Britain was the less to be doubted, as her orders of council had not only been referred for their vindication to an acquiescence on the part of the United States no longer to be pretended, but as the arrangement proposed, while it resisted the illegal decrees of France, involved, moreover, substantially, the precise advantages professedly aimed at by the British orders. The arrangement has, nevertheless, been rejected. This candid and liberal experiment having thus failed, and no other event having occurred on which a suspension of the Embargo by the Executive was authorized, it necessarily remains in the extent originally given to it.—EIGHTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 103. FORD ED., ix, 214. (Nov. 1808.)

2559. EMBARGO, Frauds under.—The Embargo law is certainly the most embarrassing one we have ever had to execute. I did not expect a crop of so sudden and rank growth of fraud, and open opposition by force could have grown up in the United States.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 336. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2560. — — — If the whole quantity of [flour and corn] had been bonâ fide landed and retained in Massachusetts, I deemed it certain there could not be a real want for a considerable time, and, therefore, desired the issues of certificates might be discontinued. If, on the other hand, a part has been carried to foreign markets, it proves the necessity of restricting reasonably this avenue to abuse. This is my sole object, and not that a real want of a single individual should be one day unsupplied. In this I am certain we shall have the concurrence of all the good citizens of Massachusetts, who are too patriotic and too just to desire, by calling for what is superfluous, to open a door for the frauds of unprincipled individuals who trampling on the laws, and forcing a commerce shut to all others, are enriching themselves on the sacrifices of their honest fellow citizens:—sacrifices to which these are generally submitting, as equally necessary whether to avoid or prepare for war.—TO JAMES SULLIVAN. v, 340. FORD ED., ix, 205. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2561. EMBARGO, Manufactures and.—The Embargo laws will * * * produce the inestimable advantage of turning the attention and enterprise of our fellow citizens, and the patronage of our State Legislatures, to the establishment of useful manufacture in our country.—R. TO A. PENNSYLVANIA CITIZENS. viii, 163. (M., March 1809.)

2562. EMBARGO, Mitigation of.—I shall be ready to consider any propositions you may make for mitigating the Embargo law of April 25th, but so only as not to defeat the object of the law.—TO ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 292. (M., May 1808.)

2563. EMBARGO, Necessity for.—We live in an age of affliction, to which the history of nations presents no parallel. We have for years been looking on Europe covered with blood and violence, and seen rapine spreading itself over the ocean. On this element it has reached us, and at length in so serious a degree, that the Legislature of the nation has thought it necessary to withdraw our citizens and property from it, either to avoid, or to prepare for engaging in the general contest.—TO CAPTAIN MCGREGOR. v, 356. (M., 1808.)

2564. — — — During the delirium of the warring powers, the ocean having become a field of lawless violence, a suspension of our navigation for a time was equally necessary to avoid contest, or to enter it with advantage.—R. TO A. viii, 128. (May 1808.)

2565. — — — Those moral principles and conventional usages which have heretofore been the bond of civilized nations, which have so often preserved their peace by furnishing common rules for the measure of their rights have now given way to force, the law of barbarians, and the nineteenth century dawns with the vandalism of the fifth. Nothing has been spared on our part to preserve the peace of our country during this distempered state of the world.—R. TO A. KETOCTON BAPTISTS. viii, 138. (1808.)

2566. — — — Assailed in our essential rights by two of the most powerful nations on the globe, we have remonstrated, negotiated, and at length retired to the last stand, in the hope of peaceably preserving our rights. In this extremity I have entire confidence that no part of the people in any section of the Union, will desert the banners of their country, and co-operate with the enemies who are threatening its existence.—R. TO A. MASSACHUSETTS MILITIA. viii, 151. (1809.)

2567. — — — The belligerent powers of Europe [France and England] have interdicted our commerce with nearly the whole world. They have declared it shall be carried on with such places, in such articles, and in such measure only, as they shall dictate: thus prostrating all the principles of right which have hitherto protected it. After exhausting the cup of forbearance and of conciliation to its dregs, we found it necessary, on behalf of that commerce, to take time to call it home into a state of safety, to put the towns and harbors which carry it on into a condition of defence, and to make further preparation for enforcing the redress of its wrongs, and restoring it to its rightful freedom. This required a certain measure of time, which, although not admitting specific limitation, must, from its avowed objects, have been obvious to all; and the progress actually made towards the accomplishment of these objects, proves it now to be near its term.—TO DR. WILLIAM EUSTIS. v, 410. FORD ED., ix, 235. (W., January 1809.)

— EMBARGO, New England and.—See 2587.

2568. EMBARGO, Opposition to.—I am sorry that in some places, chiefly on our northern frontier, a disposition even to oppose the law by force has been manifested. In no country on earth is this so impracticable as in one where every man feels a vital interest in maintaining the authority of the laws, and instantly engages in it as in his own personal cause. Accordingly, we have experienced this spontaneous aid of our good citizens in the neighborhoods where there has been occasion, as I am persuaded we ever shall on such occasions. Through the body of our country generally our citizens appear heartily to approve and support the Embargo.—To BENJAMIN SMITH. v, 293. FORD ED., ix, 195. (M., May 1808.)

2569. ——. That the federalists [of Massachusetts] may attempt insurrection is possible, and also that the Governor would sink before it. But the republican part of the State, and that portion of the federalists who approve the Embargo in their judgments, and at any rate would not court mob-law, would crush it in embryo. I have some time ago written to General Dearborn to be on the alert on such an occasion, and to take direction of the public authority on the spot. Such an incident will rally the whole body of republicans of every shade to a single point,—that of supporting the public authority.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. v, 347. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2570. ——. The case of opposition to the Embargo laws on the Canada line, I take it to be that of distinct combinations of a number of individuals to oppose by force and arms the execution of those laws, for which purpose they go armed, fire upon the public guards, in one instance at least have wounded one dangerously, and rescue property held under these laws. This may not be an insurrection in the popular sense of the word, but being arrayed in warlike manner, actually committing acts of war, and persevering systematically in defiance of the public authority, brings it so fully within the legal definition of an insurrection, that I should not hesitate to issue a proclamation were I not restrained by motives of which your Excellency seems to be apprized. But as by the laws of New York an insurrection can be acted on without a previous proclamation, I should conceive it perfectly correct to act on it as such, and I cannot doubt it would be approved by every good citizen. Should you think proper to do so, I will undertake that the necessary detachments of militia, called out in support of the laws, shall be considered as in the service of the United States, and at their expense. * * * I think it so important in example to crush these audacious proceedings, and to make the offenders feel the consequences of individuals daring to oppose a law by force, that no effort should be spared to compass this object.—To GOVERNOR TOMPKINS. v, 343. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2571. ——. The tories of Boston openly threaten insurrection if their importation of flour is stopped. The next post will stop it. I fear your Governor is not up to the tone of these parricides, and I hope, on the first symptom of an open opposition to the law by force, you will fly to the scene, and aid in suppressing any commotion.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 334. FORD ED., ix, 201. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2572. ——. I have some apprehension the tories of Boston, &c., with so poor a head of a Governor, may attempt to give us trouble. I have requested General Dearborn to be on the alert, and fly to the spot where any open and forcible opposition shall be commenced, and to crush it in embryo. I am not afraid but that there is sound matter enough in Massachusetts to prevent an opposition of the laws by force.—To ROBERT SMITH. v, 335. (M., Aug. 1808.)

2573. EMBARGO, Peace and.—An Embargo had, by the course of events, become the only peaceable card we had to play.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 299. (M., May 1808.)

2574. ——. There never has been a situation of the world before, in which such endeavors as we have made would not have secured our peace. It is probable there never will be such another. If we go to war now, I fear we may renounce forever the hope of seeing an end of our national debt. If we can keep at peace eight years longer, our income, liberated from debt, will be adequate to any war, without new taxes or loans, and our position and increasing strength put us hors d'insulte from any nation.—To JAMES MONROE. v, 420. FORD ED., ix, 243. (W., Jan. 1809.)

2575. EMBARGO, Political effects.—Our Embargo has worked hard. It has in fact federalized three of the New England States.—To WILLIAM SHORT. v, 436. FORD ED., ix, 249. (W., March 1809.)

2576. EMBARGO, Proclamation suspending.—I never doubted the chicanery of the Anglomen on whatever measures you should take in consequence of the disavowal of Erskine; yet I am satisfied that both the proclamations have been sound. The first has been sanctioned by universal approbation; and although it was not literally the case foreseen by the Legislature, yet it was a proper extension of their provision to a case similar, though not the same. It proved to the whole world our desire of accommodation, and must have satisfied every candid federalist on that head. It was not only proper on the well-grounded confidence that the arrangement would be honestly executed, but ought to have taken place even had the perfidy of England been foreseen. Their dirty gain is richly remunerated to us by our placing them so shamefully in the wrong, and by the union it must produce among ourselves. The last proclamation admits of quibbles, of which advantage will doubtless be endeavored to be taken, by those for whom gain is their God, and their country nothing. But it is soundly defensible. The British minister assured us, that the orders of council would be revoked before the 10th of June. The Executive, trusting in that assurance, declared by proclamation that the revocation was to take place, and on that event the law was to be suspended. But the event did not take place, and the consequence, of course, could not follow. This view is derived from the former non-intercourse law only, having never read the latter one. I had doubted whether Congress must not be called; but that arose from another doubt, whether their second law had not changed the ground, so as to require their agency to give operation to the law.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 463. (M., Aug. 1809.)

2577. EMBARGO, Repeal.—I thought Congress had taken their ground firmly for continuing their Embargo until June and then war. But a sudden and unaccountable revolution of opinion took place the last week, chiefly among the New England and New York members, and in a kind of panic they voted the 4th of March for removing the Embargo, and by such a majority as gave all reason to believe they would not agree either to war or non-intercourse. This, too, after we had become satisfied that the Essex Junto had found their expectation desperate, of inducing the people there to either separation or forcible opposition. The majority of Congress, however, has now rallied to the removing the Embargo on the 4th of March, non-intercourse with France and Great Britain, trade everywhere else, and continued war preparations.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. v, 424. FORD ED., ix, 244. (W., Feb. 7, 1809.)

2578. ——. The House of Representatives passed yesterday, by a vote of 81 to 40, the bill from the Senate repealing the Embargo the 4th of March, except against Great Britain and France and their dependencies, establishing a non-intercourse with them, and having struck out the clause for letters of marque and reprisal, which it is thought the Senate will still endeavor to reinstate.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. v, 430. FORD ED., ix, 248. (W., Feb. 28, 1809.)

2579. ——. We have taken off the Embargo, except as to France and England and their territories, because fifty millions of exports, annually sacrificed, are the treble of what war would cost us; besides, that by war we should take something, and lose less than at present.—To DUPONT DE NEMOURS. v, 432. (W., March 2, 1809.)

2580. ——. The repeal of the Embargo is the immediate parent of all our present evils, and has reduced us to a low standing in the eyes of the world. I should think that even the federalists themselves must now be made, by their feelings, sensible of their error. The wealth which the Embargo brought home safely, has now been thrown back into the laps of our enemies, and our navigation completely crushed, and by the unwise and unpatriotic conduct of those engaged in it.—To HENRY DEARBORN. v, 529. FORD ED., ix, 277. (M., July 1810.)

2581. ——. Our business certainly was to be still. But a part of our nation chose to declare against this, in such a way as to control the wisdom of the government. I yielded with others, to avoid a greater evil. But from that moment, I have seen no system which could keep us entirely aloof from these agents of destruction. [France and England.]—To DR. WALTER JONES. v, 511. FORD ED., ix, 274. (M., 1810.)

2582. EMBARGO, Salutory.—That the Embargo laws were salutary and indispensably necessary to meet the obstructions [of our commerce], are truths as evident to every candid man, as it is worthy of every good citizen to declare his reprobation of that system of opposition which goes to an avowed and practical resistance of these laws.—R. to A. ANNAPOLIS CITIZENS. viii, 150. (1809.)

2583. EMBARGO, Seamen and.—The difficulties of the crisis will certainly fall with greater pressure on some descriptions of citizens than on others; and on none perhaps with greater than our seafaring brethren. Should any means of alleviation occur within the range of my duties, I shall with certainty advert to the situation of the petitioners, and, in availing the nation of their services, aid them with a substitute for their former occupations.—To CAPTAIN MCGREGOR. v, 357. (M., 1808.)

2584. EMBARGO, Submission, or War?—The questions of submission, of war, or Embargo, are now before our country as unembarrassed as at first. Submission and tribute, if they be our choice, will be no baser now than at the date of the Embargo. But if, as I trust, that idea be spurned, we may now decide on the other alternatives of war and Embargo, with the advantage of possessing all the means which have been rescued from the grasp of capture.—R. to A. CONNECTICUT REPUBLICANS. viii, 141. (Nov. 1808.)

2585. ——. The congressional campaign is just opening. Three alternatives alone are to be chosen from. 1. Embargo. 2. War. 3. Submission and tribute. And, wonderful to tell, the last will not want advocates. The real question, however, will lie between the two first, on which there is considerable division. As yet, the first seems most to prevail; but opinions are by no means yet settled down. Perhaps the advocates of the second may, to a formal declaration of war, prefer general letters of marque and reprisal, because, on a repeal of their edicts by the belligerent, a revocation of the letters of marque restores peace without the delay, difficulties, and ceremonies of a treaty. On this occasion, I think it is fair to leave to those who are to act on them, the decisions they prefer, being to be myself but a spectator. I should not feel justified in directing measures which those who are to execute them would disapprove. Our situation is truly difficult. We have been pressed by the belligerents to the very wall, and all further retreat is impracticable.—To LEVI LINCOLN. v, 387. FORD ED., ix, 227. (W., Nov. 1808.)

2586. ——. Under a continuance of the belligerent measures which, in defiance of laws which consecrate the rights of neutrals, overspread the ocean with danger, it will rest with the wisdom of Congress to decide on the course best adapted to such a state of things; and bringing with them, as they do, from every part of the Union, the sentiments of our constituents, my confidence is strengthened, that in forming this decision they will, with an unerring regard to the essential rights and interests of the nation, weigh and compare the painful alternatives out of which a choice is to be made. Nor should I do justice to the virtues which on other occasions have marked the character of our fellow citizens, if I did not cherish an equal confidence that the alternative chosen, whatever it may be, will be maintained with all the fortitude and patriotism which the crisis ought to inspire.—EIGHTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 105. FORD ED., ix, 220. (Nov. 1808.)

2587. EMBARGO, The Union and.—Mr. John Quincy Adams called on me pending the Embargo, and while endeavors were making to obtain its repeal. He made some apologies for the call, on the ground of our not being then in the habit of confidential communications, but that that which he had then to make, involved too seriously the interest of our country not to overrule all other considerations with him, and make it his duty to reveal it to myself particularly. I assured him there was no occasion for any apology for his visit; that, on the contrary, his communications would be thankfully received, and would add a confirmation the more to my entire confidence in the rectitude and patriotism of his conduct and principles. He spoke then of the dissatisfaction of the Eastern portion of our confederacy with the restraints of the Embargo then existing, and their restlessness under it; that there was nothing which might not be attempted, to rid themselves of it. That he had information of the most unquestionable certainty, that certain citizens of the Eastern States (I think he named Massachusetts particularly) were in negotiation with agents of the British government, the object of which was an agreement that the New England States should take no further part in the war then going on; that, without formally declaring their separation from the Union of the States, they should withdraw from all aid and obedience to them; that their navigation and commerce should be free from restraint and interruption by the British; that they should be considered and treated by them as neutrals, and as such might conduct themselves towards both parties; and, at the close of the war, be at liberty to rejoin the confederacy. He assured me that there was imminent danger that the convention would take place; that the temptations were such as might debauch many from their fidelity to the Union; and that, to enable its friends to make head against it, the repeal of the Embargo was absolutely necessary. I expressed a just sense of the merit of this information, and of the importance of the disclosure to the safety and even the salvation of our country; and however reluctant I was to abandon the measure (a measure which persevered in a little longer, we had subsequent and satisfactory assurance would have effected its object completely), from that moment, and influenced by that information, I saw the necessity of abandoning it, and instead of effecting our purpose by this peaceable weapon, we must fight it out, or break the Union. I then recommended to yield to the necessity of a repeal of the Embargo, and to endeavor to supply its place by the best substitute, in which they could procure a general concurrence.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. vii, 424. FORD ED., x, 353. (M., Dec. 1825.)

2588. ——. Far advanced in my eighty-third year, worn down with infirmities which have confined me almost entirely to the house for seven or eight months past, it afflicts me much to receive appeals to my memory for transactions so far back as that which is the subject of your letter. My memory is, indeed, become almost a blank, of which no better proof can probably be given you than by my solemn protestation, that I have not the least recollection of your intervention between Mr. John Q. Adams and myself, in what passed on the subject of the Embargo. Not the slightest trace of it remains in my mind. Yet I have no doubt of the exactitude of the statement in your letter. And the less, as I recollect the interview with Mr. Adams, to which the previous communications which had passed between him and yourself were probably and naturally the preliminary. That interview I remember well; not, indeed, in the very words which passed between us, but in their substance, which was of a character too awful, too deeply engraved in my mind, and influencing too materially the course I had to pursue, ever to be forgotten. * * * I cannot too often repeat that this statement is not pretended to be in the very words which passed; that it only gives faithfully the impression remaining on my mind. The very words of a conversation are too transient and fugitive to be so long retained in remembrance. But the substance was too important to be forgotten, not only from the revolution of measures it obliged me to adopt, but also from the renewals of it in my memory on the frequent occasions I have had of doing justice to Mr. Adams, by repeating this proof of his fidelity to his country, and of his superiority over all ordinary considerations when the safety of that was brought into question.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. vii, 424. FORD ED., x, 351. (M., 1825.)

2589. ——. You ask my opinion of the propriety of giving publicity to what is stated in your letter, as having passed between Mr. John Quincy Adams and yourself. Of this no one can judge but yourself. It is one of those questions which belong to the forum of feeling. This alone can decide on the degree of confidence implied in the disclosure; whether under no circumstances it was to be communicated to others? It does not seem to be of that character, or at all to wear that aspect. They are historical facts which belong to the present, as well as future times. I doubt whether a single fact, known to the world, will carry as clear conviction to it, of the correctness of our knowledge of the treasonable views of the federal party of that day, as that disclosed by this, the most nefarious and daring attempt to dis sever the Union, of which the Hartford Convention was a subsequent chapter; and both of these having failed, consolidation becomes the fourth chapter of the next book of their history. But this opens with a vast accession of strength from their younger recruits, who, having nothing in them of the feelings or principles of '76, now look to a single and splendid government of an aristocracy, founded on banking institutions, and moneyed incorporations under the guise and cloak of their favored branches of manufactures, commerce and navigation, riding and ruling over the plundered ploughman and beggared yeomanry. This will be to them a next best blessing to the monarchy of their first aim, and perhaps the surest stepping-stone to it.—To WILLIAM B. GILES. vii, 428. FORD ED., x, 356. (M., 1825.)

2590. ——. During the continuance of the Embargo Mr. John Quincy Adams informed me of a combination (without naming any one concerned in it), which had for its object a severance of the Union, for a time at least. Mr. Adams and myself not being then in the habit of mutual consultation and confidence, I considered it as the stronger proof of the purity of his patriotism, which was able to lift him above all party passions when the safety of his country was endangered.—To ——. vii, 431. (M., 1826.)

2591. EMBARGO, War preferable.—If peace does not take place in Europe, and if France and England will not consent to withdraw the operation of their decrees and orders from us, when Congress shall meet in December, they will have to consider at what point of time the Embargo, continued, becomes a greater evil than war.—LEVI LINCOLN. v, 265. (W., March 1808.)

2592. ——. Should neither peace, nor a revocation of the decrees and orders in Europe take place, the day cannot be distant when the Embargo will cease to be preferable to open hostility. Nothing just or temperate has been omitted on our part, to retard or avoid this unprofitable alternative.—To JAMES BOWDOIN. v, 299. (M., May 1808.)

2593. ——. How long the continuance of the Embargo may be preferable to war, is a question we shall have to meet, if the decrees and orders and war continue.—To BENJAMIN SMITH. vii, 293. FORD ED., ix, 195. (M., May 1808.)

2594. EMBARGO, War of 1812 and.—That a continuance of the Embargo for two months longer would have prevented our war. * * * I have constantly maintained.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 465. FORD ED., ix, 521. (M., 1815.)

2595. EMBARGO (Virginian), Power to lay.—The Administrator [of Virginia] shall not possess the prerogative * * * of laying embargoes, or prohibiting the exportation of any commodity for a longer space than forty days.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 19. (June 1776.)

2596. EMBARGO (Virginian), Proclamation of.—Whereas, the exportation of provisions from the State [of Virginia] will be attended with manifest injury to the United States, by supplying the enemy, and by rendering it difficult for the public agents and contractors to procure supplies for the American troops, and will, moreover, give encouragement to engrossers and monopolizers to prosecute their baneful practices, I have thought fit by and with the advice and consent of the Council of State, to issue this, my proclamation, for laying an embargo on provisions * * * to continue until the first of May next.—EMBARGO PROCLAMATION. FORD ED., ii, 281. (Nov. 1779.)

2597. EMIGRATION, The Colonies and.—These [emigration and settlement] were effected at the expense of our own blood and treasure, unassisted by the wealth or the strength of Great Britain.*—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

2598. — — — Our emigration from England to this country gave her no more rights over us, than the emigrations of the Danes and Saxons gave to the present authorities of the mother country over England.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 8. FORD ED., i, 12. (1774.) See EXPATRIATION.

2599. EMIGRATION, Eastern.—The emigrations from the Eastern States are what I have long counted on. The religious and political tyranny of those in power with you, cannot fail to drive the oppressed to milder associations of men, where freedom of mind is allowed in fact as well as in pretense.—To DR. B. WATERHOUSE. FORD ED., ix, 533. (M., 1815.)

2603. ENEMIES, National.—We must endeavor to forget our former love for them, [the English people], and hold them as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

2604. ENEMIES, Official and private.—I hail the day which is to relieve me from being viewed as an official enemy. In private life, I never had above one or two.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., ix, 51. (W., May 1807.)

2605. ENEMIES, Patronage and.—We do not mean to leave arms in the hands of active enemies.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 544. (FORD ED., viii, 304. (1804.)

2606. ENEMIES, Political.—Men of energy of character must have enemies; because there are two sides to every question, and taking one with decision, and acting on it with effect, those who take the other will of course be hostile in proportion as they feel that effect.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 62. (M., 1817.)

2607. — — — Dr. Franklin had many political enemies, as every character must, which, with decision enough to have opinions, has energy and talent to give them effect on the feelings of the adversary opinion.—To ROBERT WALSH. vii, 108. FORD ED., x, 116. (M., 1818.)

2608. — — — In public life, a man whose political principles have any decided character, and who has energy enough to give them effect, must always expect to encounter political hostility from those of adverse principles.—To RICHARD M. JOHNSON. v, 256. (W., 1808.)

2609. ENEMY GOODS, Right to seize.—I believe it cannot be doubted, but that by the general laws of nations, the goods of a friend found in the vessel of an enemy are free, and the goods of an enemy found in the vessel of a friend are lawful prize. Upon this principle, I presume, the British armed vessels have taken the property of French citizens found in our vessels, in the cases mentioned,* and I confess I should be at a loss on what principle to reclaim it. It is true that sundry nations, desirous of avoiding the inconveniences of having their vessels stopped at sea, ransacked, carried into port, and detained, under pretense of having enemy goods aboard, have, in many instances, introduced by their special treaties another principle between them, that enemy bottoms shall make enemy goods, and friendly bottoms friendly goods; a principle much less embarrassing to commerce, and equal to all parties in point of gain and loss. But this is altogether the effect of particular treaty, controlling in special cases the general principle of the law of nations, and therefore taking effect between such nations only as have so agreed to control it. England has generally determined to adhere to the rigorous principle, having, in no instance, as far as I can recollect, agreed to the modification of letting the property of the goods follow that of the vessel, except in the single one of her treaty with France. We have adopted this modification in our treaties with France, the United Netherlands and Russia; and therefore, as to them, our vessels cover the goods of their enemies, and we lose our goods when in the vessels of their enemies. * * * With England, Spain, Portugal, and Austria, we have no treaties; therefore, we have nothing to oppose to their acting according to the general law of nations, that enemy goods are lawful prize though found in the bottom of a friend.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 24. FORD ED., vi, 356. (Pa., July 1793.)

2610. ———. I believe I may safely affirm * * * that France is the gainer, and we the loser by the principle of our treaty. Indeed, we are the losers in every direction of that principle; for when it works in our favor, it is to save the goods of our friends; when it works against us, it is to lose our own; and we shall continue to lose while the rule is only partially established. When we shall have established it with all nations, we shall be in a condition neither to gain nor lose, but shall be less exposed to vexatious searches at sea. To this condition we are endeavoring to advance; but as it depends on the will of other nations as well as our own, we can only obtain it when they shall be ready to concur.—To E. C. GENET. iv, 25. 2611. ENGLAND, American antagonism.—The war between France and England seems to be producing an effect not contemplated. All the old spirit of 1776, rekindling the newspapers from Boston to Charleston, proves this; and even the monarchist papers are obliged to publish the most furious philippics against England. A French frigate took a British prize off the capes of Delaware the other day, and sent her up here [Philadelphia]. Upon her coming into sight, thousands and thousands of the yeomanry of the city crowded and covered the wharves. Never before was such a crowd seen there; and when the British colors were seen reversed, and the French flying above them, they burst into peals of exultation. To JAMES MONROE. iii, 548. FORD ED., vi, 238. (Pa., May 1793.)

— ENGLAND, American colonies and.—See COLONIES.

2612. ENGLAND, Amity with.—No two nations on earth can be so helpful to each other as friends, nor so hurtful as enemies. And in spite of their insolence, I have ever wished for an honorable and cordial amity with them as a nation.—To ROBERT WALSH. FORD ED., x, 155. (M., 1820.)

— ENGLAND, Anglo-Saxon language.—See LANGUAGES.

2613. ENGLAND, Aristocratic Government.—The English government never dies because their King is no part of it; he is a mere formality and the real government is the aristocracy of the country, for the House of Commons is of that class.—To DOCTOR SAMUEL BROWN. vi, 165. (M., 1813.)

2614. ENGLAND, Bonaparte and.—The events which have taken place in France have lessened in the American mind the motives of interest which it felt in that Revolution, and its amity towards that country now rests on its love of peace and commerce. We see, at the same time, with great concern, the position in which Great Britain is placed, and should be sincerely afflicted were any disaster to deprive mankind of the benefit of such a bulwark against the torrent which has for some time been bearing down all before it. But her power and powers at sea seem to render everything safe in the end.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. iv, 491. (W., June 1803.) See BONAPARTE.

2615. ENGLAND, Commerce with.—Our people and merchants must consider their business as not yet settled with England. After exercising the self denial which was requisite to carry us through the war, they must push it a little further to obtain proper peace arrangements with them. They can do it the better as all the world is open to them; and it is very extraordinary if the whole world besides cannot supply them with what they may want.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iv, 40. (P., 1785.)

2616. ———. If we can obtain from Great Britain reasonable conditions of commerce (which, in my idea, must forever include an admission into her [West India] islands), the freest ground between these two nations would seem to be the best. But if we can obtain no equal terms from her, perhaps Congress might think it prudent, as Holland has done, to connect us unequivocally with France. Holland has purchased the protection of France. The price she pays, is aids in time of war. It is interesting for us to purchase a free commerce with the French islands. But whether it is best to pay for it by aids in war, or by privileges in commerce, or not to purchase it at all, is the question.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. ix, 244. FORD ED., iv, 130. (P., 1785.)

2617. ———. Nothing will bring the British to reason but physical obstruction, applied to their bodily senses. We must show that we are capable of foregoing commerce with them, before they will be capable of consenting to an equal commerce. We have all the world besides open to supply us with gewgaws, and all the world to buy our tobacco.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 36. (P., 1785.)

2618. ———. I know nothing which would act more powerfully as a sumptuary law with our people than an inhibition of commerce with England. They are habituated to the luxuries of that country and will have them while they can get them. They are unacquainted with those of other countries; and therefore will not very soon bring them so far into fashion as that it shall be thought disreputable not to have them in one's house, or on their table.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 37. (P., 1785.)

2619. ——. England declines all arrangements with us. They say their commerce is so necessary to us, that we shall not deny it to ourselves for the sake of the carrying business, as the only trade they leave us is that with Great Britain immediately, and that is a losing one. I hope we shall show them we have sense and spirit enough to suppress that, or at least to exclude them from any share in the carriage of our commodities. Their spirit towards us is deeply hostile and they seem as if they did not fear a war with us.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. i, 559. (P., 1786.)

2620. ——. With respect to a commercial treaty with this country, be assured that the government not only has it not in contemplation at present to make any, but that they do not conceive that any circumstances will arise which shall render it expedient for them to have any political connection with us. They think we shall be glad of their commerce on their own terms.—To RICHARD HENRY LEE. i, 541. FORD ED., iv, 206. (L., April 1786.)

2621. ——. The English think we cannot prevent our countrymen from bringing our trade into their laps. A conviction of this determines them to make no terms of commerce with us. They say they will pocket our carrying trade as well as their own. Our overtures of commercial arrangements have been treated with a derision, which shows their firm persuasion that we shall never unite to suppress their commerce, or even to impede it.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 550. FORD ED., iv, 214. (P., 1786.)

2622. ——. That no commercial arrangements between Great Britain and the United States have taken place, cannot be imputed to us. The proposition has surely been often enough made, perhaps too often.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. iii, 283. (Pa., 1791.)

2623. ——. The bill lately passed in England, prohibiting the business of this country with France from passing through the medium of England, is a temporary embarrassment to our commerce, from the unhappy predicament of its all hanging on the pivot of London. It will be happy for us, should it be continued till our merchants may establish connections in the countries in which our produce is consumed, and to which it should go directly.—To GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. iii, 580. FORD ED., vi, 300. (Pa., June 1793.)

2624. ——. My opinion of the British government is, that nothing will force them to do us justice but the loud voice of their people, and that this can never be excited but by distressing their commerce.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iv, 106. FORD ED., vi, 510. (M., 1794.) See DUTIES, EMBARGO, NAVIGATION and TREATIES.

2625. ENGLAND, Conciliation with.—I look upon all cordial conciliation with England as desperate during the life of the present King.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 465. (M., Aug. 1809.)

2626. ENGLAND, Corruption of government.—We know that the government of England, maintaining itself by corruption at home, uses the same means in other countries of which she has any jealousy, by subsidizing agitators and traitors among themselves to distract and paralyze them. She sufficiently manifests that she has no disposition to spare ours.—To GOVERNOR PLUMER. vi, 415. (1815.) See HARTFORD CONVENTION.

2627. ENGLAND, Crisis in.—I believe with you that the crisis of England is come. What will be its issue it is vain to prophesy; so many thousand contingencies may turn up to affect its direction. Were I to hazard a guess, it would be that they will become a military despotism. Their recollections of the portion of liberty they have enjoyed will render force necessary to retain them under pure monarchy. Their pressure upon us has been so severe and so unprincipled, that we cannot deprecate their fate, though we might wish to see their naval power kept up to the level of that of the other principal powers separately taken.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 552. FORD ED., ix, 286. (M., 1810.)

2628. ——. What England is to become on the crush of her internal structure, now seeming to be begun, I cannot foresee. Her moneyed interests, created by her paper system, and now constituting a baseless mass of wealth equal to that of the owners of the soil, must disappear with that system, and the medium for paying great taxes thus failing, her navy must be without support. That it shall be supported by permitting her to claim dominion of the ocean, and to levy tribute on every flag traversing that, as lately attempted and not yet relinquished, every nation must contest, even ad internecionem. And yet, that retiring from this enormity, she should continue able to take a fair share in the necessary equilibrium of power on that element, would be the desire of every nation.—To THOMAS LAW. v, 557. FORD ED., ix, 293. (M., 1811.)

2629. ——. The approach of this crisis is, I think, visible, in the departure of her precious metals, and depreciation of her paper medium. We, who have gone through that operation, know its symptoms, its course, and consequences. In England, they will be more serious than elsewhere, because half the wealth of her people is now in that medium, the private revenue of her money-holders, or rather of her paper-holders, being, I believe, greater than that of her land-holders. Such a proportion of property, imaginary and baseless as it is, cannot be reduced to vapor but with great explosion. She will rise out of its ruins, however, because her lands, her houses, her arts will remain, and the greater part of her men. And these will give her again that place among nations which is proportioned to her natural means, and which we all wish her to hold.—To JAMES MAURY. vi, 52. FORD ED., ix, 349. (M., April 1812.)

— ENGLAND, Debts to citizens of.—See DEBTS DUE BRITISH.

2630. ENGLAND, Detested.—The Count de Moustier [French Minister] will find the affections of the Americans with France, but their habits with England. Chained to that country by circumstances, embracing what they loathe, they realize the fable of the living and the dead bound together.—To COMTE DE MOUSTIER ii, 295. (P., 1787.)

2631. ENGLAND, Dread of United States.—Great Britain, in her pride and ascendancy, has certainly hated and despised us beyond every earthly object. Her hatred may remain, but the hour of her contempt is passed and is succeeded by dread; not a present, but a distant and deep one. It is the greater as she feels herself plunged into an abyss of ruin from which no human means point out an issue. We also have more reason to hate her than any nation on earth.—To JAMES MONROE vii, 41. FORD ED., x, 66. (M., 1816.) See HARTFORD CONVENTION.

— ENGLAND, Embargo and.—See EMBARGO.

2632. ENGLAND, Flagitious government.—The regeneration of the British government will take a longer time than I have to live. * * * I shall make my exit with a bow to it, as the most flagitious of governments I leave among men.—To WILLIAM DUANE vi, 77. FORD ED., ix, 367. (M., Aug. 1812.)

2633. — — — I consider [the British] government as the most flagitious which has existed since the days of Philip of Macedon, whom they make their model. It is not only founded in corruption itself, but insinuates the same poison into the bowels of every other, corrupts its councils, nourishes factions, stirs up revolutions, and places its own happiness in fomenting commotions and civil wars among others, thus rendering itself truly the hostis humani generis.—To JOHN ADAMS vii, 46. (P. F., 1816.)

2634. ENGLAND AND FRANCE, Banditti.—Our lot happens to have been cast in an age when two nations to whom circumstances have given a temporary superiority over others, the one by land, the other by sea, throwing off all restraints of morality, all pride of national character, forgetting the mutability of fortune, and the inevitable doom which the laws of nature pronounce against departure from justice, individual or national, have declared to treat her reclamations with derision, and to set up force instead of reason as the umpire of nations. Degrading themselves thus from the character of lawful societies into lawless bands of robbers and pirates, they are abusing their brief ascendancy by desolating the world with blood and rapine. Against such a banditti, war had become less ruinous than peace, for then peace was a war on one side only.—To J. W. EPPES vi, 195. FORD ED., ix, 396. (P. F., Sep. 1813.)

2635. — — — How much to be lamented that the world cannot unite and destroy these two land and sea monsters. The one drenching the earth with human gore, the other ravaging the ocean with lawless piracies and plunder.—To DR. SAMUEL BROWN vi, 165. (M., July 1813.)

2636. ENGLAND, Friendly advances of.—Our successors have deserved well of their country in meeting so readily the first friendly advance ever made to us by England. I hope it is the harbinger of a return to the exercise of common sense and common good humor, with a country with which mutual interests would urge a mutual and affectionate intercourse. But her conduct hitherto has been towards us so insulting, so tyrannical and so malicious, as to indicate a contempt for our opinions or dispositions respecting her. I hope she is now coming over to a wiser conduct, and becoming sensible how much better it is to cultivate the good will of the government itself, than of a faction hostile to it; to obtain its friendship gratis than to purchase its enmity by nourishing at great expense a faction to embarrass it, to receive the reward of an honest policy rather than of a corrupt and vexatious one. I trust she has at length opened her eyes to federal falsehood and misinformation, and learned, in the issue of the Presidential election, the folly of believing them. Such a reconciliation to the government, if real and permanent, will secure the tranquillity of our country, and render the management of our affairs easy and delightful to our successors, for whom I feel as much interest as if I were still in their place. Certainly all the troubles and difficulties in the government during our time proceeded from England; at least all others were trifling in comparison with them.—To HENRY DEARBORN v, 455. (M., June 1809.)

2637. ENGLAND, Governing principles.—Great Britain's governing principles are conquest, colonization, commerce, monopoly.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL ix, 414. FORD ED., v, 229. (1790.)

2638. ENGLAND, Growth of United States and.—Have you no statesmen who can look forward two or three score years? It is but forty years since the battle of Lexington. One-third of those now living saw that day, when we were about two millions of people, and have lived to see this, when we are ten millions. One-third of those now living who see us at ten millions, will live another forty years, and see us forty millions; and looking forward only through such a portion of time as has passed since you and I were scanning Virgil together (which I believe is near three score years), we shall be seen to have a population of eighty millions, and of not more than double the average density of the present. What may not such a people be worth to England as customers and friends? And what might she not apprehend from such a nation as enemies?—To JAMES MAURY vi, 467. (M., 1815.)

2639. ——. Our growth is now so well established * * * that we may safely call ourselves * * * forty millions in forty years. * * * Of what importance then to Great Britain must such a nation be, whether as friends or foes? To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. vii, 22. (M., 1816.)

2640. ENGLAND, Hatred of United States.—In spite of treaties, England is still our enemy. Her hatred is deep rooted and cordial, and nothing is wanting with her but the power, to wipe us and the land we live in out of existence. Her interest, however, is her ruling passion; and the late American measures have struck at that so vitally, and with an energy, too, of which she had thought us quite incapable, that a possibility seems to open of forming some arrangement with her. When they shall see decidedly, that, without it, we shall suppress their commerce with us, they will be agitated by their avarice on the one hand, and their hatred and their fear of us, on the other. The result of this conflict of dirty passions is yet to be awaited.—To JOHN LANGDON. i, 429. (P., 1785.)

2641. ——. That nation [England] hates us, their ministers hate us, and their King, more than all other men, hates us. They have the impudence to avow this; though they acknowledge our trade important to them * * * I think their hostility towards us is much more deeply rooted at present, than during the war.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 550. FORD ED., iv, 214. (P., 1786.)

2642. ——. The English hate us because they think our prosperity filched from theirs.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 553. FORD ED., ix, 287. (M., 1810.)

2643. ——. England would prefer losing an advantage over her enemy to giving one to us. It is an unhappy state of mind for her, but I am afraid it is the true one.—To JAMES RONALDSON. v, 553. (M., 1810.)

2644. ——. A friendly, a just, and a reasonable conduct on the part of the British might make us the main pillar of their prosperity and existence. But their deep-rooted hatred to us seems to be the means which Providence permits to lead them to their final catastrophe. "Nullam enim in terris gentem esse, nullum infestiores populum, nomini Romani," said the General who erased Capua from the list of powers. What nourishment and support would not England receive from an hundred millions of industrious descendants, whom some of her people now born will live to see here? What their energies are, she has lately tried. And what has she not to fear from an hundred millions of such men, if she continues her maniac course of hatred and hostility to them? I hope in God she will change.—To CÆSAR A. RODNEY. vi, 448. (M., March 1815.)

2645. ENGLAND, Hostility of.—I think King, ministers, and nation are more bit hostile to us at present, than at any of the late war. A like disposition on our part has been rising for some time. In what events these things will end, we cannot foresee. Our countrymen are eager in their passions and enterprises, and not disposed to calculate their interests against these. Our enemies (for such they are, in fact), have for twelve years past followed but one uniform rule, that of doing exactly the contrary of what reason points out. Having, early during our contest, observed this in the British conduct, I governed myself by it in all prognostications of their measures; and I can say, with truth, it never failed me but in the circumstance of their making peace with us.*—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. i, 552. (P., May 1786.) See TREATIES.

2646. ——. The spirit of hostility to us has always existed in the mind of the King, but it has now extended itself through the whole mass of the people, and the majority in the public councils. In a country, where the voice of the people influences so much the measures of administration, and where it coincides with the private temper of the King, there is no pronouncing on future events. It is true they have nothing to gain, and much to lose by a war with us. But interest is not the strongest passion in the human breast.—To JAMES ROSS. i, 561. FORD ED., iv, 217. (P., 1786.)

2647. ——. The Marquis of Lansdowne is thoroughly sensible of the folly of the present measures of this country, as are a few other characters about him. Dr. Price is among these, and is particularly disturbed at the present prospect. He acknowledges, however, that all change is desperate: which weighs more, as he is intimate with Mr. Pitt. This small band of friends, favorable as it is, does not pretend to say one word in public on our subject.—To JOHN JAY. i, 544. (L., 1786.)

2648. ——. There is no party in our favor here [London] either in power or out of power. Even the opposition concur with the ministry and the nation in this. I can scarcely consider as a party the Marquis of Lansdowne, and a half dozen characters about him, such as Dr. Price, &c., who are impressed with the utility of a friendly connection with us. The former does not venture this sentiment in parliament, and the latter are not in situations to be heard. * * * Were the Marquis to come into the ministry (of which there is not the most distant prospect), he must adopt the King's system, or go out again, as he did before, for daring to depart from it.—To RICHARD HENRY LEE. i, 541. FORD ED., iv, 206. (L., 1786.)

2649. ——. The English are still our enemies. The spirit existing there, and rising in America, has a very lowering aspect. To what events it may give birth, I cannot foresee. We are young and can survive them; but their rotten machine must crush under the trial.—To C. W. F. DUMAS. i, 553. (P., 1786.)

2650. ENGLAND, Influence in United States.—The English can do us, as enemies, more harm than any other nation; and in peace and in war, they have more means of disturbing us internally. Their merchants established among us, the bonds by which our own are chained to their feet, and the banking combinations interwoven with the whole, have shown the extent of their control, even during a war with her. They are the workers of all the embarrassments our finances have experienced during the war. Declaring themselves bankrupt, they have been able still to chain the government to a dependence on them, and had the war continued, they would have reduced us to the inability to command a single dollar. They dared to proclaim that they would not pay their obligations, yet our government could not venture to avail themselves of this opportunity of sweeping their paper from the circulation, and substituting their own notes bottomed on specific taxes for redemption, which every one would have eagerly taken and trusted, rather than the baseless trash of bankrupt companies; our government, I say, have still been overawed from a contest with them, and has even countenanced and strengthened their influence, by proposing new establishments, with authority to swindle yet greater sums from our citizens. This is the British influence to which I am an enemy, and which we must subject to our government, or it will subject us to that of Britain.—To CÆSAR A. RODNEY. vi, 449. (M., March 1815.)

2651. ENGLAND, Insolence.—Of all nations on earth, the British require to be treated with the most hauteur. They require to be kicked into common good manners.—To COLONEL W. S. SMITH. ii, 284. (P., 1787.)

2652. ENGLAND, Jefferson and.—As a political man, the English shall never find any passion in me either for or against them. Whenever their avarice of commerce will let them meet us fairly half way, I should meet them with satisfaction, because it would be for our benefit.—To FRANCIS KINLOCH. iii, 197. FORD ED., v, 248. (Pa., 1790.)

2653. — — — I told [Mr. Erskine] I was going out of the Administration and, therefore, might say to him things which I would not do were I to remain in. I wished to correct an error which I, at first, thought his Government above being led into from newspapers, but I apprehend they had adopted it. This was the supposed partiality of the Administration and particularly myself in favor of France and against England. I observed that when I came into the Administration, there was nothing I so much desired as to be on a footing of intimate friendship with England; that I knew as long as she was our friend no enemy could hurt; that I would have sacrificed much to have effected it, and, therefore, wished Mr. King to have continued there as a favorable instrument; that if there had been an equal disposition on their part, I thought it might have been effected: for although the question of impressments was difficult on their side and insuperable with us, yet had that been the sole question, we might have shoved along in the hope of some compromise; that indeed there was a ground of accommodation which his ministry had on two occasions yielded to for a short time, but retracted; that during the administration of Mr. Addington and the short one of Mr. Fox, I had hoped such a friendship practicable, but that during all other administrations, I had seen a spirit so adverse to us that I now despaired of any change. That he might judge from the communications now before Congress whether there had been any partiality to France to whom, he would see, we had never made the proposition to revoke the Embargo immediately, which we did to England, and, again, that we had remonstrated strongly to them on the style of Mr. Champagny's letter, but had not to England on that of Canning, equally offensive; that the letter of Canning, now reading to Congress, was written in the high ropes and would be stinging to every American breast.—ANAS. FORD ED., i, 336. (Nov. 1808.)

2654. — — — With respect to myself I saw great reason to believe their ministers were weak enough to credit the newspaper trash about a supposed personal enmity in myself towards England. This wretched party imputation was beneath the notice of wise men. England never did me a personal injury, other than in open war; and for numerous individuals there, I have great esteem and friendship. And I must have had a mind far below the duties of my station, to have felt either national partialities or antipathies in conducting the affairs confided to me. My affections were first for my own country, and then, generally, for all mankind; and nothing but minds placing themselves above the passions, in the functionaries of this country, could have preserved us from the war to which their provocations have been constantly urging us.—To THOMAS LAW. v, 556. FORD ED., ix, 292. (M., 1811.)

2655. — — — The English newspapers suppose me the personal enemy of their nation. I am not so. I am the enemy to its injuries, as I am to those of France. If I could permit myself to have national partialities, and if the conduct of England would have permitted them to be directed towards her, they would have been so. * * * Had I been personally hostile to England, and biased in favor of either the character or views of her great antagonist, the affair of the Chesapeake put war into my hand. I had only to open it and let havoc loose. But if ever I was gratified with the possession of power, and of the confidence of those who had entrusted me with it, it was on that occasion when I was enabled to use both for the prevention of war, towards which the torrent of passion here was directed almost irresistibly, and when not another person in the United States, less supported by authority and favor, could have resisted it. And now that a definitive adherence to her impressments and Orders of Council renders war no longer unavoidable, my earnest prayer is that our government may enter into no compact of common cause with the other belligerent, but keep us free to make a separate peace, whenever England will separately give us peace and future security. But Lord Liverpool is our witness that this can never be but by her removal from our neighborhood.—To JAMES MAURY, vi, 53. FORD ED., ix, 349. (M., April, 1812.)

2656. ENGLAND, Kindred ties.—Were the English people under a government which should treat us with justice and equity, I should myself feel with great strength the ties which bind us together, of origin, language, laws, and manners; and I am persuaded the two people would become in future, as it was with the ancient Greeks, among whom it was reproachful for Greek to be found fighting against Greek in a foreign army.*—To JOHN ADAMS, vii, 45. (M., 1816.)

2657. ENGLAND, Loss of America.—The object of the present ministry is to buoy up the nation with flattering calculations of their present prosperity, and to make them believe they are better without us than with us. This they seriously believe for what is it men cannot be made to believe! * * * The other day * * * a General Clark, a Scotchman and ministerialist * * * introduced the subject of American affairs, and in the course of the conversation told me that were America to petition Parliament to be again received on their former footing, the petition would be very generally rejected. He was serious in this, and I think it * * * is the sentiment perhaps of the nation. In this they are wise, but for a foolish reason. They think they lost more by suffering us to participate of their commercial privileges, at home and abroad, than they lose by our political severance. The true reason, however, why such an application should be rejected is, that in a very short time, we should oblige them to add another hundred millions to their debt in unsuccessful attempts to retain the subjection offered to them. They are at present in a frenzy, and will not be recovered from it till they shall have leaped the precipice they are now so boldly advancing to.—To RICHARD HENRY LEE, i, 541. FORD ED., iv, 207. (L., 1786.)

2658. ENGLAND, Madison, Jefferson and.—Her ministers have been weak enough to believe from the newspapers that Mr. Madison and myself are personally her enemies. Such an idea is unworthy a man of sense; as we should have been unworthy our trusts could we have felt such a motive of public action. No two men in the United States have more sincerely wished for cordial friendship with her; not as her vassals or dirty partisans, but as members of coequal States, respecting each other, and sensible of the good as well as the harm each is capable of doing the other. On this ground, there was never a moment we did not wish to embrace her. But repelled by their aversions, feeling their hatred at every point of contact, and justly indignant at its supercilious manifestations, that happened which has happened. that will follow which must follow, in progressive ratio, while such dispositions continue to be indulged. I hope they will see this, and do their part towards healing the minds and cooling the temper of both nations.—To MR. MAURY, vi, 468. (M., 1815.) See FRIENDSHIP WITH ENGLAND.

* Adams wrote in reply: "Britain will never be our friend until we are her master. This will happen in less time than you and I have been struggling with her power, provided we remain united."—NOTOR.

2659. ENGLAND, Maritime rivalry.—The only rivalry that can arise is on the ocean. England may, by petty larceny, thwartings, check us on that element a little, but nothing she can do will retard us one year's growth. We shall be supported there by other nations, and thrown into their scale to make a part of the great counterpoise to her navy. If, on the other hand, she is just to us, conciliatory, and encourages the sentiment of family feelings and conduct, it cannot fail to befriend the security of both. We have the seamen and materials for fifty ships of the line, and half that number of frigates; and were France to give us the money and England the dispositions to equip them, they would give to England serious proofs of the stock from which they are sprung, and the school in which they have been taught: and added to the efforts of the immensity of seacoast lately united under one power, would leave the state of the ocean no longer problematical. Were, on the other hand, England to give the money, and France the dispositions to place us on the sea in all our force, the whole world, out of the continent of Europe, might be our joint monopoly. We wish for neither of these scenes. We ask for peace and justice from all nations; and we will remain uprightly neutral in fact, though leaning in belief to the opinion that an English ascendancy on the ocean is safer for us than that of France.—To JAMES MONROE, v, 12. FORD ED., viii, 449. (W., May 1806.)

2660. ENGLAND, Mendacity of Press.—The British government * * * have it much at heart to reconcile their nation to the loss of America. This is essential to the repose, perhaps even to the safety of the King and his ministers. The most effectual engines for this purpose are the public papers. You know well that that government always kept a kind of standing army of news-writers, who, without any regard to truth, or to what should be like truth, invented and put into the papers whatever might serve the ministers. This suffices with the mass of the people, who have no means of distinguishing the false from the true paragraphs of a newspaper.

When forced to acknowledge our independence, they were forced to redouble their efforts to keep the nation quiet. Instead of a few of the papers formerly engaged, they now engage every one. No paper, therefore, comes out without a dose of paragraphs against America. These are calculated for a secondary purpose also, that of preventing the emigrations of their people to America.—To COUNT VAN HOGENDORP. i. 464. FORD ED., iv, 103. (P., 1785.)

2661. ENGLAND, Morality of government.—It may be asked, what, in the nature of her government, unfits England for the observation of moral duties? In the first place, her King is a cipher; his only function being to name the oligarchy which is to govern her. The parliament is, by corruption, the mere instrument of the will of the administration. The real power and property in the government is in the great aristocratical families of the nation. The nest of office being too small for all of them to cuddle into at once, the contest is eternal, which shall crowd the other out. For this purpose, they are divided into two parties, the "Ins" and the "Outs," so equal in weight that a small matter turns the balance. To keep themselves in, when they are in, every stratagem must be practiced, every artifice used which may flatter the pride, the passions or power of the nation. Justice, honor, faith, must yield to the necessity of keeping themselves in place. The question whether a measure is moral, is never asked; but whether it will nourish the avarice of their merchants, or the piratical spirit of their navy, or produce any other effect which may strengthen them in their places. As to engagements, however positive, entered by the predecessors of the "Ins," why, they were their enemies' they did everything which was wrong; and to reverse everything which they did, must, therefore, be right. This is the true character of the English government in practice, however different its theory; and it presents the singular phenomenon of a nation, the individuals of which are as faithful to their private engagements and duties, as honorable, as worthy, as those of any nation on earth, and whose government is yet the most unprincipled at this day known. In an absolute government there can be no such equiponderant parties. The despot is the government. His power suppressing all opposition, maintains his ministers firm in their places. What he has contracted, therefore, through them, he has the power to observe with good faith; and he identifies his own honor and faith with that of his nation.—To JOHN LANGDON. v. 513. (M., March 1810.)

2662. — — —. England presents a singular phenomenon of an honest people whose constitution, from its nature, must render their government forever dishonest; and accordingly, from the time that Sir Robert Walpole gave the constitution that direction which its defects permitted, morality has been expunged from their political code.—To JAMES RONALDSON. v. 554. (M., 1810.)

2663. — — —. I consider the government of England as totally without morality, insolent beyond bearing, inflated with vanity and ambition, aiming at the exclusive dominion of the sea, lost in corruption, of deep-rooted hatred towards us, hostile to liberty wherever it endeavors to show its head, and the eternal disturber of the peace of the world.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 463. FORD ED., ix, 510. (M., June 1815.)

2664. ENGLAND, National debt.—George the Third and his minister, Pitt, and successors, have spent the fee simple of the kingdom under pretense of governing it; their sinecures, salaries, pensions, priests, prelates, princes and eternal wars, have mortgaged to its full value the last foot of their soil. They are reduced to the dilemma of a bankrupt spendthrift, who, having run through his whole fortune, now asks himself what he is to do? It is in vain he dismisses his coaches and horses, his grooms, liveries, cooks and butlers. This done, he still finds he has nothing to eat. What was his property is now that of his creditors; if still in his hands, it is only as their trustee. To them it belongs, and to them every farthing of its profits must go. The reformation of extravagance comes too late. All is gone. Nothing is left for retrenchment or frugality to go on. The debts of England, however, being due from the whole nation to one-half of it, being as much the debt of the creditor as debtor, if it could be referred to a court of equity, principles might be devised to adjust it peaceably. Dismiss their parasites, ship off their paupers to this country, let the landholders give half their lands to the money lenders, and these last relinquish one-half of their debts. They would still have a fertile island, a sound and effective population to labor it, and would hold that station among political powers, to which their natural resources and faculties entitle them. They would no longer, indeed, be the lords of the ocean and paymasters of all the princes of the earth. They would no longer enjoy the luxuries of pirating and plundering everything by sea, and of bribing and corrupting everything by land; but they might enjoy the more safe and lasting luxury of living on terms of equality, justice and good neighborhood with all nations. As it is, their first efforts will probably be to quiet things awhile by the palliatives of reformation; to nibble a little at pensions and sinecures, to bite off a bit here, and a bit there to amuse the people; and to keep the government agoing by encroachments on the interest of the public debt, one per cent. of which, for instance, withheld, gives them a spare revenue of ten millions for present subsistence, and sponges, in fact, two hundred millions of the debt. This remedy they may endeavor to administer in broken doses of a small pill at a time. The first may not occasion more than a strong nausea in the money lenders; but the second will probably produce a revulsion of the stomach. barbarisms and spasmodic calls for fair settlement and compromise. But it is not in the character of man to come to any peaceable compromise of such a state of things. The princes and priests will hold to the flesh-pots, the empty bellies will seize on them, and these being the multitude, the issue is obvious, civil war, massacre, exile as in France, until the stage is cleared of everything but the multitude, and the lands get into their hands by such processes as the revolution will engender.*—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 43. (M., 1816.)

2665. — —. I have long considered the present crises of England, and the origin of the evils which are lowering over her, as produced by enormous excess of her expenditures beyond her income. To pay even the interest of the debt contracted, she is obliged to take from the industrious so much of their earnings as not to leave them enough for their backs and bellies. They are daily, therefore, passing over to the pauper-list, to subsist on the declining means of those still holding up, and when these shall also be exhausted, what next? Reformation cannot remedy this. It could only prevent its recurrence when once relieved from the debt. To effect that relief I see but one possible and just course. Considering the funded and real property as equal, and the debt as much of the one as the other, for the holder of property to give up one-half to those of the funds, and the latter to the nation the whole of what it owes them. But this the nature of man forbids us to expect without blows, and blows will decide it by a promiscuous sacrifice of life and property. The debt thus, or otherwise extinguished, a real representation introduced into the government of either property or people, or of both, renouncing eternal war, restraining future expenses to future income, and breaking up forever the consuming circle of extravagance, debt, insolvency, and revolution, the island would then again be in the degree of force which nature has measured out to it in the scale of nations, but not at their head. I sincerely wish she could peaceably get into this state of being, as the present prospects of southern Europe seem to need the acquisition of new weights in their balance, rather than the loss of old ones.—To EDWARD EVERETT. vii, 232. (M., 1822.)

2666. ENGLAND, Natural enemies of United States.—I consider the British as our natural enemies, and as the only nation on earth who wish us ill from the bottom of their souls. And I am satisfied that, were our continent to be swallowed up by the ocean, Great Britain would be in a bonfire from one end to the other.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 323. FORD ED., iv, 469. 2670. — —. I never yet found any other general rule for foretelling what the British will do, but that of examining what they ought not to do.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 283. FORD ED., iv, 456. (P., 1787.)

2671. — —. We, I hope, shall be left free to avail ourselves of the advantages of neutrality; and yet, much I fear the English, or rather their stupid King, will force us out of it. For thus I reason. By forcing us into the war against them, they will be engaged in an expensive land war, as well as a sea war. Common sense dictates, therefore, that they should let us remain neuter: ergo, they will not let us remain neuter.—To JOHN ADAMS. ii, 283. FORD ED., iv, 456. (P., 1787.)

2673. — —. As for France and England, with all their preëminence in science, the one is a den of robbers, and the other of pirates.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 37. FORD ED., ix, 333. (M., 1812.)

2674. — —. A nation of buccaneers, urged by sordid avarice, and embarked in the flagitious enterprise of seizing to itself the maritime resources and rights of all other nations.—To HENRY MIDDLETON. vi, 91. (M., Jan. 1813.)

and leave us in the lurch? Her good faith! The faith of a nation of merchants! The Punica fides of modern Carthage! Of the friend and protectress of Copenhagen! Of the nation who never admitted a chapter of morality into her political code! And is now boldly avowing that whatever power can make hers, is her's of right. Money, and not morality, is the principle of commerce and commercial nations.—To JOHN LANGDON. v, 513. (M., March 1810.)

2679. ENGLAND, Punished.—England is now a living example that no nation however powerful, any more than an individual, can be unjust with impunity. Sooner or later public opinion, an instrument merely moral in the beginning, will find occasion physically to inflict its sentences on the unjust. Nothing else could have kept the other nations of Europe from relieving her under her present crisis. The lesson is useful to the weak as well as the strong.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 300. (M., April 1804.)

2680. ENGLAND, Reconquest of United States.—Monroe's letter is of an awful complexion, and I do not wonder the communication it contains made some impression on him. To a person placed in Europe, surrounded by the immense resources of the nations there, and the greater wickedness of their courts, even the limits which nature imposes on their enterprises are scarcely sensible. It is impossible that France and England should combine for any purpose: their mutual distrust and deadly hatred of each other admit no cooperation. It is impossible that England should be willing to see France repossess Louisiana, or get a footing on our continent, and that France should willingly see the United States reannexed to the British dominions. That the Bourbons should be replaced on their throne and agree to any terms of restitution, is possible; but that they and England joined, could recover us to British dominion, is impossible. If these things are not so, then human reason is of no aid in conjecturing the conduct of nations. Still, however, it is our unquestionable interest and duty to conduct ourselves with such sincere friendship and impartiality towards both nations, as that each may see unequivocally, what is unquestionably true, that we may be very possibly driven into her scale by unjust conduct in the other.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 557. FORD ED., viii, 314. (M., Aug. 1804.)

2681. ENGLAND, Reduction of.—If, indeed Europe has matters to settle which may reduce this hostis humani generis to a state of peace and moral order. I shall see that with pleasure, and then sing, with old Simon, nunc dimittas Domine.—To M. CORREA. vi, 407. (M., 1814.)

2682. ———. While it is much our interest to see this power reduced from its towering and borrowed height, to within the limits of its natural resources, it is by no means our interest that she should be brought below that, or lose her competent place among the nations of Europe.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 45. (P.F., 1816.)

2683. ENGLAND, Reform.—I am in hopes a purer nation will result, and a purer government be instituted, one which, instead of endeavoring to make us their natural enemies, will see in us, what we really are, their natural friends and brethren, and more interested in a fraternal connection with them than with any other nation on earth.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 46. (P.F., 1816.)

2684. ENGLAND, As a republic.—Probably the old hive will be broken up by a revolution, and a regeneration of its principles render intercourse with it no longer contaminating. A republic there like ours, and a reduction of their naval power within the limits of their annual facilities of payment, might render their existence even interesting to us. It is the construction of their government, and its principles and means of corruption, which make its continuance inconsistent with the safety of other nations. A change in its form might make it an honest one, and justify a confidence in its faith and friendship.—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 76. FORD ED., ix, 366. (M., Aug. 1812.)

2685. ENGLAND, Reunion with.—I am sincerely one of those who still wish for reunion with their parent country, and would rather be in dependence on Great Britain, properly limited, than on any nation on earth, or than on no nation.—To JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 201. FORD ED., i, 484. (M., August 1775.)

2686. ENGLAND, Self-interest and.—England is a nation which nothing but views of interest can govern.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 414. (P., 1785.)

2687. ———. Her interest is her ruling passion; and the late American measures have struck at that so vitally, and with an energy, too, of which she had thought us quite incapable, that a possibility seems to open of forming some arrangement with her. When they shall see decidedly, that without it, we shall suppress their commerce with us, they will be agitated by their avarice, on the one hand, and their hatred and their fear of us on the other. The result of this conflict of dirty passions is yet to be awaited.—To JOHN LANGDON. i, 429. (P., 1785.)

2689. ENGLAND, Selfishness of.—England's selfish principles render her incapable of honorable patronage or disinterested cooperation.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii, 68. FORD ED., x, 85. (M., 1817.)

be a general calamity. But happily it is impossible. Should it end in her being only republicanized, I know not on what principle a true republican of our country could lament it, whether he considers it as extending the blessings of a purer government to other portions of mankind, or strengthening the cause of liberty in our own country by the influence of that example. I do not, indeed, wish to see any nation have a form of government forced on them; but if it is to be done, I should rejoice at its being a freer one.*—To PEREGRINE FITZTHUGH. iv, 217. FORD ED., vii, 211. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

2691. ENGLAND, Tory principles of.—To judge from what we see published [in England], we must believe that the spirit of torism has gained nearly the whole of the nation; that the whig principles are utterly extinguished except in the breasts of certain descriptions of dissenters. This sudden change in the principles of a nation would be a curious morsel in the history of man.—To BENJAMIN VAUGHAN. FORD ED., v, 333. (Pa., 1791.)

2692. ENGLAND, Tyrant of ocean.—Great Britain has certainly * * * declared to our government by an official paper, that the conduct of France towards her during this war has obliged her to take possession of the ocean, and to determine that no commerce shall be carried on with the nations connected with France; that, however, she is disposed to relax in this determination so far as to permit the commerce which may be carried on through the British ports. I have, for three or four years been confident that, knowing that her own resources were not adequate to the maintenance of her present navy, she meant with it to claim the conquest of the ocean, and to permit no nation to navigate it, but on payment of a tribute for the maintenance of the fleet necessary to secure that dominion. A thousand circumstances brought together left me without a doubt that that policy directed all her conduct, although not avowed. This is the first time she has thrown off the mask.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. v, 606. FORD ED., ix, 326. (M., Aug. 1811.)

2693. ——. I own, that while I rejoice, for the good of mankind, in the deliverance of Europe from the havoc which would never have ceased while Bonaparte should have lived in power. I see with anxiety the tyrant of the ocean remaining in vigor, and even participating in the merit of crushing his brother tyrant.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 353. FORD ED., ix, 461. (M., July 1814.) See OCEAN.

2694. ENGLAND, Unfaithful to alliances.—The nature of the English government forbids, of itself, reliance on her engagements; and it is well known she has been the least faithful to her alliances of any nation of Europe. since the period of her history wherein she has been distinguished for her commerce and corruption, that is to say, under the houses of Stuart and Brunswick. To Portugal alone she has steadily adhered, because, by her Methuin treaty, she had made it a colony, and one of the most valuable to her.—To JOHN LANGDON. v, 313. (M., 1810.)

2695. ENGLAND, United States and.—These two nations [the United States and Great Britain], holding cordially together, have nothing to fear from the united world. They will be the models for regenerating the condition of man, the sources from which representative government is to flow over the whole earth.—To J. EVELYN DENISON. vii, 415. (M., 1825.)

2696. ENGLAND, United States and Colonies of.—It is the policy of Great Britain to give aliment to that bitter enmity between her States [in America] and ours, which may secure her against their ever joining us. But would not the existence of a cordial friendship between us and them, be the best bridle we could possibly put into the mouth of England?—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 489. (P., 1785.)

2697. ENGLAND, United States, France and.—We learn that Thornton thinks we are not as friendly now to Great Britain as before our acquisition of Louisiana. This is totally without foundation. Our friendship to that nation is cordial and sincere. So is that with France. We are anxious to see England maintain her standing, only wishing she would use her power on the ocean with justice. If she had done this heretofore, other nations would not have stood by and looked on with unconcern on a conflict which endangers her existence. We are not indifferent to its issue, nor should we be so on a conflict on which the existence of France should be in danger. We consider each as a necessary instrument to hold in check the disposition of the other to tyrannize over other nations.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., viii, 291. (W., Jan. 1804.)

— ENGLAND, War of 1812.—See WAR.

2698. ENGLAND, War with.—England is not likely to offer war to any nation, unless perhaps to ours. This would cost us our whole shipping, but in every other respect we might flatter ourselves with success.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. i, 435. (P., 1785.)

2699. ——. I judge that a war with America would be a popular war in England. Perhaps the situation of Ireland may deter the ministry from hastening it on.—To R. IZARD. i, 442. (P., 1785.)

2700. ——. I observed to Mr. Erskine [British Minister] that if we wished war with England, as the federalists charged us, and I feared his government might believe, nothing would have been so easy when the Chesapeake was attacked, and when even the federalists themselves would have concurred; but, on the contrary, that our endeavors had been to cool down our countrymen, and carry it before their government.—ANAS. FORD ED., i, 337. (Nov. 1808.)

* Jefferson was writing on the meditated invasion of England by France.—EDITOR.

2701. — —. During the eight years of my administration, there was not a year that England did not give us such cause as would have provoked a war from any European government. But I always hoped that time and friendly remonstrances would bring her to a sounder view of her own interests, and convince her that these would be promoted by a return to justice and friendship towards us.—To DR. GEORGE LOGAN. vi, 215. FORD ED., ix, 421. (M., Oct. 1813.)

— ENGLAND, Western Posts.—See POSTS.

2702. ENGRAVING, New method.—One new invention in the arts is worth mentioning. It is a mixture of the arts of engraving and printing, rendering both cheaper. Write or draw anything on a plate of brass with the ink of the inventor, and in half an hour he gives you engraved copies of it, so perfectly like the original that they could not be suspected to be copies. His types for printing a whole page are all in one solid piece. An author, therefore, only prints a few copies of his work, from time to time, as they are called for. This saves the loss of printing more copies than may possibly be sold, and prevents an edition from being ever exhausted.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 534. FORD ED., iv, 197. (P., 1786.)

2703. — —. There is a person here [Paris] who has hit on a new method of engraving. He gives you an ink of his own composition. Write on copper plates anything of which you would wish to take several copies, and, in an hour, the plate will be ready to strike them off; so of plans, engravings, &c. This art will be amusing to individuals, if he should make it known.—To DAVID RITTENHOUSE. i, 516. (P., 1786.)

2704. ENTAIL IN VIRGINIA, Abolition.—On the 12th of October, 1776, I obtained leave (in the Virginia Legislature) to bring in a bill declaring tenants in tail to hold their lands in fee-simple. In the earlier times of the colony, when lands were to be obtained for little or nothing, some provident individuals procured large grants; and, desirous of founding great families for themselves, settled them on their descendants in fee-tail. The transmission of this property from generation to generation, in the same name, raised up a distinct set of families, who, being privileged by law in the perpetuation of their wealth, were thus formed into a Patrician order, distinguished by the splendor and luxury of their establishments. From this order, too, the King habitually selected his Counsellors of State; the hope of which distinction devoted the whole corps to the interests and will of the crown. To annul this privilege, and instead of an aristocracy of wealth, of more harm and danger, than benefit, to society, to make an opening for the aristocracy of virtue and talent, which nature has wisely provided for the direction of the interests of Society, and scattered with equal hand through all its conditions, was deemed essential to a well-ordered republic. To effect it, no violence was necessary, no deprivation of natural right, but rather an enlargement of it by a repeal of the law. For this would authorize the present holder to divide the property among his children equally, as his affections were divided; and would place them, by natural generation on the level of their fellow citizens. But this repeal was strongly opposed by Mr. Pendleton, who was zealously attached to ancient establishments. * * * Finding that the general principle of entails could not be maintained, he took his stand on an amendment which he proposed, instead of an absolute abolition, to permit the tenant in tail to convey in fee-simple, if he chose it; and he was within a few votes of saving so much of the old law. But the bill passed finally for entire abolition.—AUTOBIOGR. PHY. i, 36. FORD ED., i, 49. (1821.)

2705. — —. The repeal of the laws of entail would prevent the accumulation and perpetuation of wealth, in select families, and preserve the soil of the country from being daily more and more absorbed in mortmain.* —AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 49. FORD ED., i, 69. (1821.)

2706. ENTAIL IN VIRGINIA, Preamble to Bill.—Whereas the perpetuation of property in certain families by means of gifts made to them in fee-simple is contrary to good policy, tends to deceive fair traders who give credit on the visible possession of such estates, discourages the holder thereof from taking care and improving the same, and sometimes does injury to the morals of youth by rendering them independent of, and disobedient to, their parents; and whereas the former method of docking such estates tail by special act of assembly, formed for every particular case, employed very much the time of the legislature, was burthensome to the public, and also to the individual who made application for such acts, Be it enacted &c.—BILL TO ABOLISH ENTAILS. FORD ED., ii, 103. (1776.) See 477, 478, 479, 480.

2707. ENTHUSIASM vs. MONEY.—The glow of one warm thought is to me worth more than money.—To CHARLES MCPHERSON. i, 196. FORD ED., i, 414. (A., 1773.)

2708. EPICURUS, Doctrines of.—The doctrines of Epicurus, notwithstanding the calumnies of the Stoics and caricatures of Cicero, is the most rational system remaining of the philosophy of the ancients, as frugal of vicious indulgence, and fruitful of virtue as the hyperbolical extravagances of his rival sects.—To CHARLES THOMPSON. vi, 518. FORD ED., x, 6. (M., 1816.)

*The bill for the abolition of entails was one of the measures of which Jefferson wrote in his Autobiography (i, 49) as follows: "I considered four of these bills [of the Revised Code of Va.], passed or reported, as forming a system by which every fibre would be eradicated of ancient or future aristocracy; and a foundation laid for a government truly republican; and all this would be effected without the violation of a single natural right of any one individual citizen." The other three bills were those abrogating the right of Primogeniture, establishing Religious Freedom, and providing a system of general education.—EDITOR.

†In his Life of Jefferson, Parton, (210) says: "It was the earliest and quickest of Jefferson's triumphs, though he did not live long enough to outlast the enmity his victory engendered. Some of the old Tories found it in their hearts to exult that he, who had disappointed so many fathers, lost his only son before it was a month old."—EDITOR.

2709. ———. I am an Epicurean. I consider the genuine (not the imputed) doctrines of Epicurus as containing everything rational in moral philosophy which Greece and Rome have left us. Epictetus indeed, has given us what was good of the Stoics; all beyond, of their dogmas, being hypocrisy and grimace. Their great crime was in their calumnies of Epicurus and misrepresentations of his doctrines; in which we lament to see the candid character of Cicero engaging as an accomplice.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 138. FORD ED., x, 143. (M., 1819.)

2710. EPICURUS, Syllabus of Doctrines.—[I send you] a syllabus of the doctrines of Epicurus:

Physical.—The Universe eternal.

Its parts, great and small, interchangeable.

Matter and Void alone.

Motion inherent in matter which is weighty and declining.

Eternal circulation of the elements of bodies.

Gods, an order of beings next superior to man, enjoying in their sphere, their own felicities; but not meddling with the concerns of the scale of beings below them.

Moral.—Happiness the aim of life.

Virtue the foundation of happiness.

Utility the test of virtue.

Pleasure active and In-do-lent.

In-do-lence is the absence of pain, the true felicity.

Active, consists in agreeable motion; it is not happiness, but the means to produce it.

Thus the absence of hunger is an article of felicity; eating the means to obtain it.

The summum bonum is to be not pained in body, nor troubled in mind.—i. e. In-do-lence of body, tranquillity of mind.

To procure tranquillity of mind we must avoid desire and fear, the two principal diseases of the mind.

Man is a free agent.

Virtue consists in, 1. Prudence. 2. Temperance. 3. Fortitude. 4. Justice.

To which are opposed, 1. Folly. 2. Desire. 3. Fear. 4. Deceit.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 141. FORD ED., x, 146. (M., 1819.) See SHORT.

2712. EQUALITY, America and.—In America no other distinction between man
1 man had ever been known but that of persons in office, exercising powers by authority of the laws, and private individuals. Among these last, the poorest laborer stood on equal ground with the wealthiest millionaire, and generally on a more favored one whenever their rights seemed to jar. It has been seen that a shoemaker, or other artisan, removed by the voice of his country from his work bench into a chair of office, has instantly commanded all the respect and obedience which the laws ascribe to his office. But of distinction by birth or badge, they had no more idea than they had of the mode of existence in the moon or planets. They had heard only that there were such, and knew that they must be wrong.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 270. FORD ED., iv, 174. (P., 1786.) See ARISTOCRACY.

2713. EQUALITY, Constitutions and.—The foundation on which all [our constitutions] are built is the natural equality of man, the denial of every preeminence but that annexed to legal office, and particularly the denial of a preeminence by birth.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 334. FORD ED., iii, 466. (A., 1784.) See GOVERNMENT.

2714. EQUALITY, Law and.—An equal application of law to every condition of man is fundamental.—To GEORGE HAY. vii, 175. FORD ED., ix, 62. (M., 1807.)

2715. EQUALITY, Political.—All men are created equal.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON. See EQUAL RIGHTS and RIGHTS OF MAN.

2716. EQUALITY, Privileges.—To unequal privileges among members of the same society the spirit of our nation is, with one accord, adverse.—REPLY TO ADDRESS.——iv, 394. (W., May 1801.) See PRIVILEGES.

2717. EQUAL RIGHTS, Aggression on.—No man has a natural right to commit aggression on the equal rights of another: and this is all from which the laws ought to restrain him.—To F. W. GILMER. vii, 3. FORD ED., x, 32. (M., 1816.)

2718. EQUAL RIGHTS, Government and.—The true foundation of republican government is in the equal right of every citizen, in his person and property, and in their management.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 11. FORD ED., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

2719. ———. The equal rights of man, and the happiness of every individual, are now acknowledged to be the only legitimate objects of government.—To M. CORAY. vii, 319. (M., 1823.)

2720. EQUAL RIGHTS, Immovable.—The immovable basis of equal rights and reason.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. iv, 169. FORD ED., vii, 118. (M., 1797.)

2721. EQUAL RIGHTS, Perversion of.—To special legislation we are generally averse, lest a principle of favoritism should creep in and pervert that of equal rights.—To GEORGE FLOWER. vii, 83. (P.F., 1817.)

2722. EQUAL RIGHTS, Political.—The basis of our [Virginia] Constitution is in opposition to the principle of equal political rights, refusing to all but freeholders any participation in the natural right of self-government. * * * However nature may by mental or physical disqualifications have marked infants and the weaker sex for the protection rather than the direction of government, yet among the men who either pay or fight for their country, no line of right can be drawn.—To JOHN HAMBLEN PLEASANTS. vii, 345. FORD ED., x, 303. (M., 1824.)

2723. — —. Even among our citizens who participate in the representative privilege, the equality of political rights is entirely prostrated by our [Virginia] Constitution. Upon which principle of right or reason can any one justify the giving to every citizen of Warwick as much weight in the government as to twenty-two equal citizens in London, and similar inequalities among the other counties? If these fundamental principles are of no importance in actual government, then no principles are important, and it is as well to rely on the dispositions of administration, good or evil, as on the provisions of a constitution.—To JOHN HAMBLEN PLEASANTS. vii, 344. FORD ED., x, 303. (M., 1821.) See RIGHTS.

— EQUITY.—See CHANCELLORS.

2724. ERROR, Correcting.—There is more honor and magnanimity in correcting than persevering in an error.—BATTURE CASE. viii, 598. (1812.)

2725. — —. We have always a right to correct ancient errors, and to establish what is more conformable to reason and convenience. This is the ground we must take.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 82. (M., 1801.)

2726. — —. It is better to correct error while new, and before it becomes inveterate by habit and custom.—CONGRESS REPORT. FORD ED., ii, 136. (1777.)

2727. ERROR, Deplored.—When I embarked in the government, it was with a determination to intermeddle not at all with the Legislature, and as little as possible with my co-departments. The first and only instance of variance from the former part of my resolution, I was duped into by the Secretary of the Treasury [Hamilton] and made a tool for forwarding his schemes, not then sufficiently understood by me; and of all the errors of my political life, this has occasioned me the deepest regret.*—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 460. FORD ED., vi, 102. (M., 1792.) See ASSUMPTION.

2728. ERROR, Evils of.—Error bewilders us in one false consequence after another in endless succession.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 149. FORD ED., x, 153. (M., 1819.)

2729. ERROR, Human Nature and.—The weakness of human nature, and the limits of my own understanding, will produce errors of judgment sometimes injurious to your interests.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 45. FORD ED., viii, 347. (1805.)

2730. — —. I have no pretensions to exemption from error. In a long course of public duties, I must have committed many. And I have reason to be thankful that, passing over these, an act of duty has been selected as a subject of complaint, which the delusions of self interest alone could have classed among them, and in which, were there error, it has been hallowed by the benedictions of an entire province, an interesting member of our national family, threatened with destruction by the bold enterprise of one individual.*—THE BATTURE CASE. viii, 601. (1812.)

2731. — —. I cannot have escaped error. It is incident to our imperfect nature. But I may say with truth, my errors have been of the understanding, not of intention; and that the advancement of [the people's] rights and interests has been the constant motive of every measure.—EIGHTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 110. FORD ED., ix, 225. (1808.)

2732. — —. I may have erred at times. No doubt I have erred. This is the law of human nature.†—SPEECH TO THE U. S. SENATE. iv, 362. FORD ED., vii, 501. (1801.)

2733. ERROR, Ignorance and.—Ignorance is preferable to error; and he is less remote from the truth who believes nothing, than he who believes what is wrong.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 277. FORD ED., iii, 119. (1782.)

2734. ERROR, Indulgence to honest.—For honest errors, indulgence may be hoped.—SPEECH TO THE U. S. SENATE. iv, 362. FORD ED., vii, 501. (1801.)

2735. — —. I shall often go wrong, through defect of judgment. When right, I shall often be thought wrong by those whose positions will not command a view of the whole ground. I ask your indulgence for my own errors, which will never be intentional; and your support against the errors of others, who may condemn what they would not if seen in all its parts.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 5. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.)

2736. ERROR, Judges and.—If, indeed, a judge goes against law so grossly, so palpably, as no imputable degree of folly can account for, and nothing but corruption, malice or wilful wrong can explain, and especially if circumstances prove such motives, he may be punished for the corruption, the malice, the wilful wrong; but not for the error.—THE BATTURE CASE. viii, 602. (1812.)

*Edward Livingston in the New Orleans Batture suit against Jefferson.—EDITOR.

†From a short speech read to the Senate on retiring from the Vice-Presidency.—EDITOR.

*The assumption of the State debts.—EDITOR.

2737. ——. I repeat that I do not charge the judges with wilful and ill-intentioned error, but honest error must be arrested where its toleration leads to public ruin.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 82. FORD ED., i, 113. (1821.)

2738. ERROR, Officials and.—Our Constitution has wisely distributed the administration of the Government into three distinct and independent departments. To each of these it belongs to administer law within its separate jurisdiction. The judiciary in cases of meum and tuum, and of public crimes; the Executive, as to laws executive in their nature; the Legislature in various cases which belong to itself, and in the important function of amending and adding to the system. Perfection in wisdom, as well as in integrity, is neither required, nor expected in these agents. It belongs not to man. Were the judge who, deluded by sophistry, takes the life of an innocent man, to repay it with his own; were he to replace, with his own fortune, that which his judgment has taken from another, under the beguilement of false deductions; were the Executive, in the vast mass of concerns of first magnitude, which he must direct, to place his whole fortune on the hazard of every opinion; were the members of the Legislature to make good from their private substance every law productive of public or private injury; in short, were every man engaged in rendering service to the public bound in his body and goods to indemnification for all his errors, we must commit our public affairs to the paupers of the nation, to the sweepings of hospitals and poor houses, who, having nothing to lose, would have nothing to risk. The wise know their weakness too well to assume infallibility; and he who knows most, knows how little he knows. The vine and the fig tree must withdraw, and the brier and bramble assume their places. But this is not the spirit of our law. It expects not impossibilities. It has consecrated the principle that its servants are not answerable for honest error of judgment.—BATTURE CASE. viii, 602. (1812.)

2739. ——. If a functionary of the highest trust, acting under every sanction which the Constitution has provided for his aid and guide, and with the approbation, expressed or implied, of its highest councils, still acts on his own peril, the honors and offices of his country would be but snares to ruin him.*—BATTURE CASE. viii, 603. (1812.)

2740. ERROR, The people and.—The people will err sometimes and accidentally, but never designedly and with a systematic and persevering purpose of overthrowing the free principles of the government.—TO M. CORAY. vii, 319. (M., 1823.)

2741. ——. Do not be too severe upon the errors of the people, but reclaim them by enlightening them.—TO EDWARD CARRINGTON. ii, 100. FORD ED., iv, 360. (P., 1787.)

2742. ERROR, Pointing out.—I would be glad to know when any individual member [of Congress] thinks I have gone wrong in any instance. If I know myself, it would not excite ill blood in me, while it would assist to guide my conduct, perhaps to justify it, and to keep me to my duty, alert.—TO JAMES MADISON. ii, 327. FORD ED., iv, 474. (P., 1787.)

2743. ERROR, Political enemies and.—The best indication of error which my experience has tested, is the approbation of the federalists. Their conclusions necessarily follow the false bias of their principles.—TO WILLIAM DUANE. v, 592. FORD ED., ix, 316. (M., 1811.)

2744. ERROR, Reason and.—The same facts impress us differently. This is enough to make me suspect an error in my process of reasoning, though I am not able to detect it.—TO JOHN ADAMS. i, 593. (P., 1786.)

2745. ERROR, Reason vs.—Error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it.—FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 3. FORD ED., viii, 3. (1801.)

2746. ERROR, Suppression of.—It is safer to suppress an error in its first conception than to trust to any after-correction.—CIRCULAR TO FOREIGN MINISTERS. iii, 509. FORD ED., vi, 180. (Pa., 1793.)

2747. ERROR, Time, truth and.—Time and truth will at length correct error.—TO C. F. VOLNEY. iv, 572. (W., 1805.)

2748. ERROR, Toleration of.—Here, [the University of Virginia] we are not afraid to follow truth wherever it may lead, nor to tolerate any error so long as reason is left free to combat it.—TO MR. ROSCOE. vii, 196. (M., 1820.)

2749. ERROR, Triumphant.—Error has often prevailed by the assistance of power or force. Truth is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED., ii, 102. (1776?)

2750. ERROR, Truth vs.—Truth is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error, and has nothing to fear from the conflict, unless, by human interposition, disarmed of her natural weapons. free argument and debate, errors ceasing to be dangerous when it is permitted freely to contradict them.—STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM. viii, 455. FORD ED., ii, 239. (1779.)

2751. ——. It is error alone which needs the support of government. Truth can stand by itself.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 401. FORD ED., iii, 264. (1782.)

2752. ERSKINE (William), Character.—I hope and doubt not that Erskine will justify himself. My confidence is founded in a belief of his integrity, and in the — of Canning.—TO PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 465. (M., Aug. 1809.)

2753. ESCHEAT, Bank charter and.—The bill for establishing a National Bank undertakes * * * to form the subscribers into a corporation [and] to enable them in their corporate capacities, to put the lands [they are authorized to hold] out of the reach of forfeiture or escheat; and so far is against the laws of Forfeiture and Escheat.—NATIONAL BANK OPINION. vii, 555. FORD ED. v, 284. (1791.)

2754. ——. All the property, real and personal, within the Commonwealth [of Virginia], belonging * * * to any British subject, * * * shall be deemed to be vested in the Commonwealth, the real estate by way of escheat, and the personal estate by forfeiture.—ESCHEATS AND FORFEITURES BILL. FORD ED. ii, 184. (May 1779.)

2755. ESCHEAT, Bill concerning.—During the connection which subsisted between the now United States of America and the other parts of the British empire, and their subjection to one common Prince the inhabitants of either part had all the rights of natural born subjects in the other, and so might lawfully take and hold real property, and transmit the same by descent to their heirs in fee-simple, which could not be done by mere aliens; * * * and, in like manner, had acquired personal property which, by their common laws, might be possessed by any other than an alien enemy, and transmitted to executors and administrators; but when, by the tyrannies of that Prince, and the open hostilities committed by his armies and subjects, inhabitants of the other parts of his dominions, on the good people of the United States, they are obliged to wage war in defence of their rights, and finally to separate themselves from the rest of the British empire, to renounce all subjection to their common Prince, and to become sovereign and independent States, the said inhabitants of the other parts of the British empire become aliens and enemies to the said States, and as such incapable of holding the property, real or personal, so acquired therein, and so much thereof as was within this Commonwealth became by the laws vested in the Commonwealth.—ESCHEATS AND FORFEITURES BILL. FORD ED. ii, 182. (May 1779.)

2756. ——. The General Assembly [of Virginia], though provoked by the example of their enemies to a departure from that generosity which so honorably distinguishes the civilized nations of the present age, yet desirous to conduct themselves with moderation and temper, by an act passed * * * in 1777, took measures for preventing * * * the property of British subjects in this Commonwealth from waste and destruction, by putting * * * [it] into the hands and under the management of commissioners, * * * so that it might be in their power, if reasonable at some future day, to restore to the former proprietors * * * [its] full value.—ESCHEATS AND FORFEITURES BILL. FORD ED. ii, 183. (May 1779.)

2757. ESTAINING (Count d'), Land-grant to.—The State of Georgia has given twenty thousand acres of land to the Count d'Estaing. This gift is considered here [France] as very honorable to him, and it has gratified him much.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 533. FORD ED. iv, 195. (P., 1786.)

2758. ESTEEM, Basis of.—Integrity of views more than their soundness, is the basis of esteem.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 273. FORD ED. vii, 335. (Pa., 1799.)

2759. ETHICS, Law and.—I consider ethics, as well as religion, as supplements to law in the government of man.—To MR. WOODWARD. vii, 339. (M., 1824.)

2760. ETHICS, System of.—I have but one system of ethics for men and for nations,—to be grateful, to be faithful to all engagements and under all circumstances, to be open and generous, promoting in the long run even the interests of both; and I am sure it promotes their happiness.—To LA DUCHESSE D'AVUILLE. iii, 135. FORD ED. v, 153. (N.Y., 1790.)

— ETHNOLOGY.—See ABORIGINES and INDIANS.

2761. ETIQUETTE, Disputed points.—I am sorry that your first impressions [of the United States] have been disturbed by matters of etiquette. * * * These disputes are the most insusceptible of determination, because they have no foundation in reason. Arbitrary and senseless in their nature, they are arbitrarily decided by every nation for itself. These decisions are meant to prevent disputes, but they produce ten where they prevent one. It would have been better, therefore, in a new country to have excluded etiquette altogether; or if it must be admitted in some form or other, to have it depend on some circumstance founded in nature, such as the age or stature of the parties.—To COMTE DE MOUSTIER. ii, 388. FORD ED. v, 10. (P., 1788.)

2762. ETIQUETTE, Liberation from.—The distance of our nation [from Europe] and difference of circumstances liberate [it], in some degree, from an etiquette, to which it is a stranger at home as well as abroad.—To M. DE PINTO. iii, 175. (N.Y., 1790.)

2763. ETIQUETTE, Rules of.—I. In order to bring the members of society together in the first instance, the custom of the country has established that residents shall pay the first visit to strangers, and, among strangers, first comers to later comers, foreign and domestic; the character of stranger ceasing after the first visits. To this rule there is a single exception. Foreign ministers, from the necessity of making themselves known, pay the first visit to the ministers of the nation, which is returned. II. When brought together in society, all are perfectly equal, whether foreign or domestic, titled or untitled, in or out of office. All other observances are but exemplifications of these two principles. I. 1st. The families of foreign ministers, arriving at the seat of government, receive the first visit from those of the national ministers, as from all other residents. 2d. Members of the Legislature and of the Judiciary, independent of their offices, have a right as strangers to receive the first visit. II. 1st. No title being admitted here, those of foreigners give no precedence. 2d. Differences of grade among diplomatic members, give no precedence. 3d. At public ceremonies, to which the Government invites the presence of foreign ministers and their families, a convenient seat or station will be provided for them, with any other strangers invited and the families of the national ministers, each taking place as they arrive, and without any precedence. 4th. To maintain the principle of equality, or of pêle mêle, and prevent the growth of precedence out of courtesy, the members of the Executive will practice at their own houses, and recommend an adherence to the ancient usage of the country, of gentlemen in mass giving precedence to the ladies in mass, in passing from one apartment * * * into another.*—JEFFERSON PAPERS. ix, 454. FORD ED., viii, 276. (1803.)

2764. EUROPE, America and.—With all the defects of our constitutions, whether general or particular, the comparison of our governments with those of Europe, are like a comparison of heaven and hell. England, like the earth, may be allowed to take the intermediate station.—To JOSEPH JONES. ii, 249. FORD ED., iv, 438. (P., 1787.)
